FARM LOANS INTEREST REBATE BILL (NO. 2)

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-134, respecting rebates of interest on farm loans made under the Farm Credit Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, November 30, 1982.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES, 1982-83

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Everett, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 5060.)

[English]

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question with regard to that report. Does the tabling of that report mean that the vote on the estimates for Veterans Affairs has been disposed of.

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, I was away when this matter was discussed. I understand, though, that the tabling of the report does not necessarily dispose of the estimates and that there can be future discussion. Senator Everett intends to speak to the report when he returns some time next week. Unfortunately, I can give you no more information because I was in London when these supplementary estimates were discussed in committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think what Senator Marshall is concerned about is whether the presentation of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance forecloses his motion to refer that part of those estimates dealing with Veterans Affairs to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. My understanding is that it does not, but I think Senator Everett wishes to comment on the relationship between this report and Senator Marshall's motion respecting the Veterans Affairs expenditures.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Everett, I move that the report be taken into consideration on Tuesday next, November 30, 1982.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

> That the names of the Honourable Senators Stollery and Cottreau be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Giguère and Stanbury on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, November 30, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

AIRLINES

QUEBECAIR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. After I asked some questions earlier this week about the Quebecair situation, the Leader of the Government tabled in this House the statement of the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, which suggested to the Quebec government a solution to the problems of Quebecair.

I have reread carefully the document tabled in the Senate, and I now have a few questions, including one which I would like to ask immediately of the Leader of the Government.

In his statement, the Minister of Transport, Mr. Pepin, says that he will create a new company, Quebecair 2, and that the previous company—let us call it Quebecair 1 for the purposes of this discussion—would be responsible for the debts and liabilities of the Quebecair company now in existence. It has been reported that the debts of the existing Quebecair company amount to several million dollars and that these debts would have to be repaid, among others, by the Fédération des Caisses populaires du Québec, which has interests in this company, and by the Quebec government, which has made a substantial investment of $15 million. In view of the substantial indebtedness of this company, it is obvious that the people with assets in Quebecair will not be able to repay the debts completely without possibly filing for bankruptcy or transferring certain assets.

The question I have asked myself is the following: Why is the approach of the federal government different in this case from the procedure it followed when it bailed out companies such as Dome, Chrysler, Maislin and all the other companies in financial difficulty? The government stepped in to reorganize these companies financially and give them a new impetus, while in the case of Quebecair, we are told that the company is in trouble, that it will have to pay off its own debts, that nothing will be done about them and that the government will simply ask that a new company be created called Quebecair 2 in which equity will be shared between the government of Quebec and Air Canada. Why is the federal government taking, in the case of Quebecair, a different approach from the one it took with regard to the other companies I have mentioned?

● (1410)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Asselin, of course, asked the same questions the other day, and now—

Senator Asselin: Not the same questions.

Senator Olson: No, not exactly the same questions, I agree, but since he read the communication sent by the Minister of Transport to Mr. Clair, he is now asking more specific questions.

I had intended to reply to the questions asked the other day when delayed answers were called, but I think, without getting into the submission Senator Asselin has made, it would be useful if I were to reply to those questions now.

Senator Asselin asked whether Quebecair's debts would be honoured by the proposed new company, Quebecair 2. I believe Senator Asselin will agree with me that it is clear from the telex sent by the Minister of Transport to Mr. Clair that Quebecair's debts would not be honoured by Quebecair 2, as is outlined in the proposal.

Senator Asselin also asked whether there would be job security for Quebecair employees.

The Minister of Transport proposed in his telex that the two levels of government "develop a plan to ensure that all employees of Quebecair at the time of the creation of Quebecair 2 are protected from the negative consequences that might result".

Beyond that the minister can provide no absolute guarantees. It should be pointed out that it is unrealistic to expect the minister to impose such a condition on Air Canada at a time when Air Canada is being forced, because of the economic turndown, to lay off some of its own employees. However, the minister has undertaken to make every possible effort to maintain job security for Quebecair employees.

Finally, the federal government has not yet received an official reply from Mr. Clair.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I wish to thank the Leader of the Government for providing this information. However, he will agree that he has not answered the specific question I asked earlier, namely, why the new company, Quebecair 2, will not honour the debts of the original Quebecair, which will probably force the latter to declare bankruptcy or relinquish its assets, because it will be impossible for shareholders to pay the company's debts of over $100 million.

Why is the federal government's approach to this case different from that taken in the past with other companies who were experiencing the same kind of financial difficulty? I quoted the minister, I mentioned Dome, Chrysler and Maislin, where the federal government intervened, either by injecting new capital in order to give the companies in question a financial boost or by guaranteeing very substantial loans by our lending institutions to help the companies out of their economic and financial morass.

Why did Quebecair not get the same treatment? Why not take over Quebecair with its present financial structure and then restructure the company and give it a fresh start by directly investing funds or by guaranteeing loans as was done in the case of the companies I have just mentioned? Why treat Quebecair differently?

• (1415)

[English]

Senator Olson: Senator Asselin said I did not answer his question completely, and I suppose I did not answer it completely to his satisfaction based on the arguments and the submissions that he is making, but I did, nevertheless, give an answer to the question that he raised, and I do not want to repeat it. In any event, when he asked the question why it was somewhat different from some other restructuring deal that might have been made with another company, whether it was in Quebec or elsewhere, I can refer that to the Minister of Transport, if he would like him to draw those comparisons. The federal government is trying to be helpful in this situation, as it was in a number of other situations where there was financing and, indeed, refinancing, problems that were so severe that it appeared that those companies would go into receivership, or trusteeship, or bankruptcy, unless the federal government tried to be helpful. I can assure him that the motive of the federal government and the Minister of Transport is to be helpful in this situation too.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I thank the leader, but I would like him to ask the Minister of Transport, Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin, why the federal government's reaction in this case is different from what it has been previously?

This is precisely the important point I raised, and I would like a specific answer. I am eagerly awaiting an answer from the Leader of the Government.

[English]

Senator Olson: I could give an answer to that question now, but I think Senator Asselin would prefer to have the answer come from the Minister of Transport, and I have already given an undertaking to refer that part of the question to the minister.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: I have a supplementary that deals, as far as I can remember, with the terms Minister Pepin used in his proposal concerning the changeover from Quebecair 1 to Quebecair 2. As I understand it, Quebecair 1 has liability for the debts and the assets. However Quebecair 2, the new company, would be entitled to buy some assets from Quebecair 1.

My first question is this: on what basis will the transaction referred to in the federal minister's letter be conducted between Quebecair 1 and Quebecair 2? Is the reference to a purchase by Quebecair 2 of Quebecair 1 assets intended to mean for instance the purchase of two Boeings 727's or other assets, with the result that Quebecair 1 will have to pass on anything of value to Quebecair 2, and be left with debts only? It seems to me there is some room for discussion and that everything would be contingent upon the terms and conditions upon which Quebecair 2 would acquire Quebecair 1 assets.

Clearly the balance between liabilities and assets will depend upon the transaction process between the two. In other words the terms of negotiations will be dependent upon the deal which may be made.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think Senator Tremblay has asked a fairly detailed question. Although it is not particularly complex, he is asking for details of what the terms and conditions in the total package might be for establishing Quebecair 2, including, I suppose, either the acquisition or the transfer of assets from the present Quebecair. I think I should refer that question to the Minister of Transport.

• (1420)

I hope that Senator Tremblay does not expect a response covering the kind of detail he is now requesting until some time after we have received the reply from the Honourable Michel Clair and others because I think the minister's statement and, indeed, the offer that he made, are clear. It seems to me that we should have a reply from Mr. Clair before getting into the details of the transaction itself.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: I should like to ask a supplementary question or, rather, to clear up a point. My purpose was not to find out what the Honourable Mr. Clair might reply, but only to clarify the offer made by the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Mr. Pepin. Careful reading show that there are a few vague and undealt with items in this offer. I pointed out to one of those grey areas which characterize the nature and quality of the offer itself.

[English]

Senator Olson: I was attempting to indicate to Senator Tremblay that my concern lies in the timing of my reply insofar as it may cover the details for which he has asked. I remain of the view that we should have a reply to the proposal or the statement made by the Minister of Transport to Mr. Clair.

At that point, I am certain that both sides will be satisfied regarding the details for which Senator Tremblay has asked.

Senator Tremblay: I would point out to the Leader of the Government that I am asking my questions so that I can be clear in my own mind about what the offer of the Minister of Transport entailed. Because of the grey zones contained in it, I confess that I did not completely understand the real meaning of the offer.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Have you read it?

Senator Tremblay: Yes, I think.

Senator Frith: Have you read it?

Senator Tremblay: I am referring specifically—though I cannot say which paragraph—to the statement about the possibility of Quebecair 2 buying out the assets—

Senator Asselin: Certain assets.

Senator Tremblay: —certain assets in the selection of assets which Quebecair 2 will buy, and I mentioned the two Boeing aircraft as an example. As a result of that selection, the margin of indebtedness which will remain the responsibility of the shareholders of Quebecair 1 may widen or shrink, depending on the conditions of the purchase of the assets. In such a deal, there ought to be a very definite zone.

That is what I am asking. Is there, in the mind of the Minister of Transport, a wide enough margin in the deal for the purchase of the assets of Quebecair 1 by Quebecair 2 so that the residuary debt would be more heavy or less heavy?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think the statement is pretty clear with regard to the proposal.

In the first instance, I repeat that there needs to be a response from the Honourable Michel Clair. If that is sufficiently positive to lead to further and more detailed discussions, then, I presume, following them all these matters will be clarified to the satisfaction of Senator Tremblay.

● (1425)

In the meantime I will refer that question to the Minister of Transport, and see whether he wants to reply in advance of further negotiations with the Quebec authorities. If that is the case, he obviously will reply, but I should caution the honourable senator that the minister may not want to make additional offers over and above what is already contained in the statement until those discussions have taken place.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

INDOCHINESE FAMILY REUNIFICATION PROGRAM—NUMBER OF IMMIGRANT VISAS

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, on August 24, 1979, the National Citizens Coalition, whose president is Colin Brown, placed an advertisement in the Globe and Mail and other newspapers stating that if each of the 50,000 initial entrants under the Vietnamese Refugee Program sponsored an average of 15 of their relatives, that would represent a total of 750,000. On November 4, 1981, I asked a question in the Senate referring to the aforementioned advertisement by the National Citizens Coalition and asked how many actually entered Canada on the basis of family reunification.

On November 19, 1981, the Leader of the Government stated that as of November 10, 1981, 3,329 persons had been interviewed, which resulted in the issuance of 2,360 immigrant visas, and that to that date 1,740 had arrived in Canada.

My question today is: Would the minister bring those figures up to date and advise the Senate how many have arrived since?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will give an undertaking to try to do that.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF BP CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to Senator Balfour's question of November 23 concerning the cost of the takeover of BP Canada by Petro-Canada. It is a fairly long reply, and included with it is a table showing the budget impact of the acquisition, listing several categories for the years from 1983 to 1987. Because of the nature of the information, perhaps the honourable senator would agree to having both the answer and the table printed in the Debates of the Senate as though they had been read.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Could the Leader of the Government not summarize the answer by stating, in a brief sentence, what is the total price of the acquisition of the British Petroleum assets and undertaking by Petro-Canada? What is the price?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can give a figure that covers the cost for the whole period. Of course, there are interest charges and various other things involved. If we calculate the charges to the end of 1987 and reach a total of all of the figures, including inventory, assets of the service stations, refineries, and other fixed assets, plus interest and other details, the final amount comes to $673.8 million.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Olson: It is important that Senator Balfour and other honourable senators, and, indeed, the Canadian public who read this, should look at the table to see how we arrive at the final figure.

Senator Balfour: I thank the Leader of the Government for his answer.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, is it agreed that I file the answer and the table, so that everyone, including Senator Balfour, may understand in detail how the figures are calculated?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

> The attached tabulation "Incremental Budgetary Impact of Acquisition" is taken from the Petro-Canada-BP agreement and shows the expenditures and sources of funds for the acquisition.
> The $347.6 million, which received wide publicity at the time of the announcement on October 31, would be the total share purchase cost. The amount of $377.2 million shown in the attached tabulation includes interest charges, as noted.
> The Synergistic Effects, a total of $130 million over the period 1983-1987, reflects the benefits/expense savings anticipated to result from the economies of scale of combining BP's marketing operations with Petro-Canada's operations in Ontario and Quebec.
> The debt issuance has been assumed to be at 12 per cent to finance the entire acquisition cost, including inventory, reidentification costs, et cetera. All available cash flow, after interest payments, has been assumed to be dedicated to debt repayment, with debt reduction accomplished each year from the positive cash balance.

The acquisition presents no draw on other corporate funds and, following repayment in seven to eight years, offers a substantial annual cash flow for other corporate activities.

As the minister emphasized before the committee, it is a straight commercial transaction and will not involve use of the Canadian Ownership Charge.

PETRO-CANADA—RELOCATION OF OFFSHORE SUPPLY BASE AT MULGRAVE, NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Smith on November 23, 1982, concerning the relocation of Petro-Canada's offshore supply base at Mulgrave, Nova Scotia.

I am advised by Petro-Canada as follows: Petro-Canada took a decision to move from Mulgrave four miles north to Auld's Cove, because the space available at Mulgrave is completely inadequate. In using the harbour facilities at Mulgrave, Petro-Canada has had to maintain warehousing and pipe yard facilities in two other locations.

The decision to move was not in any way related to union busting. The company maintains it has to move for logistic and economic reasons, to have all of its facilities at one location. It would then have the same logistics arrangement as two other oil companies in Nova Scotia have, and as Petro-Canada itself has in Newfoundland.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question of the Leader of the Government respecting the answer that he just gave to my question of November 23. I do not believe my question made any reference whatever to unions or to union busting. I wonder why it is that that phrase occurs in the answer? Has the company been accused of union busting, or has it been doing so?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I believe there has been some speculation that that was part of it. However, I would be prepared to remove that line completely from the answer if Senator Smith finds it inappropriate for the reply to his question.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I do not think it inappropriate. It occurs to me that there must be some reason for inserting that sentence in the answer. I want to know what the reason is; that is all.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have just explained it, so I suppose there is no use in repeating myself.

Senator Smith: I did not hear the explanation.

Senator Olson: I said that I think there have been some allegations to the effect that there was at least a suggestion or an element of that factor involved.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

SALE OF APARTMENT UNITS TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on November 18, 1982, concerning whether FIRA has been formally asked to investigate the sale by Cadillac-Fairview and others of 11,000 apartment units to foreign interests.

Honourable senators, the answer is fairly long and I ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FIRA officials are looking into the situation to see if the case could be reviewed under the Foreign Investment Review Act. Examination of the transactions involved in the changes of ownership and control of these apartment blocks to ensure that there has been no evasion of compliance with the act is continuing. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Economic Expansion informs me that his officials have received full cooperation in reviewing all the documentation involved. Their preliminary analysis indicates that the transactions have been structured in a manner whereby they do not come under the review procedures of the act. In effect, it appears that any foreign or non-eligible persons involved are passive investors in the real estate, and there is no exercise of control by non-eligible persons.

This examination will continue until the Minister is satisfied that there has been no contravention of the Act.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator van Roggen, moved the third reading of Bill C-129, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

AGRICULTURE

"INDUSTRY IN TURMOIL"—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 22, 1982, the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture entitled: "Industry in Turmoil: Report on the Long Term Stabilization of the Beef Industry in Canada," tabled in the Senate on June 22, 1982.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, it is with pleasure that I add my comments on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on the long term stabilization of the beef industry in Canada, which report is entitled "Industry in Turmoil."

At the outset I should like to pay tribute to the late Honourable Harry Hays, to whom this report was dedicated. His enthusiasm, vast knowledge and dedication to this study reflected his lifelong interest and work in agriculture generally, and in the beef industry specifically, at local, provincial, national and international levels.

I should also like to pay tribute to Senator Sparrow, who, when called upon to assume the chairmanship of the Senate committee, accepted that responsibility willingly and proceeded to pilot the draft report to its final printing with consideration and dispatch. I am confident that all committee members join me in extending to Senator Sparrow a very sincere thank you.

An expression of thanks and appreciation go to our consultants, Mr. S. B. Williams and Mr. Max Roytenberg; the committee staff, Dr. Grant Carman, Sally Rutherford and Aileen Collins; and the clerk of the committee, John Desmarais.

Honourable senators, the beef industry was in serious difficulty. Incomes of producers took a roller-coaster ride. Cost of production was increasing, as were interest rates. Financial hardships forced many established producers to disperse their herds entirely and forced others into bankruptcy.

In its concern for the beef industry, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture undertook the study. It conducted an examination of marketing systems and of various boards and agencies, and then contracted consultants to produce a working paper entitled: "Alternative Marketing and Stabilization Programs for the Beef Industry in Canada." It was designed to identify issues, propose options, and promote discussion. It was widely circulated to provincial departments of agriculture, producers, consumers, packers and so forth. A series of 10 hearings across the country was held.

The committee heard the views of producers, consumers, business people, trade officials, academics, provincial ministers of agriculture and other government officials. Our thanks go to the organizations and individuals who made representations.

From these presentations it was clearly evident that, although the industry was in serious difficulty and stability was a desired objective, there was no agreement on solutions to problems. Two principles were formulated: First, Canada needs and must have a strong and viable beef industry; and secondly, beef industry policy approaches must be flexible and developmental.

Considering the significant differences of opinion among beef producers, the committee did not see fit to force the issue or polarize the industry further.

Many of the concerns and problems presented by producers and other witnesses pointed to the fact that there was no vehicle which has the mandate to deal with them. In response, the committee recommends the establishment of a National Beef Producers Agency through an amendment to the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, which agency would be made up principally of producer representatives working in close co-operation with provincial governments. It would not have price-setting or quota-granting powers, but would act on behalf of producers in a co-ordinating, an informational and an advisory role. The committee notes that such an agency could serve as the basis of a marketing board, if producers should choose to take this step.

The committee further recommends that the Government of Canada investigate the advisability of establishing income-averaging programs which would create a capital pool for beef operation financing at favourable interest rates.

Honourable senators, I commend the report to you.

● (1440)

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this report is considered debated.

THE SENATE

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 12, the debate on the motion of Senator Roblin:

> That this House affirms that the federal character of representative and responsible government in Canada will be strengthened if the membership of the Senate is constituted by election rather than by appointment.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, when I read Senator Roblin's announcement in the press and then saw his television appearances, I decided he was taking a Madison Avenue approach. On the evening he gave notice of his motion, I looked up to the south gallery and saw there the honourable member for Nepean-Carleton, Mr. Walter Baker. I commented to one of my colleagues that he must have come here to practise counting. My colleague looked up, and said, "No, he's not using his fingers and he doesn't have a tutor with him." However, I noticed that the honourable member stayed until the motion was presented and then he left. Obviously, he did not find the Senate any more stimulating than the House of Commons.

Then, of course, Senator Frith could not let all the publicity go by, and he had to get into the act, too, for if the Senate was to be reformed he was going to be in the forefront. Senator Frith did fairly well in extending that forefront, because he now has it reaching from the North Pole to the South Pole, and he has stretched it into a freebie to Australia. I can understand now why he is so anxious to be in the forefront. The reason I have carried this order in my name for some time is that I was hoping that the honourable senator would ask to precede me, thereby giving me the benefit of his views before I spoke. Obviously, I am not going to get that opportunity, so I will go ahead without the benefit of his views.

I think Senator Frith is providing a Mackenzie King type leadership, namely, see which way the sheep are going and then get in front.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is why I was waiting for you.

Senator Phillips: That is why the honourable senator went first class to Australia with the sheep.

Senator Frith: I did not go first class. That must have been another trip.

Senator Phillips: And, of course, the then Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition could not be overshadowed by the deputy leaders, and they had to go along on the trip too. I do not resent that, but I am a bit curious to know why Senator Buckwold went along. Someone should have invited the seconder of the motion, Senator Deschatelets. I think he should have gone instead of Senator Buckwold.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Oh, well, perhaps some others can still go first class.

Senator Phillips: I would like to suggest to those honourable senators who had the freebie that they give an equal chance to those opposed to an elected Senate to go and investigate how it works and, perhaps, the freebie could be extended to include some countries that have appointed Senates. I am thinking of Holland and, I believe, Thailand. Certainly, that would be an excellent trip for the mover of the motion and Senator Frith.

The two deputy leaders are saying that they are anxious for reform and for an elected Senate, and at the same time they are saying that the Senate as it exists has done a wonderful job. They really have not given any reasons for an elected Senate. Before we get too enthusiastic, we should hear some specific reasons for putting in place an elected Senate. I think it is a sign of parliamentary arteriosclerosis, or plain old-fashioned hardening of the arteries, that at a time when the economy is in a state of depression, and there is record unemployment, a housing crisis and all sorts of immediate problems facing this country, we are discussing the election of a Senate. If that is the best the Senate can do, perhaps we should be discussing abolition of the Senate, rather than selection by election.

Senator Marshall: Watch it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Don't go too far.

Senator Frith: Moving on to your next point.

Senator Phillips: I realize that I am skating on thin ice here, but I am sure that there are many people who will agree with me.

Last February, while returning from Toronto I sat beside a fairly senior executive of a company located in Ottawa. He was telling me that it was his hope that the Senate would spend the winter making recommendations to the government on various matters concerning the economy, such as housing, the mining industry, agriculture, fisheries, and so on. In other words, he was recommending that we attempt to reform the economy, not the Senate, and he considered the economy to be the uppermost problem facing this country.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: So say we all.

Senator Phillips: In his speech Senator Roblin equated the opportunity to cast a ballot with the solution to the problem. It is a fallacy to make franchise synonymous with solution. Over the past few years the frequency of federal elections and provincial elections has provided everyone with more than ample opportunity to vote. We have had all kinds of political propaganda, promises and programs but, in spite of all these opportunities, our problems are increasing, and I do not think that an election for this chamber will do anything to solve them.

I do not believe there is a great outcry for another opportunity to vote because fewer Canadians are voting in each election. About 60 per cent of the eligible voters in Ontario vote. I think they are staying home, not because the Senate is appointed, but because they are just not interested. Ontario spent approximately $1 million advertising the recent municipal elections in the province and they received a turnout of less than 40 per cent. I just do not think there is a great desire on the part of the people to turn out and vote. People are looking for solutions not a ballot, and we are not providing solutions by giving them an extra ballot.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): But if we want to change the government how can we do it without a ballot?

Senator Phillips: I can tell the honourable senator that both he and I have tried the ballot to change the government on a number of occasions, and I do not think we have succeeded.

Recently, the "Arkansas Fiddler", Senator Frith, suggested that my colleagues and I from Prince Edward Island were very much like the people from Missouri—we had to be shown. I can say that that will be my attitude throughout my remarks in dealing with the subject of an elected Senate.

I have no real hard and fast preconceived idea except that I want to be given the reasons for, and the advantages of, such an eventuality. So far these have been avoided and no one has mentioned an advantage to anyone. I understand from Senator Frith's remarks the other evening that we are going to have the pleasure of listening to him give us a travelogue on his trip to Australia. I hope he comes up with some advantages for an elected Senate, because if he is going to talk on what the Australian Senate does he could have gone to the high commission and obtained a pamphlet on the matter.

Senator Marshall: Or done some library research.

Senator Phillips: The Library of Parliament could have researched the matter and probably given a better report than we will get from this freebie that some honourable senators enjoyed.

Senator Marshall: You had better not go on a trip.

• (1450)

Senator Phillips: I can safely say that. I am getting too old to go on trips.

Senator Frith: There goes Thailand.

Senator Phillips: I can agree with Senator Roblin's idea that we need a second chamber. I will agree with that, in spite of my reference to abolition. However, it is a chamber that should be more functional than the present chamber. I think Senator Roblin would agree with that too.

Senator Donahoe gave some excellent reasons for the existence of the Senate in terms of its functions. I will not repeat them except to call attention to one of the main functions of the Senate which is seldom mentioned, that of putting on the brakes.

Let us say for discussion purposes that the Minister of Finance decides to nationalize the banks in order to balance the budget.

Senator Flynn: Don't give him an idea like that. He might do so.

Senator Phillips: The Prime Minister has a close connection with Mexico, so that is a distinct possibility. However, if that were to happen, I would hope that senators would forget their allegiance to the Liberal Party, remember that their allegiance is to this chamber, and through this chamber to the country, and put the brakes on.

Senator Flynn: I am not too sure about that—at least not on the basis of what has happened up to now.

Senator Phillips: The members of the House of Commons like to criticize the Senate, and that is their prerogative; but in turn I think occasionally we should remind them of their behaviour. The Senate is normally accused of having rubber-stamped legislation. Honourable senators, I do not think we rubber-stamp any more legislation than they do in the House of Commons. When a bill is introduced in the other chamber, it passes. There may be filibusters and there may be delays, but the bill passes. About the only difference between the rubber-stamping in the House of Commons and the rubber-stamping in the Senate is that there are usually more senators present to rubber-stamp the legislation than there are members in the other place.

Senator Flynn: We take our responsibilities more seriously.

Senator Phillips: Yes. We even get Senator Lawson to come in for some votes.

An Hon. Senator: Occasionally.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: When?

Senator Phillips: But when a member does break ranks with his party—

An Hon. Senator: Never!

Senator Phillips: —the media reports indicate that so-and-so voted "against his party." That shows, honourable senators, just how little those in the media really think about their reporting. It should not be reported that a member voted against his party, but that a member voted against the legislation. Certainly we should all be able to do that regardless of what party is in power. It we could do a few of those things, Parliament would be far more functional than it is now.

Senator Roblin in his remarks said that the public concept of the Senate was so low he didn't think it could survive. Well, I speak to a good many people throughout the year and I often speak to them in situations where—

Senator Macquarrie: —they can't answer.

Senator Phillips: —they cannot answer, but they have to be frank when they do answer. I do not find that the Senate has any worse reputation than the House of Commons or the legislatures.

Senator Flynn: It has none at all.

Senator Phillips: Unfortunately, all three have a very poor reputation in the eyes of the public.

Recently I saw the sponsor of the resolution being interviewed on TV following an interparliamentary meeting in this chamber. He was complaining vigorously that the Senate had no political legitimacy.

Honourable senators, even a mild tempered individual like me has been known to refer to the personal legitimacy of certain senators, but when it comes to the chamber I think there is a political legitimacy for it—and that is the Constitution, Senator Roblin. The Constitution makes this chamber legitimate; whether it is elected or appointed, it is a legitimate branch of Parliament.

I find the most confusing part of Senator Roblin's remarks occurred when he equated a vote with the solution, saying that if there was just a chance for people in various regions to vote again everything would be all right. Well, I cannot agree with that, Senator Roblin. I think you placed an awful lot of distance between your resolution and the truth of the matter.

Senator Roblin: I hope I never did that.

Senator Phillips: I would say you achieved a sort of "political infinity" in that regard. It occurred to me to wonder whether the resolution had not been prompted by a certain feeling in western Canada that an elected Senate would give the west a voice in the central government. The Western Canada Concept advertisements used to say, "Once elected Senate." Always when I looked at those ads I wondered how many senates they thought we had. We have only one. The ads could have said, "An elected Senate."

In any event, I would like honourable senators to consider the regional representation in the other house. Let us look at representation in the other house in terms of the Senate regions. Consider the western region. In the other house they have 89 seats or 29 per cent of the vote. In the Senate the same region has 24 seats or 23 per cent of the vote. If the election of members is the criterion for success, honourable senators, surely we can anticipate that the 29 per cent voting to represent the western region in the House of Commons would be far more efficient than the 23 per cent appointed in this chamber. Just what does the honourable senator who sponsored the resolution expect the 23 per cent to do that the elected 29 per cent cannot do?

Let's have a look at some of the individual provinces. British Columbia, with 33 members, has 11 per cent of the membership in the other house. It has six members in this chamber, or 6 per cent of the vote. I do not know which situation Premier Bennett would prefer—the 33 members representing him or the six senators representing him. I suspect that, if we asked him, he would probably say he did not want either number but I think he would be better off with the 11 per cent than with the 6 per cent.

Quebec, with 79 members, has 25 per cent of the vote in the other place. If you go to western Canada, the complaint you most frequently receive is that Quebec, with 25 per cent of the vote in the other house and 23 per cent of the vote in this house, receives everything. But, honourable senators, the same western region has 29 per cent of the votes. The fact that there is such a difference must be due to one of two reasons. It is either due to the system, or due to the calibre of the members. I presume it must be the system, because I believe there is a majority of Conservative members in western Canada. At least, I hope it is the system.

In case anybody wants to have a look at the Atlantic region, and would like to quote the figures back to me, the Atlantic region has 11 per cent of the membership in the House of Commons, and 28 per cent of the membership in this chamber. I can explain that away by saying most of the Senate members from the Atlantic region are Grits and, therefore, really do not count.

Senator Frith: There is something wrong with that system.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): There is something wrong with that conclusion, in any event.

Senator Phillips: Following the by-election in Olds-Didsbury in the province of Alberta, two of the Alberta members, the honourable member for Crowfoot and the honourable member for Bow River, issued a statement calling for an elected Senate.

I wrote the honourable member for Crowfoot and asked him to tell me the advantages he found in an elected Senate. He replied with a long dissertation on the causes of western alienation, which ranged from Louis Riel through to the National Energy Program, but did not give any reason for the Senate being the source of any western alienation.

The honourable member for Bow River was much more brief and probably a bit more accurate. He said the Senate would pass anything. I agree with him on that, the Senate will pass anything, but, honourable senators, I point out that the major source of alienation in western Canada is the National Energy Program. That did not originate in the Senate; that originated in the House of Commons and was passed by that elected body.

If elected members are that much more efficient, and that much more representative, one would anticipate that the House of Commons would not do that type of thing, yet I am sure the honourable member for Bow River would be the first to maintain that the House of Commons did that very thing.

I should now like to spend a moment or two on the presentation by Senator Roblin. He went on to develop the thesis that we should have an elected Senate, but then he paused and said: Watch it! That is dangerous to the House of Commons. We have to first of all protect the House of Commons. We can't have another elected body interfering with the House of Commons. That would mean the House of Commons would become even less significant than it is today. I fail to see, honourable senators, if both houses of Parliament are going to be elected, why they should not have equal power and equal responsibility.

Does Senator Roblin find political legitimacy in a second-class franchise that he does not find in the Senate today?

He then went on to that old red herring about the government appointing members to various regional and national bodies, and having such appointments approved by the Senate. He said that this could be a function of a Senate with reduced powers—powers vastly inferior to those of the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, I fail to see how a meeting of the Senate to approve the appointment of Mrs. Killjoy from Kinburn, Ontario, to the National Capital Commission would help the Premier of Alberta in his efforts to be represented in the central government.

Senator Roblin also suggested that the Senate could approve appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada. Asking a prospective appointee to the Supreme Court of Canada if he had ever signed an abortion paper is not going to help Premier Peckford of Newfoundland in his offshore oil dispute.

Honourable senators, as far as I am concerned, that would be a complete and utter waste of time.

Having established that we should have an elected Senate, Senator Roblin went on to say: Yes, an elected Senate, but for God's sake do not have an election; we have to find another way of electing the Senate without having an election. He then looked around and came up with proportional representation and found certain merit in that. The leaders would select the candidates, and set their order of preference. If a party received 40 per cent of the vote, then that party would get 40 per cent of the appointments to the Senate.

That does not seem very democratic. I can see our current leaders having fun with that. Everybody would be expected to be very loyal and servile. If one disagreed with the leader, one would be placed 110th on a list of 50. I cannot quite see John Turner, Brian Mulrooney or Rosemary Brown—

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Even John Turner would have trouble.

Senator Frith: Or Dennis McDermott.

Senator Phillips: —making the list. John Turner wouldn't even get a royal commission.

I know this method is used in Germany and is often widely presented, but, honourable senators, I have a hard time accepting Germany as the fountain of democracy. As far as I am concerned, Germany gave us the Anabaptists and the Nazis, neither of which were interested in democratic government.

After the leader has selected them, the candidates can be approved or rejected by the public. In Russia, the Secretary of the Communist Party selects the candidates and says: You can have an election; you can approve them or reject them. We are getting dangerously close to that in some of Senator Roblin's suggestions.

The next one was transferral of votes. That is a unique idea. That means the losers win; the guy with the least votes is elected. Canadians often look around for something unique and distinctively Canadian, but I really do not think that Canadians want to be so distinctive as to adopt the motto: The last shall be first, and the first shall be last.

Honourable senators, in following Senator Roblin's argument, we have gone full circle. We started out with an appointed body, got to an elected body, and have now retreated back to just one minor difference—that is, the leader selects the candidates, and you can approve them or reject them. I wonder if it is worth our while neglecting all the problems facing this country and discussing an elected Senate just for that minor distinction.

Now, I do not want to forget the seconder of the motion.

Senator Marshall: Who is the seconder?

Senator Phillips: Senator Deschatelets.

• (1510)

If Barnum and Bailey had seen Senator Deschatelets coming in this case, they would not have said they needed a sucker every minute but they would have said once a week would do.

Quebec has traditionally guarded its special status within Confederation. As I said earlier, it has 23 per cent of the vote in this chamber. Once we start discussing an elected Senate, then discussion turns to so many from each province—or state, as in the United States. I note that the seconder has not spoken on the motion yet, and I hope he will tell us how he explains that to Quebec.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: I am waiting for Senator Frith.

Senator Phillips: In a rather lighthearted mood, I should like to ask the mover and the seconder of the motion which of the senators in Quebec they want to dispense with. If one is Senator Flynn, there are certain merits to that idea; if another is Senator Lamontagne, there may be even more merit to that idea.

I mentioned earlier the United States Senate and their method of—

Senator Deschatelets: May I ask Senator Phillips a question before he goes any further?

Senator Phillips: I am not sure that I can enlighten the honourable senator but—

Senator Deschatelets: I am looking for enlightenment.

Senator Phillips: That is obvious, and I will try to help you.

Senator Deschatelets: You are taking it for granted that if Senator Roblin's proposal for an elected Senate were to come forward that Quebec would lose one seat. It would have 23 per cent of the seats. I cannot understand why Quebec could not keep its 24 seats if there were an elected Senate.

Senator Phillips: I said that Quebec had 23 per cent of the seats. Senator Deschatelets' question, if I understand it correctly, is why Quebec would not keep the present 24 seats. If you look at western Canada you will understand that they would want to have the number of senators from each province more evenly balanced than it presently is. That is why I was saying you would lose seats.

I was about to mention the American system, where they have two senators from each state. As honourable senators are aware, the Americans changed their system a number of years ago from an appointed Senate to an elected Senate. Senator Roblin's supporters in the other place are well aware that the Senate was not long in surpassing the House of Representatives as the more important body in the American Congress, and the same would happen in our Parliament. One would think that the Americans had solved all their problems on transportation, regional development and alienation of various regions because they have been electing senators for a long time. According to Senator Roblin, that is the solution. The Americans have had every problem that Canada has had except the language problem. A similar problem is developing rapidly in the United States, but it involves Spanish instead of French.

I recall being in Florida during a break from our pleasant Ottawa winters and the Americans were lining up for gas. The complaints there were that the people in New York and Chicago were burning gas coming from the southern United States, just as in Canada westerners are complaining that the easterners are burning their gas.

When I was a member of the House of Commons I drove to Prince Edward Island through Maine to visit my sister in Boston. The complaints I heard in Maine and in Massachusetts made me think of the complaints I heard back home in the Atlantic provinces. An elected Senate had not changed their complaints any, and the southern United States are just as much against the northern United States as the west is against the east in Canada.

Honourable senators will recall an advertisement sponsored by the Democratic Party in the United States when Senator Barry Goldwater was a presidential candidate. That advertisement quoted Senator Goldwater as saying there are times when he would like to take a saw, and saw off the eastern seaboard of the United States. It depicted a saw doing that very thing. Needless to say, Senator Goldwater did not carry the Atlantic states, but he did very well on the west coast and this reminds me of east-west alienation in Canada. Again, honourable senators, an elected Senate did not cure that problem.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to go on too long, but I would suggest that while we are discussing an elected Senate we might pause and reflect on making this chamber a little more functional. One of my suggestions is that the sittings be a little longer. We now see senators arriving at 7.30 on Tuesday evening and looking at the clock at 2.15 on Thursday afternoon ready to leave. I think we could extend our sitting hours, thereby spending more time in the chamber.

We could dispense with a little bit of party discipline. I will be a Conservative and honourable senators on the other side will be Liberals, but it was a mistake to pay the whips because they are becoming too vigorous and too efficient. I should like to see more people voting for or against legislation without having party affiliation influencing them.

When I was appointed to this chamber I advocated that the provinces make a certain percentage of the appointments. At that time I was thinking in the range of 25 to 40 per cent. Since that time, largely on the basis of the Parti Québecois government, I have changed my opinion in that regard. However, the federal government can consult the provinces on appointments. It could be done in a manner similar to that of attorneys general being consulted respecting appointments to the bench. Perhaps appointments to this chamber could be made on the same basis as appointments to the Dutch Senate, where they are made on the basis of the general vote in the last election. If the Conservatives and the Liberals were each to receive 35 per cent of the total vote, they would then each receive one-third of the appointments made for that four-year period.

At one time, I recommended that senators be prohibited from attending caucus because I could not see any great advantage being derived from their being committed to a piece of legislation and, at the same time, attempting to review that legislation in this chamber. Recent events in the Liberal caucus have caused me to reconsider that view. I cannot say that I have come up with a perfect solution to this dilemma.

Senator McElman is attempting to persuade the Liberal Party to retain the principle of universality. I do not know whether he will be successful in that endeavour, but, at least, he went to caucus and made that argument, and I give him full credit for that.

I have asked the mover for his reasons in support of an elected Senate, and if good reasons are given, I will consider them. However, I am not going to beat a drum, dance around the fire and say that we should have an elected Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Would Senator Phillips permit a question?

Senator Phillips: Certainly.

Senator Riley: Before I pose my question, I should like to congratulate Senator Phillips on the clarity and fluency of the speech he has just made.

Regretfully, I missed the first part of his speech, and I should like to know if he suggested to the deputy leader that we be divided into small groups and sent to Australia for four or five days with a view to assessing the prospects for an elected Senate in Canada.

Senator Frith: Senator Phillips did suggest that.

Senator Phillips: I did suggest that it was only fair that those opposed and those in favour of an elected Senate be given that opportunity. Senator Riley's question has reinforced my suggestion.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, since there seems to be some duplication between Orders Nos. 11 and 16, and since Senator Frith has indicated that he will comment on the Australian trip in the course of the debate on Order No. 16, should we, at this point, adjourn the debate on Order No. 11 or dispose of it in some other way?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Marshall correctly observes that there is some overlapping of those two orders in that both deal with the question of Senate reform.

I think Senator Lamontagne's inquiry, respecting the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution," was the first to appear on the Order Paper. Then Senator Roblin, wishing to focus on the question of Senate reform, particularly the subject of an elected Senate, presented the motion which appears as Order No. 11 on the Order Paper.

I agree that there may be some redundancy, but I choose to make my intervention—which will only partly be based on the trip to Australia—on the basis of Senator Lamontagne's inquiry because I intend to refer to the committee report. However, I could just as easily make my intervention in the debate on Senator Roblin's motion.

Nonetheless, I think it would be worthwhile to retain both items on the Order Paper a little longer since Senator Deschatelets has said that he wishes to intervene in the debate on Order No. 11, but only after I have made my intervention on Order No. 16.

Senator Macquarrie: We are all waiting.

Senator Frith: I hope it will be next week.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 30, 1982, at 8 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1983

November 25, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983 were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Monday, November 8, 1982, examined the said Supplementary Estimates (B) and reports as follows:

The Committee was authorized by the Senate as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of November 8, 1982, to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983.

In obedience to the foregoing, your Committee examined the Supplementary Estimates (B) and heard evidence from the following: From the Treasury Board: Mr. J. L. Manion, Secretary; Mr. D. J. McEachran, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch; Mr. H. J. Mullington, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch; and Mr. E. R. Stimpson, Director General, Budget Co-ordination Group, Program Branch.

Supplementary Estimates (B) totalling $5,326 million, is the first "regular" Supplementary for the fiscal year 1982-83 and brings the total 1982-83 Estimates tabled to date to $79,593 million. Of the total $5,326 million contained in these Estimates, $3,411 million represent the net adjustment to items with a statutory authority. These payments are non-discretionary in nature. The remaining $1,915 million represent new spending authorities that Parliament is being asked to approve.

Treasury Board supplied the Committee with a list for the $1 Votes included in these Estimates which is attached as an Appendix to this Report.

The Committee was particularly concerned that allocations of $200 million to The de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Limited, $200 million to Canadair Limited and $25 million to Canertech Inc. were made as budgetary items rather than being recorded as equity on the books of the Government of Canada. Because of this, these payments are not recoverable by the government but show as equity on the books of the respective companies.

Using The de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Limited, Canadair Limited and Canertech Inc. as examples, the Committee expressed concern with the rationale used by the government for committing public funds to private companies and Crown Corporations. Witnesses were questioned whether the government seeks advice from banks or accounting firms associated with these companies regarding their ability to generate profits in the foreseeable future before committing public funds.

Regarding companies such as The de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Limited and Canadair Limited, which are wholly owned by the Government of Canada, witnesses were asked what control the government exercises over them and why they are not considered Crown Corporations. The Committee was told that the Government of Canada is considered the only shareholder of these companies and that the responsible minister "elects" the Boards of Directors. The Committee also learned that when these two companies were acquired, the intention was to return them to the private sector as soon as possible. For this reason, the government resisted listing them as Crown Corporations.

On the matter of Letters of Comfort, the Committee questioned the propriety of these letters being treated as government guarantees rather than indications that the government would undertake to seek parliamentary approval should financial assistance be required. The Committee also indicated that some analysis of the financial soundness of the companies in question should be undertaken before Letters of Comfort are issued.

The Committee expressed difficulty understanding some parts of the Estimates as currently produced. As an example, some members indicated that when funds are transferred from one department to another, an amount is shown under the receiving department but not under the losing department. The witness undertook to look into this and determine if this could be rectified.

The Committee questioned the witness on the fact that under the Petroleum Incentives Payments, exploration on Canada lands is rewarded more heavily than explorations on provincial lands. The Committee was told that the intention of the government was to emphasize frontier exploration and that lands that potentially contain oil tend, generally, to be the frontier areas which are Canada lands. Some members indicated the inconsistency of this, since the Hibernia oil fields are currently funded as Canada lands, and should the courts rule in favour of Newfoundland, they would receive a lower level of funding as provincial lands.

Finally, the Committee expressed concern for the lessening of the ability of the federal government to coordinate its regional development programs as a result of the dispersal of the activities of the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion among other departments. While the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion would be responsible for regional industrial development, it would not exercise any control over the regional activities of specific departments such as the Department of Agriculture.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman.

APPENDIX TO REPORT

LIST OF ONE DOLLAR VOTES INCLUDED IN
SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B), 1982-83

The 6 One Dollar Votes included in these Estimates are listed below by ministry and agency along with the page number where each vote may be located in the Estimates.

These One Dollar Votes are grouped below into categories according to their prime purpose. The category for each vote has been designated by an "X".

A. Three votes which authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates).

B. Three votes which authorize the payment of grants. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates).

BUDGET TAX MEASURES

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the following:
> (i) Budget tax changes proposed by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on June 28, 1982, and the impact thereof on taxpayers;
> (ii) the statement of the Minister of Finance to the House of Commons on October 27, 1982, on the economic outlook and financial position of the Government of Canada; and
> (iii) any bills and other matters relating to the Budget tax changes in advance of their coming before the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

NOTICE OF MOTION RE CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), I move:

> That the name of the Honourable Senator Hastings be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Buckwold on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

An Hon. Senator: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is not granted.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Hon. Jack Marshall, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to examine and consider the Annual Report of the Department of Veterans Affairs for the fiscal year ended 31st March, 1982, tabled in the Senate on 25th November, 1982.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONFERENCE IN GENEVA

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he give us a brief report on the GATT conference which was held in Geneva last week?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators, I am not in a position to give a report. However, if the Minister of External Affairs, who led the delegation, has prepared a report, I will put that before you. I will give that undertaking. If no report is forthcoming, I shall ask the minister responsible if some documentation will be available soon that would serve to respond to my honourable friend's question.

Senator Asselin: If the leader intends to bring such a report to the Senate, will he assure us that a copy will be given to the opposition in advance so that we can formulate a reply to it?

Senator Olson: Yes, if such a report is forthcoming, and I intend to make a statement with respect to it, I shall try to make sure honourable senators opposite have a copy in advance.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I direct a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government? When he reports to the house will he be kind enough to give us the fullest statement possible respecting the decision, or lack of decision, covering international trade in agricultural products?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure I understand the purport of that question, because the members of this government automatically give the fullest possible reports on all matters.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: Perhaps I did not quite focus on the point my honourable friend was trying to make. There are certainly some areas, especially with respect to agriculture, in which we are dealing with matters of opinion as opposed to matters of fact, depending on what interpretation is put on the conference.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that what I am looking for is the opinion of the Canadian government on what went on in respect of agricultural products. If he could add a few facts as well, that would certainly be helpful.

Senator Olson: I now have a better understanding of what is wanted.

THE ECONOMY

ALLEGED OVERPRICING OF UNLEADED GASOLINE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last week Environment Canada leaked a report which said that the oil companies were charging excessive prices—about 12 cents a gallon too much for unleaded gasoline. In view of the fact that one government department says, "Our oil company is charging our customers too much for our gasoline," would our government request our oil company to lower our prices?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I do not accept the preamble to the question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is ours.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is yours. It is your preamble.

Senator Olson: I do not accept as a fact that the Department of the Environment leaked a report for the purpose of stimulating public discussion. I simply cannot accept that, although that may be the opinion of my honourable friend. With respect to the other part of my friend's question, I will look carefully at tomorrow's Hansard to make sure I understand what he is asking and then I will try to give him a reply.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You will catch on.

Senator Flynn: You should always do that.

SPORT

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR AMATEUR ATHLETICS—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport. As a result of the 1979 agreement between the federal and the provincial governments, the sum of $12 million per year, indexed to 1979 levels, was supposed to go to the federal government for distribution to fitness and amateur sports groups.

Can the minister give us a list of the various amateur athletic groups that have received the benefit of that arrangement, and can he give us the dollar amount involved for each group?

• (2010)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, the agreement that was entered into between the Clark government and the provinces with respect to lotteries in this country was, in my view, most unfortunate—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: —for the cause of sport in Canada.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You did not say that at the time.

Senator Perrault: Had federal jurisdiction been retained with respect to lotteries, I suggest, with confidence, that we would now have many millions of dollars available for worthwhile sport and fitness endeavours from coast to coast.

Senator Flynn: Federal dollars are better than provincial dollars.

Senator Perrault: The action taken by the former government was, to say the least, imprudent and improvident. However, that agreement is in place, and it is the desire of the federal government to work co-operatively with the provinces to ensure that the proceeds from lotteries and sports pools benefit Canadians in all provinces.

As far as the allocation of the dollars is concerned, I am in the process of preparing a summary of those expenditures. A question was asked by Mr. Paproski, a well-known Alberta member of the former Conservative government, when I attended a meeting of the committee of the other place recently, in response to which I committed myself to the production of those figures.

Reports of that exchange appeared in newspapers. One story I read with amusement was to the effect that the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport did not know where that money went. Of course, I did not have a list of those expenditures before me when I attended that meeting. I was being candid and forthright when I said that I did not have those figures with me.

Senator Flynn: That is quite a change in attitude.

Senator Perrault: Any suggestion that the money provided for sport has somehow disappeared into the ozone is completely untrue.

Senator Nurgitz: As a supplementary question, I take it the minister is undertaking to provide the names of the groups that benefited from the arrangement, and the dollar extent of their benefit?

Senator Perrault: We are attempting to ascertain where the dollars were spent, and we committed ourselves—and I use the word "we" meaning the department—to providing Mr. Paproski with the information he requested at that committee meeting.

Senator Nurgitz: As a further supplementary question, I take it that when the minister appeared before the committee of the other place it was indicated that the funds raised by the lotteries had found their way into the general revenue as opposed to a designated fund for distribution to these various groups? Is it the minister's understanding now that from 1983 forward these funds will not—that is, the $12 million indexed to 1979 levels—find their way into the general revenue, but will find their way directly to the various sports groups?

Senator Perrault: First of all, I assure honourable senators that there has been no diversion of funds. Some of the sports pool revenues as a result of the 1979 agreement was put into the general revenue, but a large amount of the money has been spent on sports activities since that date. An example of that is the commitment of up to $200 million to the Winter Olympic Games to be held in Calgary. That is a substantial commitment, and is certainly a demonstration of good faith on the part of this government.

Furthermore, I wish to add, honourable senators, that the Calgary—

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Perrault: —Winter Olympic Games will see up to $200 million invested in non-discretionary amounts by various government departments. It is really a massive commitment on the part of the federal government.

Senator Flynn: We are not asking you anything about that.

Senator Perrault: There has been no diversion of moneys.

A report is now being prepared by officials of the department, and as soon as it is completed I will present it to the Senate.

● (2015)

Senator Nurgitz: I have a final supplementary question, and I shall try to make it simple.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It will not change the reply.

Senator Nurgitz: The fact is that initially the funds went into the general revenue. My question to the minister is: From 1983 forward, will the funds go into the general revenue and then be distributed to the various sports groups, or will they be held in a separate fund for the groups for whom they are intended?

Senator Perrault: The future policy is in the process of development.

Hon. Lowell Murray: So is the future.

Senator Perrault: Personally, I hold the view, which is probably shared by the senator who has a great interest in sports and fitness, that far more should be spent on fitness programs in this nation. Fitness is the best preventive medicine there is. Millions of dollars are spent every year in this country to meet the costs of social problems which are the results of an unfit population.

Senator Flynn: Let us speak of social programs now.

Senator Perrault: I hope that more than the technical amount realized from that 1979 agreement can be spent on promoting fitness.

Senator Nurgitz: May I take it then that the minister is stating that the funds will not go into the general revenue?

Senator Perrault: I will make a statement, and I know it will be heartening to all honourable senators. Indeed even the cynical Leader of the Opposition will take joy from it.

Senator Flynn: The more he talks the less sense he makes.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

CANADIAN BROCHURES POSTED IN UNITED STATES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the initiative taken by the Stratford Festival to mail 85,000 brochures in Detroit, thereby saving $75,000. Would the Leader of the Government advise us if it is legal for Canadians to mail brochures or letters across the border?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to take that question as notice. First of all, Senator Marshall asked for a legal opinion which, of course, ministers are more or less prevented from offering even if they know—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Unless it serves their purpose.

Senator Olson: Even when the Leader of the Opposition was the Minister of Justice, and the legal adviser to the government, he consistently and, quite properly, refrained from giving a legal opinion until he—

Senator Flynn: You cannot prove that.

Senator Olson: Well, I used to sit over there and ask these questions.

Senator Flynn: But you have a very poor memory.

Senator Olson: The deputy leader, who was rather astute at asking those questions, almost invariably got the same reply that I am giving now. I have had a good teacher.

Senator Flynn: I challenge you to find that in Hansard.

Senator Olson: In any event, regardless of Senator Flynn's objection, I will take the question as notice. I am not sure that I will provide a legal opinion, but I should like to hear from the minister who answers for that crown corporation before replying.

Senator Marshall: Christmas is close at hand. If the Leader of the Government is advised that it is legal to go across the border and buy a stamp for 20 cents instead of 30 cents will the government spend some of their millions of advertising dollars in so notifying Canadians, especially those of low income, before they mail their Christmas cards?

Senator Olson: I could not give that undertaking.

Senator Flynn: For once he is giving us a short answer.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SOUTH AFRICA—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a brief question for the Deputy Leader of the Government who undertook on December 16, 1981, and again on June 3, 1982, to furnish the Senate with information concerning arms exports. This information is especially relevant today, when we are continually reading of problems in various parts of the world, and of Canadian firms not only exporting products that are used for arms but also receiving government grants to do it. Would the deputy leader advise as to which year we may expect that answer.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot do that, because ever since Senator Nurgitz first raised that question I have been trying to get an answer to it. I cannot make a prediction as to when I will be able to respond to that question. However, it was my understanding last week that a question of security clearance arose in respect to some of the details requested.

Every week I wonder when Senator Nurgitz will ask this question again since it is perfectly reasonable for him to have become impatient. I can only say that I am still trying to obtain an answer to his question.

ATLANTIC REGION—PROPOSED VETERINARY COLLEGE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several delayed answers to questions, the first of which is in response to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on October 26, which contained allegations that the federal government was stalling and never intended funding the veterinary college in Charlottetown.

Honourable senators, it is a relatively short answer, but I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The facts in this case are quite different. The federal government did offer to make a contribution towards the capital costs of the proposed veterinary college. However, the federal government was unable to do so because of the lack of unanimity amongst the four Atlantic provinces as to the location of this institution.

While Premiers Lee and Buchanan have signed an agreement which is full of conditions, Premier Buchanan has not provided the national government with a statement of his position. Before committing federal funds for this project, the government would like to have Premier Buchanan's full support without conditions and agreement from the other three provinces.

NEWFOUNDLAND—OFFSHORE RESOURCES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a further delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Doody on November 23 and 24 concerning whether the federal government was either considering or re-considering its position on the offshore situation.

The answer is that in his letter to Mr. James Thoms, Editor in Chief of the St. John's Daily News, the Prime Minister stated that he has "always believed that a negotiated settlement is possible and certainly desirable" and that, given the fact that the Supreme Court hearing has been set back to February 22, both he and Premier Peckford have yet another chance to review their positions.

If honourable senators so desire, I would be pleased to have the text of the Prime Minister's letter to Mr. Thoms incorporated as part of the answer.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The letter follows:)

Mr. James Thoms
Editor in Chief
The Daily News
P.O. Box 8855
St. John's (Newfoundland)

Dear Mr. Thoms:

Thank you for your telex of November 2, 1982 concerning the offshore negotiations. As you know Premier Peckford and I met on October 1st to see if there was a basis for renewing negotiations. To my very deep regret, the Premier and I found no such basis although I indicated that I felt it would be helpful to have our officials continue discussion at least on the revenue sharing concept where it is obvious that there are technical differences of view which they should be able to resolve easily.

Since the Supreme Court hearing has been set back to February 22, I believe that we have yet another chance to review our positions. I am doing so now and hope that Premier Peckford is as well. I have always believed a negotiated settlement is possible and certainly desirable. The federal government remains ready to meet at anytime and in any place to continue discussions on the offshore.

If negotiations or discussions are not resumed prior to a Supreme Court ruling, the federal government will be ready to meet the provincial government immediately upon a court decision regardless of what that decision may be. A legal resolution will not in itself get development under way. Co-operation between governments is necessary no matter who owns the offshore.

I cannot respond to your questions concerning Premier Peckford's attitudes or strategy in negotiations. The federal government would like to have a negotiated settlement as soon as possible because we believe it would be good for the poeple of Newfoundland and Labrador and for all Canadians. Whether an offshore settlement is possible in the near term will not deter my ministers from pursuing all avenues to assist Newfoundlanders in their proud efforts to achieve economic and social progress.

Yours sincerely,
Pierre Elliott Trudeau

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—CANADA-FRANCE MARITIME BOUNDARY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I have a relatively short response to a question asked by Senator Marshall on November 24 as to whether discussions were held dealing with Canada's position concerning St. Pierre and Miquelon during the Prime Minister's recent visit to France.

Honourable senators, the Prime Minister discussed the Canada-France maritime boundary problem with the President of France during his visit to that country. It was agreed that there be an early resumption of negotiations relating to the St. Pierre and Miquelon situation. It is expected that negotiations will resume before the end of January 1983.

Hon. Martial Asselin: An invasion in the future?

Hon. Jack Marshall: On that particular question, would the Leader of the Government furnish this chamber with a list of those negotiating on behalf of the Canadian and French governments?

Senator Olson: It is my opinion that the ministers are the persons responsible, and I am not sure whether it is the practice to name all those who assist. In any event, I shall take the question as notice.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DEFINITION OF "LETTER"

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question asked by Senator Roblin on November 24 concerning possible parliamentary debate over the regulation providing the definition of "letter". I ask that this answer be incorporated in Hansard as though it had been read.

● (2025)

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The government has not changed its position respecting the confidentiality of correspondence between the Canada Post Corporation and interested parties with regard to the definition of "letter".

The government considers that the procedure being followed by the Canada Post Corporation allows for the protection of the public interest. This process involves the publication of a proposed regulation, public comment, discussion and consultation, amendment by the corporation and submission of the amended version to the Governor in Council. Cabinet has 60 days within which to review and either accept or reject the proposal. In this case, the Governor in Council rejected the proposal which would seem to indicate that the system is working.

Therefore, a full parliamentary debate is not being contemplated at the present moment. Senator Roblin is of course free as a legislator to introduce debate on the subject in the Senate through an inquiry, a motion or even an amending bill should he wish to do so.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF BP CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a relatively short answer to a question which was asked by Senator Murray on November 24 concerning the relationship between Petro-Canada and the Governor in Council. The question had to do with terms of reference, among other things.

If Senator Murray looks at the Petro-Canada Act, he will find that the role of the Governor in Council is specified in many clauses. In particular, I would encourage him to look at sections 2, 5(2), 7(2), 7(3), 7(4), 7(5), 8(1), 8(2), 8(3), 9(1), 10(2) 11 and 13(1).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The answer you are giving is more a legal opinion.

Senator Olson: If Senator Murray, after he has studied all of those sections, which do, in fact, explain in some detail the relationship between the Governor in Council and Petro-Canada, has any further question in his mind I shall be glad to try to answer it.

Hon. Lowell Murray: One is accustomed to the instinctive answers of the smart-alecs who advise the minister on questions that are put in this chamber. One understands less well the tendency of the minister to make himself the echo of or the sounding board for that kind of reply.

The question that I put to the minister, which was also put by Senator Smith in a supplementary, was directed at finding out whether the transaction involving Petro-Canada and BP Canada was or was not approved by the Governor in Council. A simple yes or no would have sufficed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can get that kind of an answer for Senator Murray if he would contain himself slightly and ask the question in those terms. Of course, he did not do so. If he wants to draw in all kinds of "if" and "if not" insinuations, then, of course, it becomes necessary to be precise in the reply to his question.

Senator Flynn: But you were not precise.

Senator Olson: I have been very precise in offering him and identifying for him the clauses that he can read with respect to the legal connection between the Governor in Council and Petro-Canada.

Senator Flynn: But you did not reply to the question.

Senator Olson: It may be a bit of backfiring on this so-called smart-alec attitude. I am sorry if that happens to Senator Murray, but if he wants to ask questions which require precise and accurate answers, then he will have to expect precise and exact answers.

Senator Flynn: There is no guarantee of that with you.

AIRLINES

QUEBECAIR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question which was asked by Senator Tremblay on November 25 concerning a clarification of the Quebecair proposal made by the Minister of Transport to the Government of Quebec.

Honourable senators, last Thursday the Minister of Transport sent a supplementary telex to Mr. Michel Clair, Minister of Transport of the Province of Quebec, providing the clarification asked for by Mr. Clair.

I would like to have that telex incorporated as part of this answer, since it clears up many of the grey areas alluded to by Senator Tremblay in his question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

November 25, 1982

TELEX—IMMEDIATE DISPATCH

The Honourable Michel Clair

Minister of Transport

Government of Quebec

Édifice du Parlement

Québec (Québec)

Further to our telephone conversation of Tuesday, I think it is important to reiterate my position on those matters you raised re the proposal to create Quebecair 2.

With regard to its role, the new airline will serve both jet and non-jet routes. My telex of 22 November referred to the need for some rationalization of intra-provincial routes. I subsequently stated publicly that this applied specifically to Air Canada routes; that was one of the reasons for my insistence that Air Canada play a major role, particularly in Quebecair 2's establishment and in the initial phase of its operations, otherwise acceptance of the changes in the communities affected might not be forthcoming.

In response to the concerns you expressed about the nature and extent of Air Canada's role, a removal of the management of Quebecair by Air Canada is not intended. What will be required is the integration of a very limited number of executives from Air Canada with Quebecair's management.

You also asked me if I would consider agreeing to the reorganization of the present Quebecair rather than establishing Quebecair 2. You claim this could be done without placing the carrier in such a poor financial and operational position that it would have no hope of being a viable company. In my view, this would not be possible, taking into consideration the heavy debts and obligations of Quebecair. Indeed, your statement that your government has actually committed some $28m to Quebecair only fortifies my conclusion that a restructuring of the present Quebecair is not the solution.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 23, the debate on the motion of Senator Barrow for the second reading of Bill C-90, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would first thank Senator Barrow for the explanation he gave when he moved the second reading of this bill. In his remarks, he divided the bill into a number of sections: a no-tariff classification, the general preferential tariff; provisions respecting goods for the use of the disabled; the reduction or removal of duty on goods used by dentists or dental laboratories; provisions respecting metrication; and the Canada-New Zealand Trade Agreement.

Our customs tariffs are becoming fairly lengthy in their descriptions. We now have the British Preferential Tariff and the General Preferential Tariff. The new sections now bring us up to five, I believe. Soon we shall need a computer to keep track of the tariff classifications.

Honourable senators, I should like to touch briefly on each of the five points mentioned by Senator Barrow. The first is the Canada-New Zealand Trade Agreement, which replaces an agreement that came into effect approximately 50 years ago. Our trade with New Zealand, from the point of view of our exports and imports, does not represent a large portion of our trade in general. In 1979 we exported $90 million to New Zealand, and we imported $135 million. However, most of our imports comprised mutton being shipped into Canada and then transshipped to the United States.

Canada, as honourable senators know, has a quota of meat exports to the United States, and I would ask the honourable senator who sponsored the bill to explain the relationship to our quota of the transshipment of meat into the United States. Canadian producers of mutton and lamb were concerned about the large shipments of chilled lamb entering Canada, and an agreement was reached with the New Zealand producers whereby we now have a quota from that country. I believe that the quota was determined by negotiation between producer organizations in Canada and their counterparts in New Zealand, rather than on a government-to-government basis. However, that agreement expires within the next year, and perhaps the sponsor could tell us what stage the negotiations have reached at present.

Honourable senators, before leaving the Canada-New Zealand Trade Agreement, I should mention that it is most unusual to have a trade agreement bootlegged in with amendments to the Customs Tariff. Perhaps there is a logical reason for that. I do not recall that the sponsor explained to us why that is part of this bill to amend the Customs Tariff. Perhaps he could mention that when he closes the debate.

The next section deals with so-called concessions to developing nations. I have no objection to that part of the bill, but there are a couple of situations on which we should have some clarification. First, as to the criteria for establishing a developing nation, which countries will be considered to be developing and which will be considered as having progressed sufficiently that they no longer have the advantage of that classification? Secondly, as to the provision for goods partially produced in one developing country, and transferred to a second developing country, I am wondering which countries would be available for this type of transshipment of goods and how the goods would be stamped when they arrived in Canada. Would it be the country of origin or the country in which the goods are completed? That would be of importance to tourists. When they choose their souvenirs they will want to know whether they were made in Upper Volta or Kenya. The souvenirs would probably be stamped with the names of both countries.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Or P.E.I.

Senator Phillips: The bill provides for the duty-free entry of certain goods for the disabled. Of course, I have no objection to this type of provision. However, there is one matter that causes me some concern. Certain articles will be subject to duty if similar goods are produced in Canada. A paraplegic who suffers a disability as a result of an accident may have far better use of his arms than a paraplegic who suffers a disability as a result of muscular dystrophy. Yet the type of goods necessary for someone who suffers from muscular dystrophy may be produced in Canada, and those items will not have the advantage of duty-free entry into Canada. Therefore, I hope that officials of Revenue Canada will give the greatest consideration to the need of the patient rather than the type of goods produced in Canada.

[Senator Phillips.]

The provision dealing with dental goods has been on the agenda several times during the past few years. It came about following an appeal of the Dental Association to the Tariff Board. The board ruled that the duty on dental goods had been collected illegally for several years, largely to justifiy the bureaucrats who had made the error in the first place. We now find a little movement away from that ruling.

I would point out, honourable senators, that dental products are, in the main, still taxed. For instance, the amalgam used in the so-called silver fillings is still subject to duty, while a number of prostheses may be brought in duty-free. It is not that the amount of the duty charged is excessive—at least, I never considered it to be—but there is always the difficulty that someone has to go to the Customs premises on Walkley Road and spend approximately two hours to pick up something on which there perhaps may be duty payable of 80 cents. It was the waste of time involved more than the duty charged that has been a problem for the dentist.

The section dealing with metrication should be handled with care, because our greatest trading partner is the United States. As honourable senators are aware, the United States has backed away considerably from the move toward metrication, and I doubt very much whether they will ever complete it. In my view, this matter has to be handled with care.

Approximately two weeks ago I enjoyed an item that appeared in the press referring to the Guy Favreau Centre in Montreal. Apparently the washrooms in that building were to be finished in tile, and the specifications were given in metric. Apparently, true metric tile is 100 centimetres by 100 centimetres, but the only tile made in Canada was 104 centimetres by 104 centimetres. So we imported the tile from Japan because it was true metric measurement, and we laid off 55 people in the only company in Montreal that manufactured tile. That is what I mean by using a certain amount of discretion.

Bill C-90 also lists new tariff items on canned fish, which I know will be of interest to the sponsor of the bill. I believe those tariffs were originally removed during this session and they are now being reinstated. In fact, I believe the late Senator John Connolly sponsored that bill during this session. I would like the sponsor of this bill to tell me how these new tariffs relate to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. If I may say so, I am quite happy to see these new tariffs in place because I think our fisheries need more protection. I understand that the bill was before the committee in February, and I see no great need for the same bill to go back to the same committee.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Barrow speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Phillips for his remarks concerning Bill C-90. I am not sure that the agreement with New Zealand covers the matter of the transshipment of mutton to the United States. However, I would be glad to look into the matter and bring it to the attention of this house on third reading of the bill.

With respect to the honourable senator's question concerning developing countries, there is a list of least developed countries put out by the United Nations. There are approximately 30 countries on the list. I would be glad to read them out, but I do not think it would add anything to the debate.

As to the matter of canned fish, although this measure has been imposed, I am informed that the amount of canned fish brought into Canada is comparatively small and does not form a large part of our imports.

Senator Phillips also raised a matter concerning metrication. This point was also raised in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The minister replied to this, and I will just indicate what he said by paraphrasing one or two paragraphs. The only complaints that have been received with regard to metrication are in those areas, such as sugar and textiles, where complete industry conversion has already taken place and they were complaining that they must convert metric units to imperial units for customs purposes. This reply was given to Senator Hayden on June 16.

Honourable senators, those are all the comments I have to make at this point.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Barrow: I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA EVIDENCE BILL, 1982

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. P. Derek Lewis moved the second reading of Bill S-33, to give effect, for Canada, to the Uniform Evidence Act adopted by the Uniform Law Conference of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, it is with pleasure that I rise to move second reading of Bill S-33, the Canada Evidence Bill. I commend this bill to you as an extremely important piece of legislation. The primary function of the Canada Evidence Act is to prescribe the rules of evidence in criminal cases. It is a mark of democracy that those rules ensure a fair balance between the interests of the state in having an effective fact-finding procedure and the interests of the individual is not being deprived of his liberty on insubstantial proof or by unjust means. It is appropriate that this legislation should come before us in the same year that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms was incorporated into our Constitution.

It is a hard-won principle of our system of justice that political considerations have no part to play in proceedings before the courts, and a corollary of that principle, in my view, is that the rules of evidence should not be based upon political or economic dogma, but rather upon principles of common sense, justice and fairness. Accordingly, I think it is appropriate that this bill be introduced first in this place, where it can receive a more detached and thorough consideration.

There can be no doubt that the law of evidence is in need of reform. It has become one of the most technical subjects, with rules and exceptions, and exceptions to the exceptions. Some indication of its complexity can be gathered from the fact that a leading text, Wigmore on Evidence, comprises 11 volumes and occupies a full two feet of shelf space.

The law of evidence is also out of date, for it is based on social conditions that were current in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and it fails to take into account the dramatic changes that have taken place in recent years in relation to the general level of education, the status of women, the place of religion, the mobility of society and the revolution in business practices due to the advent of high-speed communications, photocopying and electronic data processing.

The core of the present Canada Evidence Act dates back to 1893, and while Parliament has introduced amendments from time to time on a piecemeal basis, those amendments often have resulted in legislative overlaps and confusion as to which section actually applies. The scene is further complicated by the fact that there is evidence legislation at both the federal and the provincial levels, and there is no uniformity of legislation between provinces or between provinces and the federal government.

To a greater or lesser extent, every common law country shares these problems and over the past two decades there has been a great deal of effort put into the reform of the law of evidence in the United States, Great Britain and Australia. Significant strides have been made, not only in terms of studying the problems and identifying options but also in terms of implementation of new legislation. The need for a review of the law of evidence was recognized by the Minister of Justice as far back as 1971, when he referred the subject to the Law Reform Commission of Canada for study and report. The commission submitted its report in December 1975, recommending the adoption of an evidence code that would have replaced the common law entirely and would have dealt with many problems simply by leaving the matter up to the discretion of the judge in the particular case.

The Department of Justice carried out consultations with the bench and bar across Canada to determine their reaction to the proposed code. The majority of those who responded tended to react unfavourably. As a result of the consultations it was concluded that the Law Reform Commission code would not serve as a satisfactory replacement for the present Canada Evidence Act.

In the meantime, the Ontario Law Reform Commission had published a report on the provincial law of evidence in which a more traditional type of evidence act was proposed. In an effort to develop rules of evidence that would be acceptable to both the federal and provincial governments, the Ministers of Justice and Attorneys General in June 1977 decided to approach the Uniform Law Conference of Canada to see whether it would be interested in acting as a non-partisan host for a project to develop a uniform evidence act that could be a model for all jurisdictions to follow.

The Uniform Law Conference of Canada is an independent body comprising legal experts from both the public and private sectors and was established to promote uniformity of legislation. The Deputy Ministers of Justice and the Deputy Attorneys General are ex officio members. The conference accepted this challenge at its annual meeting in 1977 and established the federal-provincial task force on uniform rules of evidence. The task force had representation from the federal Department of Justice and the Provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia. Its mandate was to state the present law and to examine the recent reports on evidence by the Law Reform Commissions of Canada and Ontario, and other such reports and legislation, with a view to recommending a uniform evidence act. The task force, which was to complete its work and make a final report within three years, submitted its final report and a draft act in January 1981. I have here a copy of that report.

Unlike the evidence code of the Law Reform Commission of Canada, the task force report recommended that, while most rules of evidence should be set out in a uniform evidence act, some rules would be better left to development through the common law. In addition, the common law should continue to serve as a guide to interpreting the new evidence act, and less scope should be given to judicial discretion in the interpretation and application of the rules than was given under the commission's evidence code. With this change of orientation, the task force hoped to meet the principal objections of the bench and the bar to the commission's code.

The report of the task force and the accompanying draft uniform evidence act were considered at a series of special plenary sessions of the Uniform Law Conference held from April to July of 1981. The new uniform evidence act was given formal approval by the Uniform Law Conference at its annual meeting in August of 1981, where it was endorsed by the delegates of every jurisdiction.

The adoption of a uniform act by the Uniform Law Conference does not have any legal significance, but does indicate that, after careful study, experts from across Canada have concluded that the Uniform Act is a good legislative model for member jurisdictions to follow.

[Senator Lewis.]

Action by the federal government is, of course, central to any scheme of uniform legislation in Canada, and a number of provincial Attorneys General have urged the Minister of Justice to move quickly to introduce a new Canada evidence act based on the Uniform Evidence Act so that their provinces can proceed as soon as possible with similar legislation. That is an excellent illustration of what can be done when a spirit of co-operation exists between the federal government and the provinces, and I think that spirit should be encouraged by prompt legislative action on our part.

The Canada Evidence Bill basically follows the Uniform Evidence Act, but some significant changes have had to be made in order to make the bill comply with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and to take into account the evidentiary provisions of the Access to Information Act and the recent amendments to the Criminal Code relating to sexual offences.

A number of minor amendments have been made to eliminate ambiguities, to improve the clarity of certain sections, to fill gaps and to facilitate the application of the legislation.

Finally, special reference has to be made to the French version of the bill. I am given to understand that whereas the English version of the Uniform Evidence Act was drafted by a federal draftsman, the French version was drafted by draftsmen from the Province of Quebec in accordance with the Quebec style of drafting. In order to make the Canada Evidence Bill comply with federal principles of drafting, fairly major reformulation has been necessary.

It is not my intent to go through the bill clause by clause at this time; rather, I propose to deal with what I consider to be the major changes that will be brought about by the adoption of the bill.

First, we have the matter of the burden of proof, which is dealt with in clauses 8 to 15 of the bill. This area of the law has been bedeviled by a plethora of decisions and learned articles which draw fine distinctions and use conflicting nomenclature. The bill clarifies the law by standardizing the terminology and fixing definitions.

From a substantive point of view, the bill preserves the status quo with two exceptions. The first exception is found in clause 12, the first two subclauses of which read as follows:

> 12.(1) The legal burden in a criminal proceeding respecting any exception, excuse, exemption, justification, proviso or qualification that is expressly provided by an enactment in favour of an accused in relation to any particular offence is on the accused and that burden is discharged by proof on a balance of probabilities.
> (2) Subsection (1) does not apply to the defence of provocation in relation to murder or to any defence of general application provided by law.

The typical situation contemplated by clause 12 is one in which the accused has a licence or a permit to do the prohibited act—such as carrying a concealed weapon. It is reasonable to expect an accused to produce a permit, if he has one. On the other hand, because of the similarity of names, it is often almost impossible for the prosecution to prove that an accused does not have a licence or permit. For many years section 730 of the Criminal Code has contained such a provision in summary conviction offences. Logically, there is no reason why the same principle should not apply in proceedings by way of indictment, and clause 12 so provides. The change does not, however, place the burden of proof on the accused with respect to the defence of provocation in a prosecution for murder or with respect to any defence of general applicability.

The second exception is found in clause 13, which deals with the burden of proof as to the mental fitness of the accused to stand trial. Under the present law it is not entirely clear who bears the onus of proof of fitness, or unfitness, and what the standard of proof is. The Uniform Law Conference concluded that this was a basic fact that could and should be established by the prosecution, and clause 13 adopts this position.

With respect to formal admissions, which are contained in clauses 16 and 17 of this bill, sections 582 and 736(5) of the Criminal Code allow the accused "to admit any fact alleged against him for the purpose of dispensing with proof thereof." There is no provision permitting the accused to make an admission that involves a question of law or of mixed law and fact; nor is there any provision to permit admissions by the Crown. These defects are remedied by the bill.

The matter of judicial notice is dealt with in clauses 18 to 21. These clauses do not involve any major change, but they do serve to clarify and rationalize existing law and practice with respect to judicial notice.

Then admissibility is covered in clause 22. At common law, evidence that is relevant is admissible unless it is excluded by some specific rule. According to the Supreme Court of Canada decision in The Queen v. Wray, (1971) S.C.R. 22, the fact that evidence is gained by illegal or improper means does not affect its admissibility. That decision must now be read in the light of section 24(2) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provides that the court shall exclude such evidence if it has been obtained in a manner that has infringed or denied any of the rights or freedoms guaranteed by the charter, and it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, admission of the evidence in the proceeding would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. This principle is specifically incorporated into the Canada Evidence Bill by clause 22(1). The Canada Evidence Bill is, as far as I know, therefore, the first item of federal legislation to reflect the impact of our new Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Turning now to the matter of character evidence in a criminal proceeding, covered by clauses 23 to 32, the law in this area is in a very unsatisfactory state, and this bill proposes some significant changes. The bill retains the basic common law rule that the prosecution cannot adduce evidence of the accused's bad character unless the accused has put his character in issue. Where the accused intends to put his character in issue by adducing evidence of his general reputation in the community, clause 24(2) of the bill requires that he give notice to the court at least seven days before the trial of his intention to do so. This is to allow the prosecution or any co-accused to carry out their own investigations of the accused's reputation in the community so that there will not have to be an adjournment for that purpose part way through the trial.

Secondly, the bill clarifies the scope of the accused's right to call evidence of the victim's reputation, found in clause 28, and, similarly, of the right of the prosecution to rebut such evidence, found in clause 29 of the bill.

The Uniform Evidence Act also included provisions pertaining to the admissibility of character evidence in sexual offences. Similar provisions were considered as part of the Sexual Offences Act, recently adopted by Parliament. As these evidentiary provisions relate to specific offences rather than being general rules of evidence, it was thought that they should be set out in the Criminal Code in the context of those offences rather than in the Canada Evidence Bill.

Turning now to opinion evidence and experts. The major change in this area is the incorporation of a provision similar to that in British Columbia and Nova Scotia which allows the reception in civil cases of a written report of an expert without the necessity of calling the expert. The expert may, of course, be called for examination or cross-examination, but if the court comes to the conclusion that in the circumstances it was unreasonable to require the attendance of the expert, the party calling the expert can be penalized for costs.

Two other changes should be noted. Clause 39 provides that, except with leave of the court, no more than seven witnesses may be called by a party to give expert opinion evidence in a proceeding.

The second change will extend to civil cases a power that a judge already has in criminal cases, namely, to appoint an expert to inquire into and submit a report on any question of fact or opinion reported on by the court-appointed expert.

I now come to the hearsay rule and its exceptions. This is dealt with in clauses 45 to 73 of the bill. This is one of the most complex areas of the law of evidence, and the bill does a great deal to simplify the hearsay rule and to rationalize its exceptions.

The general rule is that a witness may not give evidence of statements made by another person or made by himself on another occasion. There are a number of good reasons for insisting on first-hand evidence whenever it is available, but there are also many cases where the best available evidence is hearsay, so a number of exceptions to the general rule have been created. These exceptions have been developed to meet particular problems rather than to conform with some overriding theory, and as a result they are often inconsistent with each other and thus make the law needlessly complex.

The Canada Evidence Bill would simplify the law in civil proceedings by lumping together a number of the existing exceptions and allowing first-hand hearsay evidence in all cases where the eyewitness is not available to testify.

In criminal proceedings, on the other hand, introduction of such a sweeping principle of admissibility might adversely affect the accused, who should have the right to cross-examine his accusers. Changes to the hearsay rule in criminal proceedings, therefore, have been limited to bringing together the exceptions and rationalizing their conditions of applicability.

One of the most important exceptions to the hearsay rule is the special category comprising statements of the accused to persons in authority. As a condition of the admissibility, the law requires that the prosecution satisfy the court in a voir dire—that is, a trial within a trial in the absence of the jury, if there is one—that the statement was voluntary. But, simple as this may sound, this exception has generated scores, if not hundreds, of precedents interpreting every aspect of it.

This bill retains the basic structure of the exception, but it defines the terms "persons in authority" and "voluntary". It also eliminates three anomalies. First of all, it prohibits questioning the accused during the voir dire as to whether the statement was actually true. This prohibition has a particular importance where the trial is before a judge alone, for recollection of the accused's in-court admission may persist in the mind of the judge even though he has excluded the statement itself.

Secondly, the quantum of proof of voluntariness has been changed from proof beyond reasonable doubt to proof on the balance of probabilities, which is the test applied to other issues of admissibility.

Thirdly, the current rule permitting the reception of such parts of an inadmissible confession as are confirmed by the subsequent finding of objective fact—evidence such as the murder weapon—is repealed. The bill will allow evidence of the accused's knowledge of the whereabouts or conditions of the objective fact evidence but not of any part of the inadmissible statement.

Another important provision deals with evidence given in previous court proceedings. This is covered in clauses 74 to 79. These clauses essentially overrule the famous decision in Hollington v. Hewthorn, an English case, reported at (1943) King's Bench Division, 587, which precludes the plaintiff in a civil case from proving that the defendant had been convicted in a criminal proceeding of doing the very act that forms the substance of the civil action. That rule has long been the object of criticism and has been abrogated by a number of jurisdictions already.

The bill goes one step further, and allows evidence of convictions to be used in subsequent criminal cases in two instances. The first of these is where the accused is charged with the possession of property obtained by the commission of an offence, in which case the bill would permit evidence of the conviction of another person or theft of that property as prima facie proof that the property was stolen.

Secondly, where an accused is charged with being an accessory after the fact of the commission of an offence, evidence of the conviction of another person for the principal offence is admissible as prima facie proof that the offence was committed. Under the current law, the principal offence would have to be proven all over again even though another court had already found someone guilty of the offence beyond a reasonable doubt.

Turning now to the provisions of the bill dealing with alibi evidence, clauses 80 to 85 of the bill. These provisions basically codify the current practice which permits the judge to comment unfavourably upon the failure of the accused to adduce an alibi at the first reasonable opportunity. In addition, however, with respect to proceedings by way of indictment, the bill provides that the accused may not adduce evidence of an alibi at his trial unless he has given notice of it not later than seven days after being committed for trial. This is to avoid trial delays that otherwise would be necessary to allow investigation of the alibi by the prosecution. This requirement can be waived by the prosecution or by the trial court for cause shown.

There are also provisions dealing with competence and compellability, clauses 86 to 95. The main change here is in relation to the competence and compellability of the spouse of the accused. The bill makes the spouse of the accused generally compellable as a witness for the accused, and generally competent, though not compellable, as a witness for the prosecution.

The list of instances in which the spouse is both competent and compellable for the prosecution has been expanded beyond the limits of section 4(2) of the current Canada Evidence Act to include offences such as treason, murder or attempt to commit murder, infanticide, manslaughter, crimes against children under the age of 14 years, and dangerous offender proceedings. In each of these cases, the interest of the state in obtaining the evidence is considered to be superior to the interest in preserving marital harmony.

Closely tied to the spousal competency is the matrimonial communication privilege. At present this privilege applies to all communications made during the marriage, and it entitles the receiver of the communication to refuse to reveal its content in court so long as the marriage persists.

The bill modifies this privilege in clauses 166 to 173 by restricting it to "confidential" communications, by making it the privilege of the utterer rather than the hearer, and by continuing the privilege during the lifetime of the utterer regardless of whether the marriage continues to exist. I understand this has received the approval of organizations concerned with the status of women.

Clauses 96 to 99 deal with oaths or solemn affirmations. These clauses make some minor changes with respect to evidence of children and persons who are mentally infirm. They also eliminate the present anomaly whereby the accused can give evidence at his preliminary inquiry without being sworn.

Clauses 100 to 114 deal with the calling and questioning of witnesses. To a large extent these clauses set out what heretofore have been assorted rules of law and practice. They provide a handy compendium of the rules, none of which represents a major change.

Clauses 115 to 120 present, for the most part, a continuation of existing rules. However, one change of considerable significance is that a previous statement of a witness may be received in evidence for all purposes where it was made under oath or under solemn affirmation and was subject to cross-examination. At the present time a previous statement can only be admitted to test the credibility of the witness.

Clauses 121 to 125, dealing with credibility of witnesses, contain some important changes. First, evidence of reputation will no longer be admissible for the purpose of challenging or supporting the credibility of a witness. Secondly, the accused will no longer be open to unlimited cross-examination with respect to his criminal record. There are exceptions to this where the accused has dropped his shield by giving evidence against a co-accused or by putting his own character in issue, but if these exceptions are not applicable, the bill provides that the accused may be cross-examined only with respect to his record for offences having a direct bearing upon truthfulness, namely, perjury, giving contradictory evidence, or any offence that includes fraud as an essential element.

Having given the accused this measure of protection against the use of his previous criminal record, the Uniform Evidence Act allows the judge and the prosecutor to comment upon failure of the accused to enter the witness box. The Department of Justice believes that this provision may well be inconsistent with the accused's right of silence which is guaranteed by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

This has been the interpretation given by the American courts to their fifth amendment privilege. Therefore, the bill has rejected the comment provision in the Uniform Evidence Act and has adopted a mandatory direction provision that was recommended by the majority of the federal-provincial task force on evidence.

This mandatory direction, which is found in clause 95 of the bill, requires the judge to advise the jury that the burden of proof is on the prosecution throughout the case, that the accused is presumed innocent until he is proven guilty, that the accused has a right to testify on his own behalf—although the law imposes no obligation on him to do so—and that the accused is free to remain silent if he so chooses, and in this case he has chosen not to testify.

The third significant change is that clause 125 abolishes all rules that either require corroboration of certain evidence or require a warning concerning the danger of acting on uncorroborated evidence. In its place the court is required to instruct the trier of the fact of the special need for caution in certain circumstances, namely, with respect to first, the evidence of a witness who has testified without taking an oath or making a solemn affirmation; secondly, the evidence of a witness who, in the opinion of the court, would be an accomplice of the accused if the accused were guilty of the offence charged; thirdly, the evidence of a witness who is proved to have been convicted of perjury; or, finally, a charge of treason, high treason or perjury where the incriminating evidence is that of only one witness.

Clauses 126 to 129 make only modest additions to the present law with respect to the evidence of interpreters and translators.

Clauses 130 to 159 deal with recorded evidence. The law relating to documentary evidence in Canada is in a sorry state. On the one hand, there is no adequate modern statement of the law on documentary evidence generally, while, on the other hand, there is an abundance of conflicting statutory provisions in relation to public, government and business documents. The result is that nobody is entirely sure what the rules are. This poses a serious problem for the business community in particular because it does not know whether it has to retain original documents or whether it can rely upon copies made by photographic, mechanical, chemical or electronic means.

This bill sets out a code in relation to documentary evidence and, in the process, streamlines the means of proof. It reduces the difficulty of proving authenticity by broadening the list of documents presumed authentic. It expands the use of copies by a broad definition of "duplicate," and by making a duplicate receivable to the same extent as an original, thus making it easier to satisfy the best evidence rule. Finally, it spells out an important exception to the hearsay rule for documents made in the usual and ordinary course of business.

The definition of "business" is very broad so that the same rules can be made to apply to financial institutions and government as apply to businesses generally. This standardization eliminates the apparent duplication of provisions that exist in the current Canada Evidence Act.

The provisions make only passing reference to the computer, but it was thought that most computerized records would be encompassed by the broad definition of business and government records. This may need to be re-examined in the near future with the rapid growth of the use of the computer by private individuals.

Clauses 161 to 174 deal with statutory privileges. Section 5 of the Canada Evidence Act, and comparable sections of the Provincial Evidence Acts, affords protection to witnesses with respect to the subsequent use of incriminating answers. The task force had identified a number of problems in connection with the section, ranging from its meaning through to its effectiveness in accomplishing its objective.

To address these problems, the bill extends protection against subsequent use to all statements—not just those that are incriminating in nature—made by the witness at the hearing. The reason for this is that it is often difficult to tell whether or not an answer is incriminating, and, in any case, a witness is not being called upon to give compulsory discovery against himself. The bill also includes provisions designed to reduce the possibility of a witness using the protection as a cloak for perjury. Finally, to comply with section 13 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the protection will apply automatically, and the witness will not have to ask for the protection, as he now has to do, under section 5 of the Canada Evidence Act.

There is a further provision under clause 165 dealing with the question of privilege respecting a psychiatric assessment. While the bill leaves the question of solicitor-client privilege to the common law, it sets out a new professional privilege with respect to statements made to a qualified medical practitioner during the course of a court-ordered psychiatric observation, examination or assessment. I am sure that this extension of privilege, though limited in scope, will be welcomed by the medical profession.

Clauses 193 to 195 of the bill deal with disclosure of government information. When the Uniform Evidence Act was under consideration, the Deputy Minister of Justice informed the Uniform Law Conference that Parliament already had plans to deal with this subject in the context of the Access to Information Act, and that, to the extent that there was an inconsistency between the provisions of the Uniform Evidence Act and the Access to Information Act in this regard, the latter would have to prevail. The Canada Evidence Bill, therefore, adopts verbatim the evidentiary provisions of the recently passed Access to Information Act.

Honourable senators, this concludes my summary of the highlights of the Canada Evidence Bill. Although there are a number of other matters of detail, which I am sure honourable senators will wish to consider, they do not raise matters of principle.

What we have before us may not be perfect but, then, no legislation ever is. It can be said, however, that it is as close to a satisfactory piece of legislation as we are likely to see. It represents the culmination of years of effort by scholars and practitioners in this country and elsewhere to whom, I feel, a great deal of respect is due for their considerable efforts in this regard.

Having the support of all the provinces, the bill should receive our most serious consideration. It provides a good system to give an effective and fair balance between the needs of the state and the rights and protection of the individual. I would urge, therefore, that this bill be given early and favourable attention by this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES, 1982-83

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1983.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983, is contained as an appendix in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for Thursday, November 25. The report was tabled by Senator Leblanc, the deputy chairman, last Thursday and was also printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of that date.

The supplementary estimates (B) bring the total expenditures of the federal government, for the fiscal year so far, to $79.6 billion, this in the light of a projected deficit by the Minister of Finance of $23,550 million.

I do not propose to deal in detail with the report, which is straightforward and can be read by all honourable senators. However, I should like to examine briefly some implications of the spending of $79.6 billion and the projected deficit of $23.5 billion.

When one looks at federal government spending in Canada, one must bear in mind that transfer payments to individuals and provinces, the interest on the national debt and expenditures on defence form 80 per cent of the total expenditures of the federal government. It follows then that all other expenditures of all departments and crown corporations aggregate 20 per cent of the total spending. You must bear those figures and those percentages in mind when considering the question of reductions in spending.

Obviously, there could be considerably more efficiency in government, but to a large extent that efficiency would apply to little more than 20 per cent of the total expenditures. If you were able to achieve a 10 per cent more efficient operation, you would, in fact, be achieving a 2 per cent reduction in overall expenditures. That is not to be sneezed at when those expenditures are in the neighbourhood of $80 billion. However, people who say that the deficit can be removed by making government more efficient are probably fooling themselves. It is true that the interest on the national debt will reduce as we lower the level of inflation, but probably the most effective area for the reduction of expenditures by the federal government relates to transfer payments. As honourable senators well know, that is a very politically difficult area in which to reduce expenditures.

One would have to grapple with the ending of certain programs for which there is a large constituency in the country; one would have to grapple with the issue of universality—whether programs should apply generally or whether they should apply to specific need; and one would have to grapple with the issue of whether we index our programs to the rate of inflation as we do now, or whether we cap the increase in the expenditure below that rate.

Although these are areas where we can make major reductions in expenditure, they raise the problem of reducing expenditures in a democratic government, which is particularly difficult.

Although I am very much in favour of reducing expenditures, I am concerned about the glib talk put forward by the critics concerning what should and could be done. If they were in government, they would not have the fortitude to do those things; in fact, if they tried, they would not be in government for long.

On the other hand, at the present time the deficit is largely caused by an economy that is operating grievously below capacity. It is also suffering from the fact that we index our tax receipts so that personal taxpayers do not suffer from inflation. At the same time, we index almost all other payments so that they reflect the effect of inflation. That exacerbates the deficit situation.

Under the six-and-five legislation, it is my understanding that we propose to index the personal tax to a maximum of 6 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984. The basis of the deficit, however, is fairly clearly a combination of an economy operating below capacity and the fact that we have indexed our personal tax and suffer from inflation on the expenditure side. In that position, the question you ask yourself is: How important is the deficit to the workings of monetary policy and its effect upon inflation rates?

It is certainly true that a large deficit makes it harder for a monetary policy to be effective. This is because the demand for money from the federal government creates higher interest rates, and, therefore, the policy takes longer to operate. The important aspect of the deficit, however, is whether or not it is monetized. Presently, and over the last reasonable mid-term, our deficit has not been monetized by the central bank. In other words, the fact that we have been running large deficits has not created an increase in the money supply. That situation could change. Obviously it would change if this deficit continues to be large and if spending continues to increase at rates that equal those of, for example, the past 10 years. At that stage it will be impossible for the central bank not to monetize the deficit. At the present time, however, that is not taking place.

The question we must ask ourselves is: Are we seeing a change in central bank policy in that regard? We must ask ourselves that question because the direction of the central bank at this point is crucial. What we have as evidence of the central bank policy is the speech given by the Governor of the Bank of Canada before the Canadian Club in Toronto on November 29. He again spoke out against inflation. He is clearly concerned about the problems of international liquidity and what various countries in the world will do to accommodate those countries which have taken on a great amount of debt. He articulates concern about the level of interest rates in relation to the domestic debt that was undertaken in inflationary times on the grounds that inflation would take us out of the problem of debt. He has abandoned the target for M-1.

That worries me a great deal. It is true that, because of changes in our banking system and the way in which we deal with bank balances, it is difficult to maintain a target for M-1, but it is not difficult to maintain a target for the monetary base. There is a fair amount of empirical evidence to indicate that M-1 is influenced by the monetary base.

Honourable senators, you have to ask yourselves: Why has the Bank of Canada made this change? If it has decided that M-1 is not a reliable aggregate to follow, why did it not go to the monetary base, which is reliable and which can be reasonably controlled? The monetary base is made up of currency in circulation and bank reserves; it is highly controllable by the central bank. We have to ask ourselves why the bank is doing this.

Honourable senators, I do not believe that the central bank has given up on the fight against inflation. What I suggest might be happening, however, is that instead of being concerned with the level of the money supply—using whatever aggregate you want to determine where that supply is—the central bank has reverted to its previous policy of some 10 years ago of being concerned about the level of interest rates. In other words, the bank is going to set the interest rate and the money supply will be allowed to increase or decrease in order to sustain that rate.

A number of people might very well say that that is good, that it would be a step forward if we could have interest rates at a certain level. Well, we went through that period, and it is a retrograde step. Honourable senators, it is a very retrograde step, and it would be a grave mistake if that is what the Governor has in mind.

Having said that, I have no conclusions to draw. I have merely expressed my concern that we may have been watching, over the last two or three months—and we may have come to that fulcrum point in the speech given on November 29—a major change in central bank policy in this country. If it is the change that I suspect it is, then it is indeed a change for the worse.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps I might ask my honourable friend a question before another honourable senator speaks.

My question arises from the fact that, when I read the reports of the Governor's speech, as my honourable friend did, exactly the same question crossed my mind; namely, what is going to be the rule with respect to monetary restraint if we are abandoning M-1? I also concluded, as I believe my honourable friend did, that the Governor did not give any clear exposition of the policy. If a policy change has taken place, he did not explain what that change is.

My question is: Does my honourable friend think it would be useful if we could ask the Governor of the bank to do us the courtesy of appearing before the National Finance Committee to give us an opportunity to discuss this matter with him, and to give him an opportunity to produce any clarifications which he might think desirable with respect to his policy?

Senator Everett: Indeed, honourable senators, I do.

Senator Roblin: I take it from that, then, that the committee would extend an invitation to the Governor?

Senator Everett: Yes, we would do that.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces", tabled in the Senate on 10th February, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I realize that this order has been standing in my name for some time. That may have impeded the desire of some other honourable senators to speak to it. However, subject to the order of business of the Senate tomorrow, it is my hope and expectation—though, I suppose, not my promise—that I will deliver myself of my wisdom on this matter tomorrow afternoon.

Order stands.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY VETERANS AFFAIRS EXPENDITURES IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)—ORDER DISCHARGED AND MOTION WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983.—(Honourable Senator Everett).

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I note that earlier this evening Senator Marshall presented a motion in which he asked that the Annual Report of the Department of Veterans Affairs be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. That motion was agreed to, and it is now likely that he will be withdrawing this motion, which is the subject of Order of the Day No. 9. Therefore, my remarks will be brief and perhaps not very helpful in that the motion will not be proceeded with. If it were to stand, I have no objection to a portion of the estimates being referred to any committee of this house. However, I suggest that what is referred to committee should be the subject matter of the particular item of the estimates.

I say that because the National Finance Committee is charged with the responsibility of dealing with the estimates and reporting back to the Senate prior to receipt of the appropriation bill, and if a committee dealt with the subject matter, it would not interfere with the National Finance Committee's study of the estimates and presenting its report prior to receipt of the bill.

I do not consider that reference of any item in the estimates to any other committee should prevent the Finance Committee from making a study of that same area, if, in the course of its examination, it decided it wished to do so.

On that basis, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, I would be in favour of the motion if it were amended to say that the subject matter was being referred to the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, and on the understanding of the other points I have made.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am in general agreement with what Senator Everett has said. When I moved the motion I was unaware that the Annual Report of the Department of Veterans Affairs was going to be tabled on November 25. I should point out that even though I agree with the honourable senator, I believe that an item in the estimates can be referred to a committee other than the National Finance Committee. A precedent has been set because last year we did that very thing, which gave the Health, Welfare and Science Committee the opportunity to delve into what were considered to be some inequities still remaining in the Veterans Charter.

I repeat that I am in general agreement with what Senator Everett has said, and, if there is unanimous consent, I am prepared to withdraw my former motion in favour of the new motion I presented earlier this evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 1, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO RECEIVE PRESENTATION FROM INDIAN ASSOCIATION OF ALBERTA

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, in response to a request from the Indian Association of Alberta, be authorized to receive a presentation from representatives of that association, and from other organizations if they so request, with respect to certain issues relating to Indian women and the Indian Act and, if the Committee considers it necessary, to report thereon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the chairman of the committee? As I heard him propose the motion, he said that the committee would report to the Senate only if it deemed it advisable to do so. Is that usual? My prejudice would be to ask the committee to report in any event because, if the committee is meeting pursuant to an order from us, and even if it has nothing to report, we should really hear the conclusions of the committee rather than let the matter hang in mid-air.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I agree with my honourable friend and I will draw his view to the attention of the committee. However, because a group of Indian women from the Indian Association of Alberta asked to spend 20 to 30 minutes with us in committee, I did want to give them an opportunity of presenting their claims. My intention was to report on what they said, if I thought it was worthwhile, but in view of what Senator Roblin has said I will report to the Senate in any event.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his undertaking, and in view of that I will not suggest that he amend his motion. Personally, I should like to know the committee's view on the matter, because the problem of Indian women concerns people right across the country—and it certainly concerns me, coming from the province of Manitoba.

I take it, then, that we can expect the committee to report regardless of their terms of reference?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, perhaps I should add that all honourable senators are invited to attend the committee meeting. I hope my honourable friend will come and hear their views firsthand, and perhaps ask pertinent questions.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend will undertake to hold his committee meeting when other committees of which I am a member are not meeting, I will be glad to give his proposition some consideration. But I must say that I have certain confidence in his own common sense in the matter, and I look forward to hearing his report.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FLYNN

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to raise a question of personal privilege, first of all regarding a statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday at his press conference, when he said, concerning the Hambleton case, that the decision not to prosecute this gentleman had been made by the Conservative government and the then Minister of Justice.

I must say the Prime Minister was very poorly informed. In fact, he was also contradicting statements made in the House of Commons by the Solicitor General and by the former Minister of Justice, Mr. Chrétien. In fact, there was a preliminary report in January 1980, when a more thorough investigation was requested. The report was submitted to my successor after the 1980 election, and the decision not to prosecute Mr. Hambleton was made in April 1980, not by Mr. Clark's Conservative government or by his Minister of Justice, but by the Trudeau government and Mr. Chrétien.

In the second place, yesterday on the French television network, Radio-Canada, they said I had informed Mr. Hambleton in January that he would not be prosecuted. Obviously this is absolutely untrue and even ridiculous, and I must object to this statement. In any case, both this statement and the Prime Minister's are at variance with the facts.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

McDONALD COMMISSION REPORT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, it has been revealed that Mr. Chrétien, the former Minister of Justice, had decided not to launch proceedings against members of the RCMP after the release of the McDonald report and, apparently, had added that had there been any evidence against them, the federal government would not have taken them to court.

Does that statement mean that, with respect to law, members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police do not get from the federal government the same treatment as do other Canadian citizens?

• (1410)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that explanations have already been given that are public information. They were given in the other place and elsewhere.

To be more precise, I shall take the honourable senator's question as notice and refer it to the appropriate minister for further information in the terms he has requested.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary question. When seeking further information, could the minister ask when that decision was made by the cabinet and the Minister of Justice? When were the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police informed of the decision reached by the federal government and of the Minister of Justice?

[English]

Senator Olson: I will take that under advisement.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question has to do with the evident leak from the Kirby task force report on the Atlantic fisheries regarding the alarming statistic that the income of many fishermen in Atlantic Canada falls below $12,035, and, therefore, below the poverty line.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government would determine whether any action will be taken prior to the tabling of that report in order to overcome this sad state of affairs.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I shall take that question as notice and obtain further details for the honourable senator, but I can advise him now that—and he knows this—during the past year important steps were taken by the government to assist in the economic problems related to Atlantic fisheries and Atlantic fishermen, and I could name a few of them.

For example, he is aware of the action which was taken with respect to the St. Anthony processing plant, as well as other action which was taken with respect to some of the difficulties encountered by more than one of the major and minor processing plants involved. Action is being taken. Hopefully, there is going to be an even more concerted and long-term solution coming out of the findings and recommendations of, or, at least, assisted by, the Kirby commission.

Senator Marshall: Apart from the fact that the government has rehabilitated, to a certain extent, the St. Anthony fish plant, one of the problems is the lack of work in the fish plants. I will leave that and accept the minister's answer that he will get a more detailed report.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—ATLANTIC CONTAINER EXPRESS—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning a firm called Atlantic Container Express that was hauling freight between Montreal, Quebec, and Corner Brook, Newfoundland. They have cut out that service, and that is going to hurt the economy of that part of Newfoundland. They are now saying that they would revive that service if they could get a subsidy from the government. I understand that Ace Container Express was made up of two firms that were getting a subsidy from the government.

I realize that I could put this question on the Order Paper but since the Leader of the Government has been giving answers to questions within a week—which he is to be commended for—perhaps he could provide an answer to this one as quickly.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in our usual attempt to be helpful by getting answers as early as possible, I will do that, although I have to admit that at this point I am not familiar with the background of this particular company's operations.

AIR CANADA

CHARGE FOR CREDIT CARD

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, turning to air transportation, would the minister also find out the justification for Air Canada's introduction of a charge of $15 for their En Route credit card? I think this is a complete imposition on the public because they have almost a monopoly on air travel in Canada, and besides increasing fares by an exorbitant amount they are trying to introduce a $15 charge for credit cards, which is ridiculous. Could the minister find out the justification for that action?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend is becoming more and more expert at making short speeches and getting his arguments submitted before—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The leader is the last one who should complain.

Senator Olson: I am not complaining; I am complimenting him on his expertise. Setting aside all of those arguments and terminology that my friend has used in leading up to his question, I shall try to get an explanation, although I believe that if he had read some of the daily news he would have found that the explanation has already been given by Air Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXHAUSTION OF BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You are lucky he is here.

Senator Doody: First of all, I want to thank the minister for joining us this afternoon. It is very rare, indeed, that we have an opportunity to pose a question to this very busy minister. I appreciate the fact that he did drop in yesterday afternoon but it was a very fleeting visit and I did not get an opportunity to ask his advice on a matter of grave importance to the people of my province and, indeed, the people across Canada.

I understand that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said that no meeting of federal and provincial welfare ministers is contemplated, nor is one necessary because there will not be enough people involved in the unemployment insurance exhaustion. There are more and more people running out of unemployment insurance benefits every week and more and more of them are going on provincial welfare rolls. Could the minister tell us if that is the policy of the government, or is it simply an opinion? Will there indeed be a meeting of welfare ministers to discuss this very alarming situation in the provinces?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I think the record will show that I am here most times—

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Austin: —and anxious to answer questions.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: I would be pleased to receive notice of any questions honourable senators would like replies to, because that would allow me to answer in a most timely and, I hope, adequate way. I appreciate the fact that Senator Donahoe accepts that I am busy and, indeed, I acknowledge that I am.

• (1420)

Senator Asselin: You just came from the north.

Senator Austin: I am somewhat confused—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is nothing new.

Senator Austin: —since I do not know the source of the quotation. I have not seen the newspaper column, if that is, indeed, what is being relied upon.

The minister responsible for unemployment insurance is the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, Minister of Employment and Immigration. If the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Monique Bégin, has mentioned some item regarding a meeting of the federal and provincial ministers responsible for unemployment insurance, I am not sure in what context that mention was made.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am constantly aware of the strictures of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to keep questions as brief as possible and that we should not become involved in speech-making. However, obviously, a preamble is necessary in view of the fact that my name is Doody, not Donahoe. Senator Donahoe may very well be satisfied with the attendance of the minister, but I am not at all thrilled with his performance and his attention to his duties in this chamber. His responsibility should not be fulfilled through the mail, but rather by his presence in this chamber. He has to answer for the government in this chamber.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We try to answer questions; we do not try to thrill you.

Senator Doody: Despite the fact that he has a tremendous number of duties—and I know how busy he is—I thought the relaxation of the softball schedule during this season of the year would give him more time to devote to his other chores.

Senator Perrault: Don't get political.

Senator Doody: Among those other chores is responsibility for the social welfare of the people of Canada. The social welfare of the people of Canada, fortunately, is in the hands of Senator Austin; the physical welfare of the people of Canada, unfortunately, is in the hands of Senator Perrault.

Senator Frith: Foul ball.

Senator Perrault: You get five minutes in the penalty box for that.

Senator Doody: I just threw that in as an appeal to the good nature of Senator Austin because I know now he has to come forth with all sorts of generous offers of help for the people in the country who are running out of unemployment insurance benefits.

I am aware that the minister responsible for unemployment insurance benefits is the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy who has not yet been fortunate enough to receive an appointment to this chamber, but I assume that will come after the next election. My comments could also apply to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In the meantime, the unemployment statistics show that, currently, 5,000 people are running out of unemployment insurance benefits each month and going on welfare rolls. The figure is expected to increase to between 7,000 and 9,000 per month by June 1983. The same statistics also indicate that there are 15,000 people living on savings; 20,000 people living on the earnings of another family; 5,000 people living on loans; 5,000 people living on pensions; and another 10,000 people presumably living on their wits because they have run out of entitlements.

With these figures in mind, I would ask the Minister of State for Social Development to ask his colleague on the Social Welfare Development Committee to call a meeting of welfare ministers. The expectation is that another 7,000 to 9,000 people in Canada per month will be going on welfare during the coming year.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Doody: The minister says that there will be no problem, and they will be caught up in the—excuse the expression—"welfare net."

I would remind the honourable senator and his colleagues that there is not enough welfare funding available in some of the provinces to support that kind of system during this coming winter. I plead with him to convince his colleague to call a meeting of the ministers so that they can explain the situation as it now exists in some of the poorer provinces and try to alleviate the suffering many Canadians are going to have to endure.

Senator Austin: I would begin by apologizing to Senator Doody for calling him "Senator Donahoe."

Senator Doody: I am honoured; Senator Donahoe is the one with the problem.

Senator Austin: I apologize to Senator Donahoe as well if that is the case.

I would acknowledge that the problem of unemployment is a serious and major one in Canada. It is one to which the government has given every ounce and fibre of its attention. The minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, has spoken on a personal-visit basis with virtually every provincial minister with respect to joint federal and provincial efforts to deal with the question of the expiration of certain benefits under the unemployment insurance program. Indeed, the government announced a program by which it would place $500 million directly into employment stimulation at the level of municipalities and within the private sector. That announcement was made in October.

Since that time, various provincial governments have announced that they are prepared to participate in that same program. For example, the Province of Ontario has announced that it would put in $100 million. The provincial minister, Mr. Miller, has indicated his strong support in this regard.

Honourable senators, there is no question but that Senator Doody is correct. The government's attention must continue to be focused on the subject of unemployment and on that of maintaining the social security safety net which has been put in place over the last 30 to 40 years in this country. That safety net is now a major factor in stabilizing communities and in ensuring that a sense of optimism and a sense of renewed economic growth remains in our country.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I thank the minister for his answer. Would he not, then, think it appropriate to call together the ministers of welfare of the various provinces in order to study in detail the sort of plans, schemes and efforts that the honourable minister has just explained to his colleagues here?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, perhaps I could add to my answer that I believe that the Minister of Finance, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, will be meeting during the month of December with the provincial ministers of finance. Unemployment will certainly be one of the issues that they will be discussing.

LAW ENFORCEMENT GUIDELINES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, my apologies for rising a little belatedly on this point. The Leader of the Government undertook to find answers to certain questions with respect to the recently announced intention of the government not to proceed with prosecutions of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who have broken the law. While he is seeking those answers, could he also undertake to find out for us the current guidelines for the enforcement of our laws by the national police force?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be included in the reference made to the Department of Justice and the Department of the Solicitor General.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION

TERMS OF EMPLOYMENT OF PRESIDENT AND CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister of state responsible for the CDIC. Last week it was announced that Mr. Joel Bell, formerly of the PMO and Petro-Canada, has been appointed president and chief executive officer of the corporation. It has been reported that Mr. Bell was engaged by means of a contract—a rather unusual procedure.

Could the minister inform us of the length of the contract and explain why there was a no-cut clause in the contract?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I appreciate the question from Senator Phillips respecting the Canada Development Investment Corporation. I will say that Mr. Bell is one of the outstanding business executives in Canada. His role in the development of Petro-Canada has been an exemplary one. He proved to be one of those who led its corporate growth.

I should like to inform honourable senators that the story which appeared in the press and which was attributed to a Conservative member in the House of Commons is inaccurate.

Joel Bell has agreed to serve as president and chief executive officer of the corporation, and in this connection I am told by the chairman of the corporation, Mr. Maurice Strong, that a compensation committee of directors has been struck to discuss the terms under which Mr. Bell will be employed. He obviously has a salary which is provided by order in council. As to other employment terms, however, nothing has been specifically decided upon. As yet, a contract has not been drafted; there has not been time to prepare one. I regret that someone in the other place should have made statements that have no basis in fact.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I would take it from the minister's reply that the no-cut clause is being considered for the contract. Would the minister consider a clause requiring profit performance as well?

Senator Austin: I cannot tell the honourable senator precisely what is being considered by way of the terms of the contract, but it will not be entered into without my review. With respect to profit performance, this is a corporation whose assets are not, to some significant degree, in a profit-earning position. I think one of its purposes is to obtain a more effective commercial operation of its assets. Whether one hires executives in a case like this on the basis of profit performance is a question I will take under consideration, but I believe that financial improvement would be an excellent test.

Senator Phillips: I would be perfectly happy to have a clause providing that a certain portion of the profits go to the president. Would the minister report to the house when the contract is settled?

Senator Austin: I also would certainly be happy if CDIC, including all its subsidiaries, were in a profitable position. Once a contract is entered into I shall be happy to inform Senator Phillips of that fact and provide him with whatever details it is appropriate to provide.

INDUSTRY

PHARMACEUTICAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—EFFECT OF PATENT ACT AMENDMENTS

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. My question is prompted by the closing down of the pharmaceutical research facilities of Ayerst in Montreal and their move to New Jersey, I think in June of this year. I think the Leader of the Government will be aware of the changes that took place 13 years ago in section 41 of the Patent Act. Is the government considering examining the results of those changes with respect to providing a fair, secure investment climate to Canadian pharmaceutical companies that carry out pharmaceutical research and innovation, as well as safeguarding standards and providing drugs at a fair price to the consumer?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): The more specific question is: Is the government considering extension of some of the patent rules of some years ago? I will make an inquiry of the appropriate minister. Perhaps I could also ask for an explanation of some of the reasons why we have the present conditions.

Senator Thompson: Perhaps I could ask a supplementary question to explain my concern. As I understand it, the Commissioner of Patents has no advisory body to assist him in looking at costs of the research done by individual companies in order for him to establish a price for drugs. The rate of profit permitted has been an average across the board of 4 per cent almost all the time. There are a number of questions like that which I think prove the need to examine the removal of pharmaceutical research facilities from Canada. We also want to ensure that the consumer pays a fair price for drugs and not some outrageous price.

Senator Olson: I think what Senator Thompson has just done is expand some of the details I alluded to, although only briefly, a moment ago.

[Later:]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a question supplementary to the excellent point made by Senator Thompson? When the minister replies, would it be possible for him to provide any information as to the number of companies that have closed down in the pharmaceutical industry, the number of jobs affected, and generally how the situation has affected our research and development thrust? It seems to me that those matters are germane to the general point raised by my honourable friend.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will try to provide that information. If statistics are to be valid and directly related only to the patent difficulty or dispute over the application of the patent law, that is one thing, but, of course, there may be some difficulties in that sector of the industry due to economic conditions generally. With that qualification, I will try to obtain the information.

Senator Roblin: I see the minister's difficulty, but I would point out that there is a general impression that it is because of the patent problem that the companies concerned have made their changes. That is the main factor involved. Provided that the minister defines his terms sufficiently carefully, I am sure he can provide the information.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is a difficulty that I am trying to avoid. If we were to ask a government department or minister to obtain an answer to that question, they may not regard the matter with as much significance as do some of the companies that are actually operating in that field. That is why I included the qualification.

Senator Roblin: Well, if it is properly qualified, we could then ask the industry what it thinks of the answer.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Try again.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure if the honourable senator asked whether or not we should ask the industry for its opinion. My understanding was that he wanted some statistics in a wider range than that asked for by Senator Thompson. There might be some factual information that could be provided, and an expansion of the qualification would be some opinion as to why it happened. Indeed, I am not sure whether I should ask the minister to ask the opinion of the industry itself. Obviously, that is another question.

Senator Roblin: I can put my honourable friend's mind at rest on that point. I want him to give me the facts as he sees them, carefully defining what the facts are intended to include, and I will take the responsibility of asking industry what they think of my honourable friend's answer.

Senator Olson: Very good; it is clearly understood now.

Senator Flynn: That is wishful thinking on your part.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

MILITARY EQUIPMENT—CRITERIA FOR ISSUANCE OF EXPORT PERMITS

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which follows the line of the response given last night to a question concerning international trade and sale of military equipment to South Africa. I recognize, as did Senator Frith last night, that the question may come within the area of security. Under the Export and Import Permits Act, what are the criteria today for issuing permits to export military hardware from Canada to the rest of the world? That is my first question.

My second is: Does Canada or the executive base its decisions on advice from COMECON, which, of course, is a NATO component? Is Canada varying its position in that regard, as opposed to the omnipresent U.S. input into COMECON decisions?

Honourable senators, these questions may involve security, but in view of the general desire to have freedom of information in Canada, I am of the view that answers to these questions can be given without prejudicing any security areas.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has authorized me to take that question as notice, as supplementary to the question asked by Senator Nurgitz. I had discussions today on the subject of providing an answer to Senator Nurgitz's question. Without wishing to delay the reply to Senator Nurgitz's question, I will see that Senator Lang's question is also forwarded for reply.

THE SENATE

REFORM—TERMS OF REFERENCE OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. The chairman of the latest royal commission on economic union has interpreted the terms of reference of his commission as including the examination of the federal institutions, including the Senate—

[Senator Flynn.]

Hon. Martial Asselin: And the House of Commons.

Senator Flynn: The House of Commons is also included, but I am speaking about the Senate.

Hon. Jack Marshall: The commissioner is not running for the leadership; he is coming to the Senate.

Senator Flynn: That would mean that he is not an aspiring leader of the Liberal Party. He is probably the platform for a rejuvenated Liberal Party, which would mean dropping most of their members in the other place as well as those in this place, but that is a problem for the new leader. I see that Senator Bird is smiling. Unfortunately, she will not be around then.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Are you speaking of your leader?

Senator Flynn: I was not speaking to Senator Guay; I was speaking to Senator Bird.

Senator Guay: Then I must say what I was about to say, if you will allow me. I thought you were speaking of your leader in the other place.

Senator Flynn: I can always count on the honourable senator for such a comment, because he is so eloquent and so convincing. We are as happy to have him here as the people of Manitoba who, indeed, would not have him in the other place.

Senator Guay: Oh, oh.

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator makes such a wonderful noise when he speaks, though he is not always easy to understand. However, I will not get involved in a fight with him. Some time ago I had the misfortune to become involved in a fight with Senator Steuart, simply because I misunderstood his reply.

Senator Guay: You can always read about it in the Globe and Mail.

Senator Flynn: Why not? You might as well speak of me in unflattering terms if you are going to speak of me at all.

Senator Guay: I am willing to listen and learn from what you have to say, so will you please continue?

Senator Flynn: I will if you will cease and desist.

Senator Guay: I am playing your game.

Senator Flynn: Coming back to reform of the Senate as it applies to the terms of reference of the Donald Macdonald Commission, I am wondering whether this aspect of the terms of reference meets with the approval of the government. Does it mean that the government will await the report of this commission before stating its position on reform of the Senate or does it mean that it is not satisfied with what was contained in the Pepin-Robarts report? Does the government feel that something else should be done with regard to the question of Senate reform which has not already been fully discussed and considered by previous commissions, by a Senate committee and even by the group which went to Australia in September?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition has partly answered his own question in that he described a number of groups, organizations, studies, and so on, that have been appointed over a number of years with regard to Senate reform. The Pepin-Robarts commission had some comments on the matter as did the Goldenberg-Lamontagne committee report.

Senator Flynn: And Bill C-60.

Senator Asselin: And the judgement of the Supreme Court.

Senator Olson: Views have also been expressed by the group of senators who went to Australia, though we have not debated the matter in this chamber.

But to get back to the specific question, I think what the Honourable Donald Macdonald said is that within the terms of reference of the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada he would take into consideration the influence of national institutions, including the Senate, with respect to modifications which might be useful in an economic development sense.

Senator Flynn: My specific question is: Will the government wait until we receive the report before deciding on the matter?

Senator Olson: I am not sure that that is implied. I suppose some changes could be made on the recommendation of the government, or changes could be undertaken by the Senate itself in terms of the effectiveness and relevancy of this institution with respect to economic development. Both scenarios are possible. I do not think that the terms of reference of the commission pre-empt any action from being taken until after it has reported.

Senator Flynn: So my understanding is that presently the government has no immediate plan in this regard?

Senator Olson: What the honourable senator should understand is what I said, namely, that the government and other bodies, including the Senate itself, may take an initiative with respect to some improvement—call it "reform", if you like—as to its relevancy to the service that we are obliged to provide to Canadians. What I said was that the government has given no undertaking that there will be no changes—

Senator Flynn: Nor to the contrary.

Senator Olson: —until the Macdonald Commission has reported.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. I may be out of touch—as I am much of the time—but the Leader of the Government referred to the group that went to Australia. May I have some clarification as to what group went to Australia and under what authority they went there?

Senator Marshall: You should come to our caucus meetings.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will undertake to bring that information to the chamber tomorrow. Perhaps I was somewhat naive in believing that this matter was well-known to every honourable senator in the place.

Senator Thompson: I know that Senator Frith went on this trip, and I appreciate the interest shown in studying countries that have an elected Senate, but I am wondering whether this group had an official designation and, if so, under what authority.

Senator Olson: I shall bring more information to the chamber tomorrow, but it is my understanding that the group went to Australia in response to an invitation. I do not think that it was a formally appointed group authorized to do a study and to report, but merely a group that went there in response to an invitation so that we would have some highly perceptive and intelligent senators—

Senator Frith: Or in their absence, the substitute for same.

Senator Olson: —who had observed the situation there, and who would be able to give us the benefit of their observations.

Senator Thompson: I do not know who the members of the group were, but if they were senators then I can appreciate that they are valuable and intelligent. Was the invitation from the Australian government?

Senator Olson: I shall find out for the honourable senator, and provide the information tomorrow.

Senator Marshall: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. Will he also find out whether there will be investigations of the second chambers in the United Kingdom, Barbados, Zimbabwe, India, Malaysia and New Zealand?

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, further to the supplementary question of Senator Marshall, if such is the case could I be one of the intelligent so-and-sos selected to go?

Senator Frith: If you can leave out the adjectives, you are under consideration.

Senator Flynn: And you can join Senator Frith.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question arising out of Senator Flynn's question. Was the chairman of the commission speaking on behalf of the government when he said he doubted that we needed a bicameral system.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will have to take that question as notice. I am not aware that the chairman said that. The reason I could reply to Senator Flynn so quickly and completely is that I happened to watch the same television program he watched.

• (1450)

Senator Flynn: You were given time to think because of the interventions of Senator Guay. That is why you could reply so readily.

AIRLINES

QUEBECAIR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question posed by Senator Asselin. Actually, it is an additional reply. Senator Asselin asked why the government's approach to the situation respecting Quebecair has been different from the procedure it followed in aiding Dome, Chrysler, Maislin, and so on.

The answer is that the government believes that different circumstances require different proposals. The government believes that the proposal it made in the Quebecair situation was the best procedure to adopt in the particular circumstances, and the one that made the most sense.

On November 23 the Minister of Transport stated in the other place that he:

> —refused, on behalf of the government, to take up all the commitments, debts and contracts Quebecair had made in the past. Why we did that? If we had not, thereby taking on the entire past history of Quebecair, we would have sabotaged any chance of success we might have. That is why we have refused to take over Quebecair's debts.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Thank you very much, but that does not answer my question at all.

Senator Olson: Well, you should be aware of what was in the Minister of Transport's reply in the other place, and I am sure you are because you must read the Commons Hansard avidly. However, if you missed that section, you have it now.

Senator Asselin: I just listen to you. That's all.

EASTERN CANADA—DECLINE IN PASSENGER TRAFFIC

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: On the subject of airlines, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to obtain for us the passenger figures for air travel in eastern Canada? I am specifically interested in air travel from Montreal to St. John's, Newfoundland, from Toronto to St. John's and from Halifax to St. John's. I would like the figures for the six months ending November 30 this year and for the comparable period last year.

Many of us who travel back and forth in eastern Canada are curious to know whether there has indeed been a significant decline in passenger traffic. For example, recently, when I was travelling on a Boeing 727, which has a capacity of 139 or 140 passengers, there were only 25 passengers on board. Again in recent days, while travelling on a DC-9, which has a capacity of 99 or 100 people, I noticed that the aircraft was only half full. Certainly, one did not see that sort of situation a couple of years ago.

Can the minister obtain those figures for both Air Canada and Eastern Provincial Airways, which are the two airlines operating in eastern Canada, so that we can determine if changes in passenger traffic are occurring? Behind all that, of course, the question in the minds of many people is whether Air Canada and the other airlines are pricing themselves out of existence—at least with respect to the passenger market in eastern Canada.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall try to obtain those figures.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

MAISLIN TRANSPORT LTD.—EXECUTIVE OFFICERS AND DIRECTORS

Question No. 86 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow moved the third reading of Bill C-90, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving third reading of Bill C-90, I should like to satisfy an undertaking I gave to Senator Phillips yesterday. In response to Senator Phillips's question concerning the agreement with New Zealand on the matter of the transshipment of mutton to the United States, I told him I did not think the agreement covered this matter, but I said I would look into it further. I now have some further information.

With respect to fresh chilled lamb from New Zealand, I understand that no problems have been created for Canadian lamb producers because the Canadian Sheep Council and the New England Meat Marketing Board have negotiated an agreement by which New Zealand producers of fresh chilled lamb will restrain their exports to Canada. That arrangement is expected to expire next year and I assume that the Canadian producers will be in touch with their New Zealand confrères to renegotiate that agreement.

With respect to the question concerning the transshipment of lamb to the United States, I can confirm that the agreement does not contain provisions in that regard. However, under the agreement all goods from New Zealand can be transshipped through any country and still qualify for tariff preferences.

I might mention that chilled lamb also enters Canada from the United States, and that there have been no restraint arrangements between Canadian producers and their counterparts in the United States. I am advised that those imports are not causing any difficulties for Canadian producers.

I trust that I have answered Senator Phillips's questions.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FARM LOANS INTEREST REBATE BILL (NO. 2)

SECOND READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-134, respecting rebates of interest on farm loans made under the Farm Credit Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is one of the utmost importance to the farm community. I know that honourable senators are quite aware of how important to Canadian farmers the Farm Credit Corporation has been over the years in providing long-term credit, but just to refresh their memories perhaps I can point out some figures that will even more clearly indicate the importance of the bill.

When we look at the report of the Farm Credit Corporation we find that in the period since 1929 a total amount of almost $6 billion has been advanced to Canadian farmers. If we look at the present situation, we find that almost $4 billion is outstanding. Thus, the whole Farm Credit Corporation operation is vital to the farming community.

Last year, with the great increase in interest rates, it was obvious that a number of farmers were having additional problems and a number of them were faced with either bankruptcy or, at the very least, having to cease farming operations.

Following on this, the Minister of Finance, in the budget speech on June 28, 1982, announced proposals which, when implemented, would have major effects. He listed a number of them, and one was that farmers would be able to secure loans for new capital investment at reduced interest rates. The document which he tabled is available in the budget papers and is entitled: "Supplementary Information and Notice of Ways and Means Motion on the Budget." If honourable senators wish to see the exact wording, it can be found on page 25 of that document.

Under the specific proposal of the Special Farm Financial Assistance Program, $100 million was allocated for loans in the fiscal years 1982-1983 and 1983-1984, and for interest rebates on those loans.

Because of the obvious and urgent need for assistance in this field, the allocation has now been increased to $130 million for 1982-1983, and $70 million for 1983-1984, which basically doubles the amount from $100 million to $200 million. The funding from the Minister of Finance, combined with that from FCC sources, will result in loan approvals of $200 million, with a rebate of four percentage points provided for the first two years of the loan.

This program will assist farmers facing serious financial difficulties in two ways. The first is from a financial standpoint, because it will allow farmers to restructure their debts and thus salvage their operations. The 4 per cent interest rebate will ease their financial burden considerably.

Secondly, under the proposal, the Farm Credit Corporation, through its credit advisers, will assist each borrower under the program in the development of farm plans, which will provide for greater financial stability at the end of the two-year rebate program.

The Farm Loans Interest Rebate Bill is required in order to provide the statutory authority for the appropriation of $16 million for the payment of the interest rebate. The Farm Credit Act does not provide the FCC with the authority to rebate any portion of the interest charged under the act, nor is there other appropriate legislation through which the subsidy could be paid. After a thorough review of all of the options, it was determined that the proposed legislation is the most acceptable method by which to pay the subsidy.

Loans under the Special Farm Financial Assistance Program will be made at the regular Farm Credit Act lending rate. On June 29, 1982, the day after the budget, the rate was 16.5 per cent. On October 1, 1982, the rate was set at 15.75 per cent. The rebate of 4 percentage points over two years today reduces the farmers' effective interest rate to 11.75 per cent.

Honourable senators will realize what substantial assistance this proposed legislation will give to those farmers who are experiencing financial difficulties.

To qualify, the FCC's customary lending criteria also apply. Similarly, as in the regular lending program, the loan ceiling for individuals is $300,000, and for more than one qualifying applicant in a farming enterprise it is $500,000.

Any farmer in financial distress may apply for a loan under this program. There are no restrictions on age, location, and so forth. Any farmer may apply.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You said that he must be in distress.

Senator Molgat: Yes, he must indicate that he is in financial distress to qualify for the interest rebate.

Senator Flynn: How does he establish that?

Senator Molgat: To qualify, the farmer must make application to the FCC and indicate clearly that he is in financial distress.

In order to qualify, the farmer must submit a plan of recovery and be able to demonstrate that the farming operation will, after two years, be able to generate sufficient income to meet his financial commitments. Proof that the program has been effective is in the fact that from the time of the announcement to October 26, 1982, 554 loans have been approved, totalling $80.1 million. Including applications currently in process, the total loan commitment to October 26 under the program is estimated at $105 million.

The following table shows the dollar amount granted in each region, and the percentage of the total.

LOANS APPROVED

Region	Number	Amount (millions)	Per cent of total
British Columbia	23	5.3	6.6
Alberta	42	9.3	11.6
Saskatchewan	72	11.4	14.2
Manitoba	50	6.7	8.3
Ontario	237	32.5	40.6
Quebec	105	12.3	15.3
Atlantic	25	2.7	3.4
National	554	80.2	100.0

This program has already been of substantial assistance to a number of farmers, and it can assist many more in running a viable farm operation. The 4 per cent rebate is one of the essential elements, and this bill will establish a method for the payment of that. So, I urge honourable senators to support the bill.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before the debate is adjourned, may I ask a question?

Senator Phillips: Certainly.

Senator Roblin: I want to be clear in my mind how this bill will work with respect to the interest rebate. As I understand what we have been told, it is that a farmer enters into a loan contract with the Farm Credit Corporation for a lengthy period of time—not for a two year period, but up to 30 years.

Senator Molgat: That is right.

Senator Roblin: As I understand it, the rebate itself applies only to years one and two, and in year three the loan is set at a fixed rate, not a floating rate.

I am at a bit of a loss as to how one can say that a farmer can meet the payments three years down the pike, because obviously somebody has to make that judgment to ensure that we are not throwing good money after bad. How is that circle squared?

Senator Molgat: Obviously there has been no experience as to what happens two years down the pike because the proposal was only made in June.

[Senator Molgat.]

My understanding of the system is that the farmer must not only have a plan himself to restructure his whole debt picture, but also have the assistance of the experts in the Farm Credit Corporation, who will work with him in establishing his plan.

The farmer must then follow the plan, and the whole process is designed to cover the farmer over the short term when interest rates are particularly high. At the termination of that term, the farmer will be placed on a regular financial plan.

Whether interest rates two years down the road will be as high as they are now, nobody knows, but the whole program, to be acceptable, must be able to cover the farmers' total payments.

Senator Roblin: I am still concerned about the fact that the rate is fixed today at, let us say, 13 per cent. That is fixed for the term of the loan, which is 30 years, or whatever, but the rebate applies only to years one and two. I can foresee problems with that kind of an arrangement, because in year three you go back to a fixed rate, which, at that time, may be higher than the market—heaven knows, we hope so—with no flexibility in the contract.

Senator Molgat: I apologize for not being able to reply specifically as to how it will be handled at the end of the two years, but I shall obtain that information for the honourable senator.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Senator Molgat mentioned an amount of $100 million. Is that the amount on which the interest will be repaid, or is that the amount outstanding in mortgages?

Senator Molgat: Under the proposed program there is a special injection by the Department of Finance of $100 million, of which $84 million is available for loans and $16 million for the interest rebate, being 4 per cent over the period. Similarly, the Farm Credit Corporation will put in from its regular lending fund another $100 million on the same basis. Therefore, the total available for direct lending will be twice the $84 million, the balance to the rebate of the interest.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES, 1982-83

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1983.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I will not take too much of your time—

Hon. Eric Cook: Good!

Senator Doody: —on supplementary estimates (B). I know that honourable senators will be pleased to hear that. Senator

Cook has already said "Good". It is nice to hear that he is still saying anything.

First, I should like to mention in passing the comments made by Senator Everett yesterday. Although they might not have related directly to the items in the supplementary estimates, they certainly did relate to the overall financial picture of the country. He spoke of one particular item of concern to everyone who has given any thought to this matter. He referred to the latest comments of the Governor of the Bank of Canada about the change of direction of M-1—I guess what the layman would call the ready cash situation in the country. It is not so much the uncertainty that the Governor raises with comments like that from time to time on different facets of the economic direction of the country, but it is really the difficulty that the people who are responsible for the direction of the country have in finding out exactly what the Bank of Canada is about.

I should like to say in passing, before I get down to more specific references to the estimates, that I think it is high time for the government of this country to give some serious thought to moving the responsibility for the affairs of the Bank of Canada directly into a government department so that one minister, whoever he might be, is responsible to the people and can be questioned on matters of policy, thus enabling the public to know at any time what the intention of the Bank of Canada is.

If there are problems with having an appointed Senate and a lack of accountability and a lack of legitimacy, then certainly the situation is even more pronounced with the impact of decisions of the Governor of the Bank of Canada who is really, under the present system, accountable to no one and decides when and where he will come forth and enunciate his new directions and policies. If he does not come forth it is because he has chosen not to. He sits in his cloistered office in the hallowed halls of the Bank of Canada and comes forth from time to time and dictates, in effect, the lifestyle of all of us. It is time that the role of the Bank of Canada and the authority of the Governor of the Bank of Canada should be seriously examined with respect to the direction of the economy and, consequently, the lives of all Canadians.

That is simply a thought that I have thrown out in opening my comments, and it has no real purpose other than to ask honourable senators to keep those points in mind. I rather suspect that Senator Everett's concerns were very much along the same lines.

The new votes, the new items and the new objectives in the supplementary estimates (B) are not all that numerous, but their size continues to grow amazingly each year and become increasingly more difficult to grasp.

The deficit that Senator Everett talked about yesterday, and which we discussed in committee, becomes more and more difficult to get a figure on. I do not think anybody knows what the real deficit is. The cumulative official deficit announced by the government is $134 billion. I believe the total deficit is closer to $240 billion. If the current Public Accounts reveal that the debt of crown corporations is $55.7 billion, then surely that should be part of the deficit. The specified accounts section of Public Accounts indicates that the government is responsible for $49 billion that it holds in pension contributions. Somebody somewhere is responsible for looking after these pension contributions. The total, now divided among Canada Pension contributions, the Public Service Superannuation, the Armed Forces, the RCMP, retirements, and so on, adds up to another $49 billion. This money just goes into the general revenue fund and is dispensed through current government spending to pay current bills, but it certainly should be part of the liabilities and part of the deficit of the country. Perhaps the figure is closer to $240 billion. Of course, when you get to deciding whether $240 billion is really pertinent, perhaps it is too difficult for a layman to try to visualize exactly how large these numbers are.

In the course of examining supplementary estimates (B) in committee, we did ask specific questions of the public officials who appeared before us.

A question was asked about the cost to the Canadian tax payer this year of government advertising, and there was a request for a cost breakdown among the various departments. We were told that advertising costs would amount to approximately $50 million. Now, that is a lot of money for advertising; in fact, $50 million is a lot of money for anything. I do not believe that in these days of restraint and in these days of telling people to cut back, that the government should be spending that much money on advertising. I am sure that many people in this country could think of a lot more useful ways to spend that much money.

In just about every departmental heading in the estimates you will find a subheading entitled "Professional and Special Services." I would suspect that term covers a multitude of sins of commission and sins of omission, and legitimate sins if there can be such. I would suspect that there are legitimate needs of legal services, professional services and specialized services from time to time. I would also suspect that a subheading of that wide a scope of generality can excuse any sort of excess.

In reply to a question as to how much the total bill for these professional and special services might come to in the current year, we were told that it would be in the neighbourhood of $2 billion. Now, $2 billion covers a heck of a lot of professional and special services, and I can think of a lot of slots in the economy of this country today that could use an injection of $2 billion. Many senators sitting in this chamber today represent provinces that could well use even a small slice of that $2 billion and $50 million.

We did not have that much time in committee to delve into a lot of detail on supplementary estimates (B)—although if we wanted to push it we could have—but we talked at some length about requirements under the Administration Program of the Secretary of State, with expenditures totalling $6.208 million, of which $1.819 million was for the proclamation of the Constitution Act, April 1982; $216,000 for increased resources for the Advertising Management Group; $3.020 million for increased funding for Canada's birthday; $311,000 for the visit of Her Royal Highness Princess Anne, and $172,000 for the appointment of the Assistant Press Secretary to Her Majesty the Queen.

I am sure that all these things in themselves are necessary, but the people in authority will have to decide how necessary they are, because many of the ordinary people of Canada are crying for succour. They will not be impressed with the appointment of an assistant press secretary to Her Majesty the Queen at a cost of $172,000—however important it might be to keep in touch with what is going on in royal palaces. In any event, I understand the British press covers that topic fairly thoroughly.

I notice a few aside mutterings from my colleagues. They seem to be a little perturbed about these notes of discomfort. They must have anticipated my comments on letters of comfort.

These notes of discomfort concerning the royal budget are not in any way meant to indicate disloyalty to the monarchy. I would add that I will be returning to Newfoundland to concentrate on the second meeting of the Commonwealth Society, and I would assure the house that that is a major step forward in terms of monarchy support.

I know my colleagues will be somewhat disappointed if I make no slight comment on the letters of comfort.

Senator Frith: We should have a definition of "letter."

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No stamp required.

Senator Doody: Before we get to the "comfort stations," as Senator Thompson so aptly called them—and they have been for quite a few companies, corporations and individuals over the years—I would just touch on the votes for some of these corporations which are wholly owned by the Crown.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Not only 10 per cent.

Senator Doody: Not any more. It would appear that a different law applies to the Government of Canada to that which applies to some of the provincial governments. Perhaps there is some justification for that.

Senator Roblin: There is? Let's hear it.

Senator Doody: I do not presume to know what it might be.

I turn now to the situation respecting Canadair and, to a lesser extent—in terms of magnitude but not in terms of principle—the situation concerning de Havilland. In this regard, the supplementary estimates contain two votes of $200 million each in contributions to Canadair and to de Havilland. These are called equity purchases, although the Government of Canada does not list them as such because it does not feel that there will be an opportunity to realize profits from those companies. I think that is a realistic attitude.

The current debt load of Canadair is $1.35 billion, which is a staggering amount of money to have publicly invested in any corporation. It is a privately owned company, all the shares being owned by the Government of Canada. That is what we have been told, although I find it difficult to absorb. It is still controlled and operated as a private company, although the taxpayers of Canada have a $1.35 billion debt load in it, and $200 million has now been added in equity.

The company pays out monthly interest charges of $15 million. It is nowhere near the break-even point. The estimates of the aircraft sales are, understandably, falling every year since I do not think the world is in a position to support the purchase of a great many Challenger jets or, for that matter, any other kind of jet. Nonetheless, the Government of Canada keeps pouring in more money.

During the committee meetings we asked a series of questions as to how the investment of the taxpayers of Canada is being protected in this particular company, and other companies in the same position—one of those companies being de Havilland. We wanted to know what the prospects were of recovering this taxpayer investment; the names of the directors, and what their responsibilities entailed; what sort of mandate they had and who, in fact, directed the course of the company in terms of policy, sales and in trying to reach a reasonable management level of expertise. One would suspect that when one has this kind of kitty to fall back on, the urgency is not on management to achieve a reasonable level of expertise.

In any event, answers to these questions were not forthcoming. I cannot tell the Senate what responsibilities the directors of these companies are given; on what they are asked to report back to the minister; or what terms of reference they have. These are unknown quantities. However, I would hope that answers to those questions will be forthcoming.

de Havilland and Canadair are among the companies which have been placed under the loving care of Senator Austin, and I would hope that as the session progresses we will receive some answers from him.

The situation with regard to the investment in these companies should concern all of us. It is incumbent upon government to report and tell us exactly how far it intends to go in supporting some of these operations, and what the responsibilities of the representatives of the taxpayers are.

I will not detain honourable senators much longer. They probably feel that I am somewhat dissatisfied with the direction the government has taken regarding some management decisions, but that is hardly surprising to some of my colleagues who feel I may be a little partisan, in any event. Although I will vote against the supplementary estimates, I have no doubt that they will be adopted.

Honourable senators, I should like to make one other point before I conclude, and it relates to the concern regarding the Unemployment Insurance Fund and how it will survive. Questions were raised in committee regarding what steps the government will take to see that it is properly funded; where the funding will come from; how long the present management-employee funding will continue; and how long the present situation will sustain itself. These questions were not readily answered because the officials from the various government departments were not present, although Treasury Board officials did undertake to provide the information.

Honourable senators, I have made mention of only some of the problems we raised. I would conclude by saying that I would have some difficulty in supporting the government's request for the supplementary estimates, but I feel reasonably certain that they will be passed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak in this debate, I do have a comment respecting the remarks made by Senator Doody. I should like to thank the senator for his contribution. Once again he has demonstrated why he is such a useful member of the National Finance Committee.

In the course of his comments respecting political control of the Bank of Canada, he did say that he suspected my comments might be similar. He was referring specifically to achieving more political control over the Bank of Canada. In this regard I would refer him to a dictum laid down by a former Governor of the banks, Mr. Graham Towers, on how that political control operates.

• (1530)

As I understand it, Mr. Towers said that there would be consultation between the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the government through the Minister of Finance; that the final authority rested with the government of the day; and that, if the Governor of the bank disagreed with the exercising of that authority, his function would be to resign and to bring to the attention of the public that disagreement. Mr. Towers, and I think all governors since, recognized that the authority does rest with the government. Whether we should go farther than that, to the extent to which Senator Doody is suggesting, I am very doubtful. To put the central bank under the direct control of the Minister of Finance or some other minister would, I think, be counter-productive. I think the situation that exists today, where final control rests with the government, but the bank is, in effect, independent, is the best possible balance between the two requirements.

I believe, however, that the governor should make himself readily available to parliamentary committees so that Parliament can understand what his policies are.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in this debate, this order is considered debated.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces", tabled in the Senate on 10th February, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have conferred with Senator Smith about this order. As he said yesterday, he intends to speak to it today. I mentioned to him that Senator Hastings would like to move Motion No. 3, respecting the establishment of a Standing Senate Committee on Energy, this afternoon. Senator Hastings is also the sponsor of Bill S-32, which has been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and which will be considered by that committee at 4 o'clock, when the minister will appear.

Senator Smith, with his customary consideration and courtesy, offered to step aside so that Motion No. 3 can be moved, and Senator Hastings released from the squeeze in which he finds himself. I thank Senator Smith for agreeing to that, and I am sure Senator Hastings does as well—Senator Hastings owes him one, as they say.

Order stands.

ENERGY

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, pursuant to Notice of Wednesday, November 30, 1982, moved:

> That in the opinion of this House it is desirable to establish a Standing Senate Committee on Energy to consider legislation and other matters concerning energy and natural resources that may be referred to the said Committee by the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, before proceeding with a few brief remarks, I join with Senator Frith in extending thanks to Senator Smith for permitting me to proceed with this motion at this stage.

Honourable senators, I place this motion before you in view of the importance that energy has in our lives today. Its availability and its price affect the daily lives of every Canadian. I do not think that a national or international conference is held whereat there is not a great deal of time devoted to the subjects of energy sources and uses because of the dramatic impact that energy has upon our lives today.

Energy has a unique importance to the Canadian economy. Over the last decade, Canada has remained a net exporter of energy, the value of her net exports rising from $838 million in 1971 to almost $3 billion in 1980.

The dramatic rise in oil prices as a result of the two OPEC shocks in the 1970s and the potential consequences of reliance upon insecure and possibly expensive supplies of imported oil, have prompted actions by the federal government to ensure that future Canadian requirements will continue to be met.

The development of our indigenous energy resources represents one of Canada's foremost priorities over the next decade. As we continue to reduce our imports, the exports of energy will increase in importance as a source of foreign earnings.

The growing number of energy bills is evidence of the importance of this subject as a matter of public discussion. Fourteen separate pieces of legislation form part of the National Energy Program, the prime target of which is to achieve energy self-sufficiency by 1990.

With energy becoming a subject of frequent debate in Parliament, it is clear that this subject cannot continue to be an incidental concern of a Senate committee. On the contrary, honourable senators, it warrants the deliberations of one committee which is dedicated solely to that purpose.

The subject of natural resources had committee status for many years prior to 1968. At that time, a consolidation reduced the number of subject-matter committees to six. For the first time, terms of reference were prescribed for the work of each committee, and subjects were routinely assigned to the appropriate committee, or, if undesignated, were left to the discretion of the Senate for assignment. This was the fate of natural resources, which, as I said, lost its committee status in 1968.

The importance of energy in the Canadian and world economies warrants a return to committee status for this subject. It is no longer satisfactory to take an ad hoc approach to matters of national significance which are being debated in Parliament and throughout the world.

Honourable senators, Senate committees have become increasingly professional in their treatment of respective areas of expertise. It has become the practice to refer the subject matter of legislation to these committees in advance of legislation coming before the Senate, not only to expedite the review process, but also to allow more thorough study.

Senate committees have also become the initiators of intensive studies of social and economic matters of national concern. The Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline has, itself, developed an investigative role as part of its monitoring of the northern pipeline and related energy issues—a role that would adapt well to an extension of its mandate.

While the special committee's initial purpose was to monitor aspects of the northern pipeline, the need to secure domestic energy supplies led to the study of enhanced oil recovery in western Canada, the report on which was tabled in the Senate in 1979, and to the study of the transportation of hydrocarbons from the Arctic, which subject the committee is currently concentrating on.

The special committee has travelled extensively in western Canada, interviewing representatives of industry and those people most closely concerned with development. Through these studies and its review of energy-related legislation, the special Senate committee has developed a measure of expertise in energy issues.

Honourable senators, I might refer again to the report on enhanced oil recovery which was tabled in this chamber to say that 75 per cent of the recommendations made by the committee in its report were incorporated into the legislative and regulatory process in our energy legislation. Seventy-five per cent of our recommendations were totally accepted by governments, both federal and provincial, and by industry.

The complexity of energy issues, the areas of unresolved dispute, and the discretionary scope of existing legislation necessitate a parliamentary watch-dog which, as opposed to reviewing issues on an ad hoc basis, sees the overall picture and reconciles competing interests.

The five to ten-year lead time which is needed to plan major projects and to take into account environmental and socioeconomic factors necessitates a long-term approach to energy development. Only a group with a permanent interest can provide the required continuity to oversee effectively the long-term implications of these projects.

In Canada, our demonstrated technical competence to exploit our resource potential must be matched by a comparable ability to solve jurisdictional and regional disputes in the energy field. To accomplish this task satisfactorily, we need to provide national forums for debate of the issues and for airing differences of opinion.

The less partisan atmosphere of this chamber promotes free discussion, leading to a fairer distribution of benefits and costs, and to resolution. In my view, the special Senate committee is well placed to perform this function. In the studies initiated by the committee, members have become accustomed to confronting controversial issues where dialogue has helped to prevent misunderstanding and to promote consensus in the early stages of decision-making.

In its hearings and travels, the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline has become very aware of the need to preserve the delicate balance between national and regional needs, developmental and environmental and socioeconomic needs, and the requirements of the producing and consuming regions of Canada. The committee has provided a forum for the exchange of views and the resolution of differences. It has developed strong ties and rapport with those Canadians who may be affected by major energy projects, particularly those living in northern Canada, and with the industry that will be exploiting those resources.

It is the committee's view that those affected by development should reap the benefits and not merely suffer the impacts of major projects. Measures they have recommended in the past five years have been beneficial to many Canadians.

The advisability of assigning a general energy reference to the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline was discussed on June 16, 1982, before the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which concluded that the special Senate committee was the "most suitable committee to take this reference." This statement clearly shows an appreciation that energy matters warrant separate treatment.

In summary, I should like to reiterate why the establishment of an energy committee is imperative at this time. First, energy has a priority in Canada that will continue to grow in importance in the years ahead. Secondly, the subject of energy historically has warranted committee status, a status it presently does not enjoy. Thirdly, there is a need for a committee to provide a permanent monitoring function to oversee the complex energy questions and explore their long-term ramifications. Fourthly, the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline has developed a considerable subject matter expertise in this area, and has served as a national forum for debate and dialogue.

The energy committee I envisage could, in my view, have a responsibility for matters relating to exploration, production, conservation, transportation, marketing and allocation of hydrocarbons; policies with respect to the import and export of hydrocarbons; hydro-electric power production, transmission and marketing; atomic energy production and application and matters related thereto; renewable energy research and implementation of recommendations related thereto.

It is my understanding that if honourable senators adopt this motion, the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders under Senator Molson will take notice, and consequential amendments to the rules of the Senate will be made to provide for the terms of reference to the committee.

Honourable senators, I commend this motion to your favourable consideration.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, there is little that I can usefully add to the excellent and comprehensive dissertation of my colleague, Senator Hastings, on the desirability of establishing a Standing Senate Committee on Energy. We on this side support the motion. Indeed, some of us regret that this initiative was not taken earlier, in light of the massive impact that energy policy initiatives entered upon by government have had, and will continue to have, on the Canadian economy, not only in the west and frontier areas of Canada, but as well in central Canada.

I do not mean to imply any criticism of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in what I have said. That committee is to be congratulated for the work it did in reviewing the series of bills related to the National Energy Program at a time when it was overloaded with other matters which, historically, I think it can be said, were of more direct concern to it, and with respect to which it has over time developed a very high degree of expertise.

It is my hope, indeed my expectation, that the proposed committee on energy will in its turn develop an on-going body of knowledge and experience, which its members would bring to bear on the various aspects of legislation intended to implement energy policy, separate but interrelated, as these inevitably must be, which will reflect credit on this chamber and the work carried on here.

Honourable senators, I repeat that we on this side fully support the motion introduced by Senator Hastings.

[Translation]

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, just a few words to say that I fully support the motion of my colleague, Senator Hastings, to change the existing Senate Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline into a Standing Committee on Energy.

I have no intention of repeating all the arguments so convincingly voiced by the sponsor of the motion because, in my opinion, they fully justify the purpose of the motion. I should like instead to emphasize one aspect of the matter to which the sponsor referred briefly.

The transition from one committee to the other will be made easier as a result of the expertise gained these past few years by the members of the special pipeline committee with respect to the constitutional, legal, technical and other considerations directly or indirectly related to the construction of the Northern Pipeline. During the past three years, the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline had the opportunity of visiting our remote northern regions and to discuss with all the parties involved the outlook, the stakes and the real problems concerning the proposed pipeline as well as the related energy issues. We met with native people, with local authorities and spokesmen for the industries concerned. The committee members already have extensive information about energy transportation, expropriation matters and the technology required to maximize the extraction of energy resources. In fact, the new committee will be in a position to operate from a sound basis and thus cope rapidly and efficiently with Canada's energy problems. The energy challenges are awesome, the problems are complex and the interests and the stakes are diversified and concurrent. It seems to me that an institution such as the Senate cannot fail to respond to the opportunity, nor can it shirk its obligation to marshal all its resources and devote to those questions all the time and reflection required.

That is why I fully endorse the motion introduced in the Senate by Senator Hastings.

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, at the risk of testing your forbearance to the ultimate, I will ask permission to add just a few words in support of the motion moved by Senator Hastings. I entirely support his motion to establish a standing Senate committee on energy. It seems to me that such a new committee would be a logical and necessary extension of the current Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.

I have had the good fortune to be a member of that committee since I was called to the Senate. I think the work that committee has done—and is in the process of doing—was interesting and necessary. Not only was the committee study of great interest, but it was one of major importance to our country. The impact of pipeline construction on the social and economic lives of our people is immense, and a forum had to be provided to permit all the various interested groups to come forward, to make their arguments and their positions known. The concerns of the people who live in the areas had to be listened to; the impact of the construction of pipelines, exploration, development and the transportation of oil and gas on the every-day lives of the people and the economic status of the residents had to be explored.

The objectives of the federal government had to be borne in mind, and all those things looked at with respect to the huge investment required to be made by the business community. As the various hearings on the northern pipeline, enhanced oil recovery, and the transportation of hydrocarbons from the north, advanced, and as the committee travelled around various parts of the country, it became more and more obvious that our restricted terms of reference did not allow us to do the job that the Senate should do in those areas. We reached the inevitable point where information had to be gleaned on other modes of transport, whether it be surface icebreakers, submarine transportation, or a combination of all of them. Honourable senators might have led Canadians to the view that pipelines were indeed the only mode of transport of hydrocarbons.

Our visits to the north and our hearings on marine transportation in the Arctic inevitably raised questions about other areas of our vast country. Arctic conditions with solid sheet ice, no matter how vast or thick, present problems with cold weather navigation quite different from those affecting iceberg alley off our east coast, or indeed the problems of wind and wave not related at all to ice but which present a real and present danger, as witness the recent tragic Ocean Ranger disaster.

Quite apart from the danger to human life and the loss of millions of dollars worth of equipment, there is also the possibility of environmental damage to the high north or to the offshore from an oil spill or blow-out. Those questions and others were raised and should be explored and answers provided.

These are a few thoughts and are not by any means stated as being definite objectives of the proposed new committee. Indeed, there are so many energy-related areas that could be considered, that the wonder is that such a committee was not established before. The importance of energy-related matters in the lives of all Canadians can hardly be overstated, and I believe the Senate has a duty to be in a position to examine and report with knowledge and expertise on legislation and other matters in the field of energy.

A good deal of expertise, experience and knowledge now exists in the committee, which is so well chaired by Senator Hastings. I serve on quite a few committees of the Senate, and on none of them is such a spirit of interest, and a desire to be involved, evident in so many senators as on the Northern Pipeline Committee.

In my view, a check must be kept on the growth and proliferation of Senate committees, but that has been done. Senator Hastings is proposing no new committee and there will be no further demands on the resources of the Senate, the staff, the translators, reporters, and so on. The quality of this committee has been demonstrated. The importance of the proposed field of activity is readily apparent. The background and knowledge of its people, gathered over the inquiries of the past few years, should be utilized to deal with energy bills and energy matters.

[Senator Doody.]

Honourable senators, in closing, may I take the opportunity of congratulating the chairman, Senator Hastings, and also Senator Lucier, his second-in-command, and honourable senators on both sides of this house. I hope that the proposed new committee will be that rarity of rarities, a truly non-partisan committee. I would also like to thank that small but efficient and co-operative staff who have worked with and for us. It has been a great learning experience for me and it has given me an opportunity to participate in a useful exercise. I fully endorse the motion of Senator Hastings, and I ask honourable senators to support it.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I should also like to support the motion for a standing Senate committee on energy. I was one of the original members of the Northern Pipeline Committee, and, as a senator representing Yukon, I would like to have some northern input into the motion now under discussion. I like to think that I can add some western input, because to get to the Yukon one has to travel 700 miles west of Vancouver. Therefore, I consider myself to be a westerner as well as a northerner.

The Northern Pipeline Committee has travelled, as has been stated, to Alaska, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, and something has happened which does not often happen in the north. A real rapport has developed between the senators on that committee and the people of the north. Northerners feel that the committee has provided them with a forum in which they can express their views. There has always been a real feeling in the north—I believe with considerable justification—that many important decisions are made on northern development without any input from those who are likely to be seriously affected by those decisions. The committee has certainly helped to alleviate that feeling.

I was present at a meeting of the Energy Committee of the other place when the member from the western Arctic asked whether it could be a joint committee, or if the members of their committee could sit on our committee because of the good work we were doing and the lack of input that he felt their committee was having. I therefore consider that our Northern Pipeline Committee has done a good job, and to expand it to a standing committee on energy is certainly the way to go. The next 10 or 20 years will be critical for the north. A number of things will be happening in northern Canada related to energy, hydrocarbons, petrocarbons, and so on. There will be a good deal of action in the north in the next 10 or 20 years, and, as a northerner, I believe that the formation of the proposed new committee is timely and most important because of the rapport that has developed between senators on both sides of this house and the people of the north. The people of the north very much appreciate that rapport.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I too wish to add my support to this motion. In my view it would not be a new committee. It would be a renaming of the Northern Pipeline Committee and would give it new duties and new responsibilities that are needed in these difficult times. Others have pointed out that no new staff or extra expense would be involved. I support the motion as being well worthwhile. Energy is a subject in which we as senators can well become involved.

I am interested also because I believe that the new committee may be able to find out why we in Prince Edward Island pay more for energy than any other place in Canada. I would like to know what the new committee may be able to do to protect the offshore rights in connection with the Hibernia and Sable Island oil fields. Those are matters that should be looked into by parliamentarians.

In supporting this motion, I would like to make another suggestion. In my view, it is only proper that this motion should be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, because an honourable senator might stand up tomorrow and make a new motion that there be a change in the rules without going through that particular committee. I am quite sure, if that committee understands the feeling of honourable senators, that when it brings in its report it will amend standing rules and orders to make the proposed new committee possible.

That being the case, I would like the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to consider something further. Therefore, I will piggyback something on this resolution. The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, of which I am chairman, has the responsibility of dealing with veterans affairs and also Indian and Eskimo affairs. I suggest that we should change the words "Eskimo affairs" to "Inuit affairs". I do not want to be involved in my committee with land claims, and so on, of the Indians or Inuit. I would like to have that aspect of Indian and Inuit affairs referred to another committee, such as the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, because I believe land claims require legal advice. My committee can deal with health and welfare matters, social and cultural matters, possibly education, and also pensions, labour legislation and unemployment insurance. Aging is also a responsibility of my committee, and I suggest that we should add the status of women, and also youth. The welfare of children should also be a responsibility of my committee.

Bill C-135, dealing with housing, has been referred to us, and rightly so. The subject of consumer protection should also be referred to my committee. Therefore, I would ask the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, when considering this reference, to also consider some changes in the terms of reference of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, and perhaps a change of name to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs and Science.

The Hon. the Speaker: Does the honourable senator wish to make a formal proposal to refer this resolution to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders?

Senator Bonnell: No, Mr. Speaker. I thought that the motion might be referred to the committee, but I am not sure whether that is the case.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it seems that Senator Bonnell's obervations can properly be taken into account by the committee under the rules as they now stand without changing the motion.

Rule 67(e) provides that the committee chaired by Senator Molson:

> —is empowered on its own initiative to propose to the Senate amendments to the rules from time to time.

So it does not have to have matters referred to it, and I suspect that Senator Molson quite rightly would rather deal with it on his own motion, taking into account the comments that have been made, without feeling that he is in any way bound to make the amendments suggested by Senator Bonnell. I believe that the honourable senator is merely urging that the committee consider his suggestions when considering amendments to the committee sections of the rules.

If I am correct, honourable senators, we can go ahead with Senator Hastings' motion. I believe that Senator Bonnell's objective can be reached in the way suggested.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the Honourable Senator Bonnell satisfied with that arrangement?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, my purpose was to express my thoughts to the chairman of the committee, so that his committee might consider whether my suggestions are apropos.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, there seems to be a slight hiatus on this particular point, and perhaps it would be appropriate for me to say that it is well known in the Senate that the Rules Committee exists only to carry out the clearly expressed wishes of the Senate. From the motions that have been presented and the observations that have been made, it is perfectly clear what the wishes of the Senate are in this respect. Therefore, if it is generally accepted by the Senate, I would propose that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders meet shortly to consider the two motions, and recommend for the consideration of the Senate appropriate changes to the rules.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am in a somewhat difficult position because Senator Smith has already agreed to stand, at least temporarily, his speech on the next item.

I noticed that we did not authorize the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to meet this afternoon during the sitting of the Senate.

Therefore with leave of the Senate and your permission, Your Honour, I ask that we revert to notices of motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to meet at four o'clock this afternoon even though the Senate may be sitting at that time, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 17, the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces", tabled in the Senate on February 10, 1982.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I am not unaware of the passing of time or that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee is meeting at present. If it is the wish of the Senate that I defer my gems of wisdom until some other time, that would not disturb me. On the other hand, if the Senate is prepared to listen to me now, I am prepared to go ahead. I am in the hands of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if Senator Smith is prepared to meet our convenience, I am of the opinion that we should meet his. If he is prepared to proceed, I shall be happy to stay to listen to him.

Senator Smith: I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his forbearance. I take it that he is speaking also for his colleagues, and I will take it upon myself to ask my colleagues also to bear with me.

Honourable senators, this report seems to me to be a sound and important one. It is a pleasure to be able to say that the Minister of National Defence appears to have a similar view.

Before dealing with the report, however, there are two other documents which I would like to commend to honourable senators as being useful reading on defence matters. I draw the attention of honourable senators to pages 12 to 17 of the Financial Post of November 27, 1972, which contain a great deal of valuable comment on the Canadian defence position. The other document to which I refer is a publication which may have been distributed to most if not all honourable senators entitled "Canada and Western Security," with a subtitle "The Search for New Options". That document states—and I believe it to be true—that it is a report prepared under the auspices of the following: The Atlantic Council of Canada; the Canadian Institute of International Affairs; the Canadian Institute of Strategic Studies; the Centre for International Studies, University of Toronto; and the Research Program in Stragegic Studies at York University. It seems to me to be an impressive list of sponsors and, in my opinion, the publication contains some valuable observations on the matter of defence, particularly on defence as it concerns Canada and our NATO allies.

Turning to the committee's report, it is primarily concerned with the question of manpower in our armed forces. It draws attention to many matters which the committee believes need careful attention. They are specifically mentioned in the "Summary of Conclusions and Recommendations" which begin on page ix. There are 16 recommendations, all of which are important. However, I do not intend to attempt to deal with all of them this afternoon, but merely wish to draw attention to some particular points—points in the report itself and some points which I believe flow from it.

Our efforts since 1975, or perhaps beginning earlier, in providing security and defence for ourselves and assisting our allies in mutual defence, are, I regret to say, not such as to permit us to have as much pride and satisfaction as we would like. It is true, of course—and I am happy to be able to say this—that in recent years we have obtained over 125 Leopard tanks—which probably are the equal of any other tanks—a substantial number of long range patrol aircraft, at a cost of over $1 billion; a new fleet of two-and-a-half-tonne trucks has been ordered; a program to obtain six new frigates for the navy has been put in train, and we have ordered 138 new fighter aircraft, of which I believe two have been delivered to date. Also other improvements of substance have been made.

However, honourable senators, it is still a fact that our NATO allies look at us as a rather reluctant ally, not willing to pull our own weight even for our own defence protection. It appears that over the years we have been spending on defence a lower portion of our gross national product than any other NATO country except Luxembourg—less than 2 per cent of our GNP. I believe the average for Europe is in the order of 3.6 per cent, and for the United States about 5.5 per cent.

Our effort has improved somewhat in recent years, as I have pointed out, but we are still falling substantially short in our current effort; and, what is a good deal worse, we still have a lot of catching up to do, and we are not doing it very quickly.

For instance, we recall that in 1948 our navy was the third largest in the world, and at that time was as efficient as any navy. It is now hardly able to defend itself in modern warfare. Perhaps I am being kind when I use those relatively moderate words. Even if the program for the six frigates that I mentioned is formally approved and proceeded with in the next few months, it will be nearing 1982 or 1983 before they are all delivered and in service.

An Hon. Senator: I think you mean 1992 and 1993.

● (1600)

Senator Smith: Yes, and I thank the honourable senator for correcting me.

Honourable senators, you have all heard about the helicopter gear box problem which has so incapacitated our helicopter fleet for the time being, and I do not need to enlarge on that. It is necessary to remember, however, that we do have important NATO roles in Europe, and the report considers them at some considerable length.

One of these roles is mentioned on page 5 of the report under the heading "Some Basic Questions," and it is ground defence in central Europe. Another role mentioned on page 10 of the report is the commitment of 4,000 men to be transported to Norway in certain eventualities. The name of that force is shown on page 10 of the report as the Canadian Air-Sea Transportable Force committed to northern Norway, and for convenience it is commonly referred to as CAST. Another role is the use of 2,400 troops designated to augment the Canadian forces in central Europe, also referred to on page 10.

On page 13 the report has this to say about augmentation:

> Augmentation of the land element—building up units in Europe to committed levels during a crisis period preceding hostilities—would add another 2,400 troops to the command and bring its full strength to 7,800—
> One of the major difficulties about Canadian Forces Europe concerns augmentation. A witness from DND noted that augmentation personnel are all in place in Canada, already identified and virtually ready to go in one or two days. However, other observers have expressed fears that a crisis preceding warfare might be a very short one, or else take place in the kind of political atmosphere which would make it difficult to augment troop levels or move to higher states of alert without aggravating the then existing delicate situation. Some of the testimony heard by the sub-committee convinced it that augmentation is a very dubious proposition . . .
> Augmentation seems an uncertain prospect at this time. It might prove completely impractical in various circumstances.

The report discusses the CAST commitment—that is the movement of troops to Norway—at pages 21 and 22. At page 19 the committee says in part:

> —the Sub-committee questions whether Canada should endeavour to improve the present force or to seek alternative NATO tasks for its 4,000 men.
> Doubts about the military viability of the force arose because of the time required to move it from Canada to north Norway and fears that . . . assault on Norway might be a massive one launched without much warning.

Honourable senators, these are just two of the points—that is, the CAST Force and augmentation—with which the committee dealt. Its views about these two points, which I have just quoted, although not in full, are not very comforting to say the least. They lead me to support Senator Molgat's position as to a national debate on the whole question of national defence, as he stated on page 5006 of Debates of the Senate for November 17, 1982. Such a debate would be greatly assisted by the issuance of a government white paper or green paper. I accept Senator Molgat's words as a statement of the situation upon which I could not improve. He states in part:

> So the minister seems favourably disposed, but at this point, if I understand him correctly, he feels that we are not ready for a white paper as such. Well, I accept that. I really do not care if it is a white paper, a green paper or a grey paper; but I believe that what we need is a national debate on the whole question of national defence and armaments.

Honourable senators, I wish to emphasize not only that I agree with Senator Molgat, but that I think this question of a national debate in which many members of the public can join is indeed important.

But there is another good reason for a national debate on defence matters, apart from those I have just mentioned. Senator Molgat spoke about it, and I would refer you again to page 10, shortly after the words I have just read, and I would like to support those words and add something to them.

Senator Molgat drew attention to a newspaper story which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of Monday, October 18, 1982, in which the heading was, "MPs call for cuts in arms spending." He then goes on to say:

> We had three members of the House of Commons travelling across the country in connection with the program Operation Dismantle, and speaking on behalf of disarmament.
> Recently in connection with the decision of the government to increase the amount of money to be spent on job creation, we found that the defence budget was going to be cut by approximately $245 million. Yet, in our report, as a result of the committee's study, we found that there should, in fact, be an increase in expenditures if we are to meet the commitments we have accepted, and if we are to fulfil the tasks that we have set ourselves.

Honourable senators, these I believe are serious matters indeed and further indicate how right Senator Molgat was when he said there was a need for national debate on the subject of defence. But let us look a little further into what is taking place and has taken place in history which it is perhaps desirable to bear in mind.

We all know that Canada has acquitted herself with great distinction when called upon to fight in a cause which Canadians have considered necessary. We also know that Canadians have not been very enthusiastic about defence in times of peace. That is perhaps due in part, perhaps in large measure, to the fact that we have not had to worry about invasion for several generations and have not suffered the consequences of invasion for a very long time indeed. Perhaps our attitude is also in part due to the fact that during the first years of our history as a nation we felt secure behind the shield of the British navy, and that from the end of World War I, or just a little later, to the present time we have had a similar feeling of security behind the shield of our powerful neighbour to the south.

But perhaps, honourable senators, it is also due in part to the fact that out of our total population of about 24 million people over 16 million were born in the year 1937 or thereafter. That means that over two-thirds of our population have no personal recollections of the years leading up to the beginning of the Second World War—that is the years from 1930 to 1939—nor do they have any personal recollection of that terrible event itself. Some of them seem to look at it today as a great catastrophe which happened in the dim and distant past but which does not have much significance for them.

Let me give a very few statistics to remind us just how terrible an event that was, and then I will give a few of the high points of the history of the 1930s leading up to that war.

According to a publication titled "World War II Almanac" by Robert Goralski, which has a 1981 copyright, the total number of battle deaths—that is deaths suffered on the battlefield—by all combatants in that war amounted to 14,900,000, which we all know included 40,000 Canadians. The civilian deaths caused by that war amounted to 38,500,000, making a total of over 53 million deaths brought about by that war.

It was, indeed, a horrendous catastrophe, one which should impress itself upon us now and upon all who come after us. When considered in connection with what led up to it, it should draw a lesson to us that weakness will not deter a potential aggressor.

Let us recall, again as a matter of the history leading up to what we face today, that when we entered World War I we had a total of just a few hundred regular soldiers, no navy, no air force and really no modern armament. But, just to demonstrate what we can do, in a relatively short time we had placed the Canadian Corps on the battlefields of Europe, and they proved themselves the equal of any and better than most of the armies on those battlefields. Since that time perhaps a very necessary realization has faded away—that the ability to defend itself is a fundamental part of any nation's duty to its citizens, perhaps its primary duty.

By the late 1920s a movement for pacifism began to grow across the land until by the mid-1930s it became so strong that defence and everything related to it became anathema to a very large portion of our citizens. Things were not so different in the great countries of the western world.

Then, honourable senators, along came Hitler with his grandiose dreams of world domination and his belief that western powers, particularly France and Britain, had lost the will to fight and perhaps the ability to fight. In March 1938, he put that belief to the test and seized Austria. He was proved right—France and Britain did not fight, nor did anybody else! Now secure in this belief, he set out to obliterate Czechoslovakia.

By a skilful combination of threats and promises, he persuaded France and Britain to join Germany and Italy in the infamous Munich pact of September 29, 1938, giving Hitler a very substantial slice of Czech territory. This was followed by the agreement of November 2, 1938, which Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain of the United Kingdom was persuaded to enter into with Hitler. Many of us remember the press picture of Chamberlain returning to England, waving a copy of this agreement and declaring that he had secured "peace in our time". What folly! Soon Hitler swallowed the rest of Czechoslovakia. Again, France and Britain did not fight but acquiesced. So did the United States. This once more confirmed Hitler's belief that France and Britain did not have the national will to fight. It encouraged him to further acts of aggression which led to war.

Over the years preceding 1938 he knew of the wave of pacifism those countries and our own was experiencing. He knew that in debates at universities, in church halls, in pulpits and other gathering places, many influential people were preaching the gospel that the way to avoid war was to disarm, thus to give a potential aggressor no excuse or provocation to attack you. He knew that on these and many other occasions, resolutions were being passed that the participants would never bear arms and that no war could ever be a just war.

The people who took part in these activities were good people, sincere people and honourable people, who honestly thought they were right. But how events proved them wrong! How their words and conduct encouraged Hitler, the potential and soon the actual aggressor. No wonder he believed that the countries of which they were citizens had not the will to fight. His success with Austria and Czechoslovakia, the Munich agreement and the agreement with Chamberlain, all confirmed this belief.

Thus in 1939 he felt it safe to threaten Poland, and then to attack her on a manufactured excuse. He felt it safe then to ignore the belated attempts of France and Britain to convince him that, after all, they would fight about some things, and that they would fight if he attacked Poland. He did not believe them and for very good reason, keeping in mind the recent history. He attacked Poland. They did fight. And so began the war that took 53 million lives.

You might say what does this have to do with the present situation or with the question of defence now. I say a very great deal. I say that if Britain and France had had the will to fight in 1937 or 1938, Hitler would not have launched his grab for Austria, for Czechoslovakia and for Poland, and there would not have been a war. Had he known that these nations had the will and the means to fight and were ready to fight, he would never had taken the chance that it would be safe to seize Austria in 1938. He would never have gotten to the point where he would have swallowed Czechoslovakia or attacked Poland. But the things that were happening in those countries—Britain and France—led him to believe he could get away with it. So he tried! And 53 million died!

Honourable senators, now I see history repeating itself. Like many of you I have personal recollections of those days and later days. I see Canadians and people in other NATO countries coming to believe that the best way to avoid war is to make sure that you do not have the means to defend yourself.

What a comfort it must be to our chief potential enemies to hear decent, sincere, honest and influential people in NATO countries demonstrating against nuclear arms or for unilateral disarmament apparently without the slightest regard for the position they and we would be in should we follow their advice.

Like Senator Molgat, and like any sensible person in any country, I want to see disarmament. I do not want to see war. I have a very strong revulsion at the possibility of being obliterated by nuclear warfare or any other warfare. I have great revulsion at the thought of my children and my grandchildren, and those who come after them, being obliterated in that way or in any other way. Surely the best way to encourage our potential enemy to think we will not fight is to push for unilateral disarmament, or unbalanced disarmament, or unverifiable disarmament while they are able to continue their nuclear armaments and other armaments without worrying about public opinion.

Like Senator Molgat, I am for disarmament but not under any conditions. Surely disarmament must be mutual, it must be balanced, and it must be verifiable.

How can we avoid situations which the allies allowed themselves to get into in 1938 and 1939? It looks to me as though we are heading that way now, unless there is a great national debate during which all aspects of the problem can be properly discussed, including those I have put forward today. Such a debate is not going to come about without some stirring up. I believe that this subcommittee with its report that we are now discussing, with the work it is now doing and with the work it will do, will help bring about that necessary debate in this country, at least.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in moving the adjournment of the debate I should like to mention that I discussed this matter with Senator Lafond and if no other senator wishes to participate in the debate he will make some closing remarks towards the end of next week.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, pursuant to Notice of November 30, 1982, moved:

> That the name of the Honourable Senator Hastings be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Buckwold on the list of Senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 2, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science presented the following report:

> The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to which was referred Bill C-135 intituled "An Act to amend the National Housing Act (No. 2)", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, November 24, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate, and that the order stand in the name of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, the sponsor of the bill.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to meet at 3:30 next Wednesday afternoon, December 8, 1982, even though the Senate may be sitting at that time, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Would you explain?

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, when I made my brief intervention on supplementary estimates (B) I referred to a speech the Governor of the Bank of Canada made to the Men's Canadian Club in Toronto on November 29.

Following my remarks, Senator Roblin said he was concerned about the statement the Governor of the Bank of Canada made at that time. He wondered if we could call the Governor as a witness before the National Finance Committee, and I said we could do that.

It is possible for the Governor to attend at 3.30 next Wednesday afternoon. We tried for the Thursday, which is our normal meeting day, at 9 a.m. but, unfortunately, he is not available at that time. For that reason we are asking permission of the Senate to meet while the Senate is sitting.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, December 7, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if you will allow me, I realize that we are adjourning, as usual, until next Tuesday. However, I may point out that there is a possibility that, not next week, but the week after, we will be sitting Monday evening, December 13, and perhaps also on the Monday of the following week, because of our workload and the bills that are now before the Senate or are expected to arrive from the other place.

As for the legislation we shall be considering and the business of the Senate, I believe the Leader of the Government is now going to add a few comments.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to expand on what the deputy leader has just said because I think it would be useful for honourable senators to have some background information as to the workload we will be dealing with between now and December 22.

I say December 22 because the other place now has a house order to adjourn on that day. Therefore, it would be useful for honourable senators to have at least some advance indication, if not all the details, of the number of bills that will probably be before us and which we will endeavour to deal with to the point of Royal Assent by the time the other place adjourns on December 22.

Those honourable senators who were present at a committee convened by the chairman of the co-ordinating committee of committee chairmen, Senator Lafond, were given some indication of the number of bills that we can expect. I am simply putting in a few explanatory words now because I know all senators were not at that meeting.

The Senate has already decided to adjourn today until December 7 at 8 o'clock in the evening, which is our usual sitting time, but for the following two weeks beginning on Monday, December 13 and Monday, December 20, it is highly likely that we will have to commence our week's work on those two evenings, and continue to sit as far into the week as necessary. Obviously, December 22 comes before December 24 so that date is not in question. I suggest that the deputy leader and I should discuss some of this detail with the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues so that there is an understanding of what is involved.

From memory, I believe there are eight or nine pieces of legislation, at various stages, before the Senate. However, we will probably receive at least 15 more bills from the House of Commons by the date of adjournment. Hopefully, they will arrive in such a way that we will have an opportunity to deal with them to the satisfaction of all honourable senators.

You will recall, of course, that on Tuesday of this week Senator McIlraith moved a motion respecting the pre-study of all the proposed budgetary bills and financial measures, and that will commence as soon as they are known in the other place. However, there are some other bills, which are well known to the Senate because they have been around for some time but have not yet been studied in committee, and perhaps we should consider doing something about those, too, so that we can at least be in a position to deal with them by the time we adjourn for the Christmas recess.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I simply want to say that we on this side are, of course, disposed to co-operate in order to meet our responsibilities.

It seems to me that the main workload will be for the committees. If we have to sit on Mondays and Fridays, we will be glad to do so. However, it seems to me that, if the House of Commons is able to dispose of those bills in a short period, we should be able to equal their speed without too much difficulty.

In any event, I understand that we will hold discussions next week in order to assess exactly what bills will come to us before the Christmas adjournment.

I understand that the new rules in the other place provide for an adjournment on December 22. However, there is a suggestion that we adjourn on December 22 and return on January 17 unless, if my understanding is correct, we are to commence a new session. Of course, if we commence a new session, it could change our perspective and our way of dealing with the bills. It will soon be three years since the present session started. I do not know if the Leader of the Government can tell us if it is the government's intention to commence a new session in January. This will be the second and probably the last session of this Parliament—at least, we hope it will be the last of this government.

Senator Frith: We can give you a direct answer to that question. The answer is no.

Senator Flynn: That is too bad—not for us, but for the people of Canada. After all, we are used to sitting on this side, and if we have to sit here for another year, we can stand it, but the people of Canada may not be able to afford that.

I have been unable to get a smile from Senator Robichaud, which is too bad.

Senator Frith: There, you got one.

Senator Flynn: In any event, should we anticipate a new session commencing in January or the continuance of this far-too-lengthy session?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, since I am not authorized to do so, I cannot make an announcement as to when a new session, beginning with a Speech from the Throne, will commence.

I appreciate the Leader of the Opposition's comments that he will give us full co-operation. I would suggest to him that the target would be to pass all the legislation that comes to us, all of which is now known to senators on both sides of the house. We should set a target to try to deal effectively and efficiently with all matters on the Order Paper by the evening of December 22 and to have Royal Assent at that time. However, I have to say also that while that order has been made there is always reserved the right of the Speaker to recall the House of Commons. The motion, as it now stands, is from December 22 to January 17.

Senator Flynn: As a matter of curiosity, could I ask whether the new rules applicable in the other place would prevent the government from deciding to have a new session start later than January 17, without recalling Parliament?

Senator Olson: I think the answer is no, it does not prevent that. I do not know how far I should go. I think it is the hope that we would clean up those pieces of legislation, of which there are a number, that are very important to Canada and Canadians, by the time we adjourn on December 22. However, there are several alternative scenarios, in the event that we are unable to complete that package.

Senator Flynn: My understanding is that prorogation is not affected by the new rules in the other place, so it is possible that Parliament could be recalled on January 17 just to adjourn until a further date, when a new session would start. Possibly Parliament could be recalled merely for prorogation on January 17.

Senator Olson: That is possible, but I would expect that that is not likely. If Parliament is recalled, for whatever announced reason, prorogation could take place on January 17 or January 18. However, I think the likely thing is that a new session would begin immediately or the next day.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate permit a question arising out of his remarks?

Senator Olson: Yes.

Senator McIlraith: It is obvious from the discussion that has been going on that the new rules in the other place are of direct interest and concern to us in relation to our work in the Senate. Would he consider having these new rules assembled and distributed to all senators?

Senator Olson: Yes, I can give that undertaking. I am wondering, however, if they are not printed in the Hansard of the other place, so that they are indeed already available. If that is not so, I will try to obtain them.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question, the necessity for which perhaps arises only because I did not hear him well. When he was talking about coming back on Monday, December 13, and Monday, December 20, I did not hear whether he was thinking about the evening or the afternoon.

Senator Olson: I do not think I said that.

Senator Frith: I did; I said the evening.

Senator Olson: The deputy leader advises that he did say it would be in the evening, and that would be acceptable. However, I suppose when we look at the committee load that will result from the number of bills I mentioned, we might also want to consider having some committee meetings on the Monday afternoon preceding the sitting of the Senate in the evening.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

NEWFOUNDLAND—CORNER BROOK—ANNOUNCED CLOSURE OF BOWATER PULP AND PAPER MILL

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has to do with a very sad situation in which another town, another community and another industry is on the verge of deterioration. I refer to the announced closing of the Bowater Pulp and Paper Mill in Corner Brook, Newfoundland, where 746 people will be laid off, and one of its most efficient paper machines, No. 7, will be closed down. In view of the fact that the Bowater Corporation has been a good corporate citizen—it owns five or six mills across Europe and also mills in both the United States and Canada—can the Leader of the Government say if the government is aware of the situation and whether any action has been taken as a result of this disturbing announcement?

• (1425)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yes, the government is aware of the situation, because obviously the honourable senator and I both know that this matter has received a good deal of publicity, and indeed there have been some in-depth journalistic attempts to explain it.

I am not sure whether there has been some formal notice sent to the government, but I will attempt to find out. I will also make a reference to the appropriate minister in response to the other part of the honourable senator's question.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, the problem of the Bowater mill situation could be more far-reaching because in central Newfoundland we have the Abitibi Price paper mill which is almost as large as the Bowater mill. Also, approximately 50 miles away, there is another paper mill in Stephenville. The problem is therefore far-reaching when we consider the escalating effect on the number of people employed in that industry and the resulting offshoot industries. When we consider what Chrysler means to Windsor, Ontario; what Massey means to Brantford, Ontario; what de Havilland means to Toronto; and what Canadair means to Montreal, and the government's action in that regard, the effect of the Bowater situation could be most far-reaching and should receive similar support. Could the Leader of the Government treat this matter as an extraordinary emergency and, in addition to taking the question as notice, consider what immediate action can be taken to either contact Bowater, or have the minister responsible for economic development enter the picture immediately so that any further deterioration of the situation can be corrected?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I consider it most appropriate for me to say at this stage, without going into detail—I am not, of course, authorized to commit the government at this stage—that the government is keenly aware of the significant impact that those mills have on the community, in view of the fact that they are employers of such a high percentage of people in those communities.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, as a final supplementary and further to the situation in Newfoundland, having regard for the whole of the pulp and paper industry, and also the forest industry, across Canada, which is so vital to our economy, would the Leader of the Government obtain a short resume from the minister on the immediate, short-term and long-term future of this industry, particularly in connection with Newfoundland, where so many jobs will be lost and the economy of the province may be seriously affected.

Senator Olson: Yes, I will try to obtain that.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question supplementary to that asked by Senator Marshall. As the honourable senator pointed out, Bowater is a multinational corporation. Could the Leader of the Government ascertain whether the corporation has closed any of its mills in other countries?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that question can be included in the reference I shall make to the minister. I will ensure that it is included as part of the inquiry.

LEGISLATION

BILL S-31—STUDY BY LIBERAL CAUCUS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in connection with Bill S-31. I am sure that honourable senators are aware that the Liberal caucus has appointed a special committee to consider Bill S-31. That committee includes, I believe, two senators. One is, I believe, Senator Riel, but I cannot recall the name of the other senator. The special committee has indicated that it will make a report on approximately January 17. My question is whether there is any necessity for the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to report on that bill before we have the views of that special committee. Of course, the views of the committee will be most important because they will be looked upon favourably by the government. So I would appreciate it if the Leader of the Government would reply to that question first.

● (1430)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think we have to take the words and description of the Leader of the Opposition, who moved the motion that the subject matter of Bill S-31 be sent to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee for the purpose of considering the federal-provincial relations aspect of that bill—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): As to background.

Senator Olson: —and to obtain some background—and I am paraphrasing the Leader of the Opposition—to assist in the determination of second reading, agreement in principle. I think that is almost precisely what he said.

Senator Flynn: I am not contesting your description, but I am wondering what conclusion you will come to.

Senator Olson: I take it that the Leader of the Opposition agrees so far. If that is so, then I think he and I would both agree that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee has done a good job of complying with the wishes of the Senate in accepting the subject matter as it was sent to it.

Now we come to the next part of Senator Flynn's comments, whether or not there should be some recommendations or changes. I am sure you will agree with me that agreement in principle is determined on the floor of this chamber at second reading, before which time the question of recommendations is really not in order. Therefore, we ought to have the bill before this chamber so that we can have a debate and vote on the matter, after we have complied with Senator Flynn's request and the committee has given us the background to assist us in the consideration of whether or not we should agree with the principles involved in Bill S-31.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government has given a long reply but has said nothing that is very precise. I would point out to the leader that we agreed to the motion, that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, because the main thrust of the bill deals with federal-provincial relations. But there is nothing in the motion restricting the debate to that point.

Senator Frith: No, background.

Senator Olson: That is the argument.

Senator Flynn: That is the argument on the side opposite, but not on my side. I said "principally" and I insisted that it be "principally." In any event, when we are dealing with the subject matter of the bill I think that the preoccupation of that special committee formed by the Liberal caucus, or the supporters of the government, will have much to do with the position our committee can take on the subject matter. Honourable senators can imagine what would happen if we were to force debate on second reading and the committee came up with something entirely different. We would look silly, and though we have looked silly on previous occasions, I would like us to avoid it in the future. When I mentioned in committee that there was opposition to the bill from the provinces, the Honourable André Ouellet, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, replied that only the Province of Quebec was objecting to the bill and that I did not know what I was talking about. In view of the fact that British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario, Quebec and Newfoundland are objecting to the bill and that Mr. Ouellet, according to hearsay, is going to consult with the provinces, it seems to me that this is another reason why the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee should not be urged to report on the subject matter before this meeting has been held and we find out whether Mr. Ouellet is willing to change his stance to some extent. He will probably be influenced by this meeting and by the special committee of the Liberal caucus.

● (1435)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I appreciate the comments made by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition. I think they entirely support the idea that we really ought to have Bill S-31 in the formal possession of a body which can deal with amendments. At the present time the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is not formally in possession of the bill. It is in possession of a reference, which has to do with the subject matter of the bill.

It seems to me that it would be of assistance to everyone involved if we were to accept with appreciation the work that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee has done in compliance with the specific task—a task which is at least narrower than dealing with the totality of the bill—that was given to it. We could be of assistance by bringing matters to the next stage, namely, the debate on the principle of the bill. As the Leader of the Opposition well knows, after a bill receives second reading it is usual to refer it to committee for consideration. At that time the committee is in a position to take some action and consider all aspects, including amendments.

Matters do not end there. The bill goes through third reading, following which there are a number of other stages through which the bill must pass in the other place, including a committee to which my honourable friend alludes but really has no authority for doing so, because caucus committees are not usually matters of public information. In any event, during these other stages there is a great deal of opportunity for input into the bill.

I repeat, honourable senators, that the greatest service we could provide is to put the bill into a position where the body that is in formal and legal possession of it is competent to deal with any criticisms that may be made.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not think that the Leader of the Government and I agree as to the meaning of a referral of the subject matter of a bill to a committee before second reading. It is because we want to know all of the circumstances surrounding the bill that we refer the subject matter to a committee. This provides the means by which to assess the position we are going to take on second reading.

The elements that I have mentioned—namely, the view of that special committee of the Liberal caucus and the views that may flow from a meeting of the minister with representatives of the objecting provinces—are elements which are very important for the committee to consider at the stage where it looks at the subject matter. When the committee deals with the subject matter it can, without adopting formal amendments, recommend changes which are, in practice, the equivalent of amendments.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It is done all the time.

Senator Flynn: It seems to me to be silly for the Leader of the Government to say that we will deal with the principle of the bill and will consider all of these aspects afterwards. Once we have adopted the principle of the bill, we are tied into this position. Suppose the minister were to come to the conclusion that the bill ought to be withdrawn because it was ill-conceived? That is quite possible. We would look silly indeed if we were to have adopted the principle of the bill only to be faced with a ministerial decision of that kind.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could make a fairly convincing argument, one which might even convince my honourable friend—

Senator Flynn: Try again!

Senator Olson: —centred around the idea that the Senate is a deliberative body.

Senator Flynn: So are the committees.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: My honourable friend knows the process when bills are introduced in the Senate for first reading. He also knows that, in our deliberative function, we are to deal with the principle involved at second reading. It is after that point and not until we reach that point—and I could dig up all of the authorities for saying this, as I used to do 15 or 20 years ago when I did this kind of thing every day—

Senator Flynn: You probably did not understand it.

Senator Olson: Yes, I understood very well and I recall my understanding very well. I suppose I should not go into that because I do not intend to make that argument now.

I think that we have done the Senate a service, in compliance with the request of the Leader of the Opposition, by providing some background information to the federal and provincial aspects which are involved. We are in a better position to consider whether or not to support the principle of the bill, and the debate on that, in the deliberative nature of this chamber, takes place on the floor here. After that, as a matter of course, the bill goes to committee where amendments can be suggested, if it is the will of the committee to recommend amendments to this place, and those can be adopted at third reading.

My honourable friend knows all of that quite well, but now he is trying to have us go through all of those stages before the Senate is in formal possession of the bill and before it has dealt with the principle of the bill, and that, as he knows, has always been the first stage in the debate either in this chamber or in the other place.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Will the honourable gentleman permit a question? As one who serves on that committee I have listened carefully to the discussion that has taken place this afternoon. The impression I have had is that the reason this chamber referred the bill to committee in the first place was that we should look into and understand all of the constitutional aspects of the bill. In order to do that it was necessary, and still is necessary, for us to look into and understand the attitudes of the various provinces. However, in listening to the discussion this afternoon, the impression I receive from the Leader of the Government is that there is no need to know what the provinces think. In effect he tells us, "You know the provinces are opposed to the bill, but you don't have to wait to find out their reasons. You don't need to discuss it with them. Just send it back to the Senate chamber." In other words, we are being told not to do the very thing which caused the bill to be referred to us in the first place.

Putting my question quite simply, was I not correct in understanding that it was to examine the constitutional aspects of the bill that it was referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee in the first place?

Senator Olson: I would find a higher level of agreement with that. I believe Senator Flynn said earlier today that he did not restrict his submission to that position. I guess you will have to sort it out between you.

Senator Frith: He did say it earlier in opposition, in fairness.

Senator Olson: Yes, he did say it. That is right.

Senator Donahoe: On a point of privilege, I wish to make it clear that I did not say that that was the only reason. I said it was the main reason alleged by the other side of the house that the bill was sent to committee. I did not say it was the only reason I agree with what Senator Flynn had to say, but the other side obviously does not because they have advanced a different reason.

Hon. John Godfrey: Honourable senators, if I may join in this debate, in my opinion, once the subject matter of a bill is referred to committee the whole matter is open and it is irrelevant what anyone's motives were in sending it there. In point of fact, once we began our hearings on this matter it became obvious that it was not the minister's intention to have the bill pass through the Senate. He told us he was not restricting us to any particular aspect, such as federal-provincial relations, but that he would be interested in hearing any suggestions we had, that he would consider our recommendations and would introduce a new bill in the House of Commons—not in the Senate. Consequently, there is no need whatsoever for a second reading debate here.

Moreover, the actual hearings have taken place. We listened to Mr. Parizeau for four hours. You may recall that he told us he was not here to discuss federal-provincial relations, admitting that he was not an expert on the Constitution and that he would have legal opinions in that respect. He confined himself exclusively to the economic questions.

I must say that I thoroughly disagree with Senator Flynn's suggestion that we should wait for a report from the Liberal caucus before we decide what a Senate committee will do. In my opinion the Senate committee should look at it on a non-partisan basis and should make recommendations only. It should not move amendments. The minister simply wants our recommendations so that he can take them into consideration before introducing an amended bill—and I am sure the bill will be amended in many ways. Then, when the bill comes to the Senate, after having gone through the House of Commons, we can vote on the principle of the bill as it will then be, as opposed to voting on what we have now, which I suspect will be heavily amended after the House of Commons hears from our committee.

Senator Flynn: On a point of privilege, I was merely attempting to help the government side, when I suggested waiting for the caucus committee to report. I should have thought it was obvious your side is more interested in their views than we are.

Senator Godfrey: The fact is they should want to hear from us. We should be influencing them.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I appreciate the comments that have been made and the offer of co-operation on a number of points. Perhaps we ought to have some further discussions about this as early next week as possible. We might then have a better understanding of the progress that can be made.

Senator Roblin: I should like to refer to one aspect of my honourable friend's comments. He left me with the impression that, if we refer the subject matter of a bill to a committee for study, we should not be making any amendments to the bill. I see that point. It is not before us, so we do not amend it in any official sense. However, I would like him to recognize that it has been the custom in the Senate, in sending bills to committee for a pre-study of the subject matter, to receive a report from the committee with recommendations. Well, we have sent the subject matter of this bill to committee and I don't see why we should feel constrained to deal with it in any way different from the way my honourable friend Salter Hayden dealt with the subject matter of Bill C-42 in connection with oil expropriation in the Arctic and the 25 per cent back-in. He reported to this chamber on the substance of the bill with a clear recommendation of what the committee thought about it.

I should like to be assured that there is no suggestion that our Constitution committee, seized with the subject matter only, is thereby barred from making suggestions or recommendations for the improvement of the legislation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we can have a longer debate on this question, but Senator Roblin is once again mixing apples and oranges. It is true that the subject matter of a bill, especially a Commons bill, is often referred to a committee of this house, and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has usually been the recipient of such subject matter, but that happens only after the Commons bill has been introduced at first reading, before there is any debate on it but after its contents are known.

With respect to Bill S-31, the situation is substantially and significantly different—and what I am about to say adds significantly to my argument that this is a deliberative body—in that we introduced the bill in the Senate and when we entered into second reading we were formally in possession of the bill. It was formally before us with everything that flows from that fact.

That has happened before, although it is unusual, but it should be plain that that is not the same thing as taking the bill out of the Senate before second reading and sending the subject matter to a committee, because in this case we have already had the bill before us and we can deal with it in that sense.

Senator Flynn: You are all mixed up.

Senator Roblin: I don't like to continue this discussion because it is getting into a rarified academic atmosphere, but the plain fact is that, when you refer the subject matter of a bill to the committee for examination, you do refer the subject matter of the bill to the committee for examination. It does not matter where the bill came from in this case or what its provenance was; that is what you have done, and our clear precedent in this house is that in such a case the committee can report back with recommendations.

Is my honourable friend telling me that this committee will examine this bill in its present state and then report to this house without having made any comment on what it thinks is good or bad about the bill? If that is the case, just what are we doing? Surely we are being asked to make that judgment. That is my point.

Senator Olson: I think your point is badly taken, if I may say so. The reason I say that is that if we were going to change the entire process of dealing with legislation in the Parliament of Canada, we could have a proposal put before us in terms of a bill, a motion or whatever, and refer the subject matter to a committee to answer all the questions that my honourable friend has raised, when he says the entire bill is before the committee.

Senator Flynn: You don't understand the process at all. Poor you!

Senator Olson: I agree that that is one way in which the Parliament of Canada could function, but it is not the way the Parliament of Canada does function.

● (1450)

What was done under the so-called Hayden formula was to refer the subject matter of a bill to a committee for the committee's consideration and recommendations. That was done because it was not possible for us at that stage to be in legal possession of the bill. Of course, we are not in legal possession of a bill until the bill has passed all stages in the other place.

The honourable senator says that that is a practice, but it is not a practice to take the subject-matters of Senate bills and refer them to committees so that all questions on them are answered before we are seized with the deliberative action we are required to undertake with regard to such bills. In the case of the so-called Hayden formula, the bill was before the Senate. I do not believe we can slough it off by saying, "We will refer it to a committee, obtain all the answers before we debate the bill, and either approve or disapprove of the principle of the bill." If that were the case, that would abrogate our responsibility of being a deliberative body at each stage, and that responsibility is well defined in Canadian parliamentary practice and the practice of other parliaments. One cannot argue that that is a proper or even a traditional way of dealing with bills or other motions that are before this deliberative body.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend believes what he has said, why did he support the proposition that the bill be referred to the committee for that kind of study?

Senator Olson: I was impressed by the pleading of the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend did not really consider the matter carefully if he responded in that manner.

The bill was referred to the committee, and he has to accept the consequences of that action. If my honourable friend wants to attend a meeting of that committee and tell its members that they cannot present a report to the Senate which contains any recommendations, I invite him to do so, but he will find that more than one member of that committee will object to that kind of high-handed procedure.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Olson: That is not a high-handed procedure by any stretch of the imagination. The committee has indeed complied with the request made by the Senate, after the plea by the Leader of the Opposition, to assist honourable senators with some background information relating to the federal-provincial aspects of the bill.

The argument has been made that some of the witnesses who appeared before the committee did not deal with that aspect of the bill. Senator Godfrey made that point, but I do not think that the committee or any honourable senator can tell witnesses who appear before a committee what to say. The discussion that preceded referring the bill to the committee, and the acquiescence by this side of the house, was for that purpose.

If Mr. Parizeau chooses to say that he is not prepared to deal with that aspect of the bill, he has the right to say so, but that does not take away from the purpose for which the bill was referred to the committee.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to make another interjection. When the telegram was sent to the premiers from the chairman of the committee, the telegram indicated that the members of the committee were interested in the federal-provincial aspects of the bill. There was an open discussion on that subject before we heard from any witnesses, and the consensus of the committee was that the committee not be confined to that. I believe the witnesses were told that, and the telegram, to that extent, was amended.

The one point I should like to make regarding this matter is that, admittedly, it is not traditional to refer the subject matter of a bill to a committee, but that can be helpful on occasion. I have been advocating that procedure for years. This is obviously one of those occasions.

I should like to draw the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to the report of the Canadian Bar Association on parliamentary reform, which was issued in August 1982. It is a well written and thoughtful report. They recommend that non-partisan and contentious bills—a category in which I think we could place this one—be referred to committee for consideration of their subject matter before second reading debate, so that the committee could make recommendations. Then, having those recommendations before them, parliamentarians would be in a much better position to debate the bill and approve or disapprove of the principle of the bill.

Why we should be bothering with the principle of the bill right now, or even have any discussion on this, I do not know. The minister has said that all he wants from the Senate are recommendations so that he can re-draft the bill and submit it to the House of Commons.

Senator Frith: Since we are still on Question Period, may I suggest that we consider this question duly debated and that the matter be discussed between the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition when they discuss the business of the Senate?

There have been a number of informative and helpful interventions which the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition can consider.

Senator Flynn: They were more helpful to him than to me.

Senator Frith: As you will. I hope that they were helpful to all, but I suggest that we now continue with Question Period.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege, since I am a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The Order of the Day reads as follows:

> For the Day that the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs—

If I understand correctly, the discussion which has just taken place concerned the nature, content or substance of the report of the committee. If the report of the committee does not include recommendations or proposals of any kind, what kind of report will it be? Will the committee simply report that it met three times, four times, six times, and nothing else?

As a member of that committee I should like to feel that we can report on the substance of a bill. If we do not include recommendations or comments, or anything of that kind, what will we report on—our thinking?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, one thing that everyone has agreed to is that it is the committee that will decide what it will do with the subject matter of the bill.

I am sure that Senator Tremblay's question of privilege will be carefully taken into account. His remarks, along with the other remarks made today, will be available on Tuesday when the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition meet to discuss what we will do with the legislation that is before us.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION—SALE OF EVAPORATED MILK TO LIBYA

Hon. C. William Doody: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate clarify a matter of policy for me?

I understand that the Canadian Dairy Commission has confirmed that it sold evaporated milk to Libya in 1981, in direct defiance of the Canadian policy regarding the anti-Israeli boycott.

Could the minister inform the Senate as to why that was so, and what has been done about it? Does the government not abide by its anti-Israeli boycott policy, and if not, is the policy only to be directed at private firms and not at crown corporations or government agencies? Does the government believe that it is acceptable for a crown corporation or government agency to flout the rules laid down by its own master, the government?

I wonder if the minister could assure as that this is not a common practice, and that no other crown corporations or government agencies are engaged in flouting the laws of Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I, too, have read what I think is press speculation as to whether that is correct or not. I am not now going to argue one way or the other whether it was a violation of a least two aspects of government policy, first of all, with respect to the sale, and, secondly, to the vessels the milk was carried in.

I shall take Senator Doody's question as notice and refer it to the Department of External Affairs. I am sure they will offer comments on whether they agree with the speculative interpretation to which he has referred.

Senator Doody: While the leader is obtaining that information for me, perhaps he should also check to see whether the Department of External Affairs has grounds to take action against the Globe and Mail. I ask that because, according to the Globe and Mail:

> External Affairs Department officials confirmed yesterday that a document that paved the way for the deal contained two requirements that contravene Ottawa's rules, one a certificate of origin that could be interpreted as discriminating against Israel, and the other an inadequate certificate dealing with shipping via Arab-blacklisted vessels or ports.

If this is speculation, then I suggest that the Globe and Mail should be asked to apologize and retract the quotation ascribed to officials of the Department of External Affairs.

I also ask the minister to find out, assuming that the information is correct, what disciplinary action the government intends taking against the Canadian Dairy Commission. Mr. Gilles Choquette, the chairman of that commission indicated that it sold the milk through a third party—a co-operative in Quebec—because it could not legally carry out the sale itself. If this is so, I ask the minister to tell us what action has be taken against the commission.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will include all of those comments in the inquiry that will go forward.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY
THE ENVIRONMENT

SPACE EXPLORATION—OIL SPILL CLEAN-UPS—CO-ORDINATING AGENCIES

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In his former role he was co-ordinating a number of government programs into a logical, coherent pattern. My question is: How effective would that same kind of philosophy of co-ordination become with respect to planning for aerospace exploration and technology? We spend a great deal of money on, and are very pleased with, Canada's achievements but many departments are involved. Does the government consider, with respect to space exploration and technology, that there should be one agency similar to the NASA agency in the United States to co-ordinate this work?

Honourable senators, I have another question concerning an oil spill in the Arctic and it again deals with co-ordination of the many departments that are involved. I read recently where one of the chemical engineers said, "I do not know who would take responsibility. There are so many departments but there is no one in charge." Could the minister check into that also?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in response to the first question with respect to the space exploration and co-ordination of the various departments and branches that are involved in that, Senator Thompson will recall that the responsibilities of the Minister of State for Science and Technology have now been transferred to the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development. That, of course, will lead significantly to the kind of co-ordinating functions that that department can perform in several aspects. One function will be to have an overall look at the financing that is going into various efforts that are being made in that high technology sector. In any event, I will also get an update insofar as that co-ordinating effort is concerned.

I am also aware of some other aspects—not only responsibility for cleaning up an oil spill—of development that is expected to take place in the northern part of Canada, but I will have to make an inquiry and get an update as to where that is at the moment between several departments, EMR, Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of the Environment.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

CANADA-POLAND GRAIN SALE CONTRACT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Can the minister tell us whether it is internal problems within the Canadian Wheat Board or difficulties regarding agricultural problems in GATT, or perhaps a hardening of Canadian foreign policy, that are delaying any initiation of a Canada-Poland grain sale contract? I ask this on an urgent basis because we know that the present Canada-Poland grain contract expires on December 31 of this year, and that grain products in Poland are in very short supply at the present time.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, Senator Haidasz has raised a very important question. Certainly, there is nothing within the Canadian Wheat Board operation that really bears on the question that is put by him. The Canadian Wheat Board is always looking for sales to countries, and arrangements whereby the Wheat Board and the farmers get fully paid and where there is virtually no risk attached to those sales by way of a possible default on payment.

Last year Canada provided a $500 million credit to Poland. I think everybody would agree that that was a very large sum of money. Canada has been supplying credit to Poland since 1956, and over the years payments in general have been made. When payments have been delayed there has been a rather steady increase in the amount of the ceiling governing the total loans. I am informed that Poland owes Canada today $1,225,000,000 by way of outstanding loans.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is that only for wheat?

Senator Argue: No, but it is mainly for wheat.

Poland is in bad financial shape and is having great difficulty meeting its payments. Canada agreed, in concert with 15 western creditor countries, to reschedule over eight years, including a four-year grace period, 90 per cent of Poland's principal and interest payments falling due from May 1 to December 31, 1981. I am informed that for this period of grace, nothing by way of principal or interest is to be collected. Payments in connection with the remaining 10 per cent are being met.

As Senator Haidasz said there is, in effect, a current wheat agreement which expires on December 31. The question arises whether Canada should—and I presume Poland would wish it—undertake additional credit to Poland which would result in increasing the current ceiling beyond the $1,225,000,000. That particular question is under consideration.

Personally, I feel that, in considering this policy, the government should arrive at a conclusion that really has nothing to do with whether or not the Canadian Wheat Board may wish to make a given sale. This kind of international policy needs to be based not on what one might perceive as Canada's needs for a market, but rather on our general attitude toward Poland in these difficult times, and whether or not, with those things in mind, we should make provision for additional credit to Poland.

Sometimes politicians are not all that helpful and when we have made credit arrangements for Poland we have sometimes been very severely criticized. The Leader of the Opposition, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, is reported in the press as saying that "Canada keeps lending money and technology to the faltering economies of the Soviet bloc countries." I think we should look at Poland's needs from the standpoint of Canadians interested in the welfare of the people of that country. We must bear in mind that these are very difficult times from a financial point of view and from the point of view of assessing what Canada should do under these circumstances.

I can only tell the honourable senator that this whole question is being considered, but a decision has not yet been arrived at. When a decision has been made, I will be happy to convey it to him.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Is Canada the only wheat supplier to Poland, or are other countries involved?

Senator Argue: I would have to check into that since I do not know the precise answer. However, I think it is pretty obvious that Canada is the main supplier, having supplied 1.5 million tonnes of wheat to that country this year.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the same subject, if I heard the minister correctly, he tells me that the re-scheduling of the Polish debt has postponed the payment of the present debt for eight or ten years.

Senator Argue: Eight years.

Senator Roblin: Would this mean that any further extension of credit to Poland for the purchase of wheat would have to take its place at the end of that queue? It would seem to me that would probably be the case.

If so, if we are to do anything, we might as well give them the wheat because at present day interest rates, discounted over eight years, there will be no return in any event. Would the minister give some consideration to that aspect of the problem?

Senator Argue: On Senator Roblin's assumptions, I suppose it might follow that, if payment is going to be that much delayed, perhaps a gift should be made.

However, as I understand the arrangements, the interest has not been cancelled; the interest will accumulate. There are those who believe—and I think some of them are pretty sound economists—that Poland is likely to be able to make an economic turnaround and that, in the future, she is likely to be able to meet all her outstanding obligations, including her obligations to Canada.

I do not want to disclose the many options being considered, but I think one could imagine that one of the options that might be considered would be an extension of credit, but on a basis that would provide for a quicker repayment for the new credit. However, those things are only under consideration, and the conclusions are impossible to forecast.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I agree that it is probably not very productive to try to probe any deeper into the government's plan. I would simply make the comment that, based on present values, money payable eight years from now is not going to be worth very much. I would also say to my honourable friend that probably the other creditors of Poland would have something to say about advancing Canada in the queue. If my honourable friend expects to finance the deal on any commercial basis, I would suggest that he will have some real problems, but he is the one who has to worry about that.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would congratulate the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board on starting to read the remarks of the Right Honourable Joe Clark. I will expect to find him much more effective inside and outside of the chamber now that he has started to study Mr. Clark.

I would ask the minister why the Canadian farmer, the producer, has to pay his expenses immediately while those who are buying wheat have eight years to pay for it.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, since Poland is in difficulty and is in a position of getting into arrears with what she owes us, I think that all of the 15 western creditor countries, of which Canada was one, were wise to re-schedule the payment over a period of time.

If a creditor is having difficulty, you cannot go through a system of bankruptcies on the international market and, therefore, from Canada's point of view, this is the best possible arrangement. It is certainly something that I think was the best possible arrangement under very difficult circumstances.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have another question that I should like to address to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, which relates to the progress being made in resolving the differences of opinion which exist in the country about the Crow rate.

I believe the minister has accepted the paternity of a third proposal with respect to the Crow, and that is never to break the log-jam between those who want the farmer to receive the government subsidy and those who think it should go to the railway.

Would he please let me know whether he can describe what his plan is and whether it really is an official proposal of the department, or whether it is just a balloon that is being floated to see whether, in fact, it can attract some support?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I took no specific plan to any organizations with whom I had discussions. From time to time recently, I have discussed whether, if certain provisions were made, some of those organizations who are opposed to the proposals in Dr. Gilson's report might be able to agree. If changes were made, they might be able to agree to at least substantial parts of the Gilson proposal. In any discussions I have had it has been assumed that the main provisions of the Gilson report would result in a fifty-fifty sharing between the producers and the government by 1990-91. As I say, I took no concrete proposals to these other organizations.

From time to time, including recently, I have discussed with them whether some variation of the Gilson report might result in their support.

Senator Roblin: Somebody has been making a proposal because the details have been published, and the story I have is that sources confirmed this week that a third option surfaced from the office of Senator Hazen Argue, Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. The "sources" are apparently those in his own office.

I do not know what the status of this proposal is, but what attracted my attention to it was the fact that it suggested that the farmer should get no payment, that it should go directly to the railways; and that the farmer's share of the freight rate cost would double in 1983 from $150 million extra, which is the Gilson proposal, to $300 million under this proposal which, apparently, has emanated from the minister's office.

I should like to know whether that is a fair statement of the general proposition that has been floated, or whether it is an incorrect assessment.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I have nothing further to add to what I already said. I have discussed with the leaders of some of the farm organizations whether, if there were certain modifications to the Gilson proposal, they would be prepared to come on side. Whatever I have discussed with them would not change, over the period in question, the farmer's proportion of the cost of transportation.

Senator Roblin: I hate to press the minister on this, but the report specifically states that the cost to the farmer would double from $150 million to $300 million in 1983. This is compared to the increase proposed by Dr. Gilson, which would be an increase of $21 million as opposed to $150 million. These are fairly substantial numbers.

The report goes on to say that the treasury is relieved by this extra amount that the farmers are paying compared to what the Gilson report had in mind.

In view of the great interest in my own province in reaching some solution to the Crow, if the minister cannot make any advance on the statement he has given now, would he be kind enough to consider preparing a statement on this and letting me have it at his earliest convenience?

Senator Argue: I do not think I will have anything to add to what I have already said, but I am prepared to consider the request of the honourable senator. I took no detailed statement to the leaders with whom I spoke.

THE ECONOMY

NEWFOUNDLAND—CORNER BROOK—ANNOUNCED CLOSURE OF BOWATER PULP AND PAPER MILL

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order, and it relates to my question on the laying off of Bowater's employees.

In view of the fact that we will be adjourning until Tuesday, would the minister treat the question with some urgency and attempt to have an answer in my office either tomorrow or by Monday?

• (1520)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I can give the honourable senator an undertaking that I will make the inquiry. I cannot give him an undertaking on behalf of somebody else. Although I am part of a very competent and conscientious government, I cannot give an undertaking to give a reply as early as tomorrow.

Hon. Robert Muir: It is urgent.

Senator Olson: It is urgent, that is true. It is also very complex, and some views have to be obtained from the companies involved. The honourable senator has asked me to give him an undertaking to get an answer by tomorrow. I suppose I can give an undertaking to get a reply tomorrow, but it may not be a complete answer because of the qualifications.

Senator Marshall: Bearing in mind that the question might have been asked in the other place, would he do what he says he will do?

Senator Olson: Yes, he will do what he says he will do.

[Senator Roblin.]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—CANADA-FRANCE MARITIME BOUNDARY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers. The first is in response to a question asked by Senator Marshall on November 30, concerning negotiations between Canada and France relating to the maritime boundaries between St. Pierre and Miquelon and Canada.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs informs me that the negotiators who will represent Canada on this question have not yet been chosen.

In any case, it is the minister who carries the responsibility for such matters, not his officials. The officials are given a mandate to negotiate on behalf of the minister, operate under his authority and are responsible to him. As such, it is felt that it would be inappropriate to divulge their names.

The government has not yet been informed who will be negotiating on behalf of the French government in this matter.

THE SENATE

REFORM—TERMS OF REFERENCE OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a relatively short answer to a question asked yesterday by Senator Thompson concerning the Senate delegation to Australia.

The Senate delegation to Australia went there as a result of a long-standing invitation from the Government of Australia.

The Senate delegation went to Australia under the authority of the Speaker, who unfortunately was not able to lead the delegation because of previous commitments. The trip was organized through regular channels of the Parliamentary Relations Secretariat. The senators who made up the delegation were Senators Perrault, Frith, Flynn, Roblin and Buckwold.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: May I ask a question supplementary to that reply?

Senator Olson: It is normal to wait until I have given the other delayed answers.

[Later:]

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to put the supplementary question I wanted to ask earlier. First of all, I want to say that I in no way question that it was a first-rate group of senators who went to Australia. I know they are hard-working and intelligent, and deserve all the other adjectives that have been used. It is because I am something of a doubting Thomas about the effectiveness of an elected upper house, that I would have hoped that amongst that group there might have been a doubting Thomas. I might say that I do not think I would have had the physical energy to make the trip and complete the heavy itinerary they had. However, among us there may be a doubting Thomas with respect to an elected upper house who might have gone. In view of the meticulous care taken to see that all delegations are fairly balanced, I find it unfortunate that I think all those who went expressed some kind of approach in favour of an elected Senate, which will make it all the harder to debate against them.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I really do not wish to comment on the make-up of the delegation. I think it was excellent. I do not want to repeat what I said the other day, but I meant it sincerely. If we get to the order, as I hope we do in a few minutes, we will get some expansion of what that delegation saw. I hope the honourable senator's doubting Thomas characteristics will provoke him to ask some questions so that he will be satisfied that it was a very useful trip.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question arising out of the answer the Leader of the Government gave to Senator Marshall yesterday.

I find it hard to believe that Australia would extend an invitation for the specific purpose of having an elected Canadian Senate. I will consider this to be undue interference in Canadian affairs by the Australian government. Could the minister table a copy of the invitation so that all senators could see it?

Senator Olson: No, I cannot give that undertaking. I will try to obtain it, but I think there will be an appropriate time in a few minutes—

Hon. D. G. Steuart: We can drop over any time.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): By telephone.

Senator Olson: Those kinds of questions can be asked in a few minutes, I hope. The undertaking I gave was to Senator Thompson with respect to the basis on which the delegation was put together, and I have already done that. There will be an opportunity for Senator Phillips to pursue his curiosity in a few minutes.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer which is very long. It is in reply to a question asked by Senator Muir on November 8 concerning the Sydney Steel Corporation. If he agrees, I would ask that it be printed in Hansard as if it had been read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Canada/Nova Scotia Sysco Modernization Program Subsidiary Agreement signed in June 1981, provides some $77 million of a total $96.2 million for Stage 1 of Phase 1 of a business plan to rehabilitate Sysco. The business plan was predicated on a minimum throughput of 240,000 tons of rail, substantial export markets and conformance to performance criteria. The Agreement provides for modernization of various stages of the production process, including blast furnace, open hearth and the rolling mills, as well as funding for related services and pollution control. The question is not so much the holding up of funding for the project as a decision on whether it is prudent to continue with the business plan as designed two years ago, in face of existing world markets for rail.

It is also important to recognize that the subject Agreement is co-managed by a Committee comprising representatives of the federal government, the provincial government and Sysco. It has been the view of federal officials, which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Economic Expansion supports, that progress under the Agreement be reviewed in light of the fact that Sysco has not met the established performance targets and the significantly changed world market conditions for rail. This may lead inevitably to the consideration of other alternatives for Sysco.

In respect to the timing of the proposed review, the minister has spoken to Premier John Buchanan of Nova Scotia on this question and they are attempting to establish an early mutually satisfactory date to discuss the project. The minister believes that it would take a period of time after that for a more complete review of the project by officials. In the meantime, production of the Sydney Plant is not being inhibited, as there is one blast furnace operating at a capacity sufficient to handle existing demand.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION—SALE OF EVAPORATED MILK TO LIBYA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, earlier today Senator Doody asked me a question related to the Arab boycott, the guidelines surrounding it, and some action taken by the Canadian Dairy Commission. Since then I have been told that government officials have only recently received the documentation dealing with the specific transaction. Indeed, the wording of that is now being assessed to see whether the government's anti-boycott guidelines have indeed been contravened. Therefore, the reply that I gave some time ago is accurate, as usual.

[Later:]

Hon. C. William Doody: Could I ask a supplementary question on the alleged anti-boycott violation? Would the minister undertake to bring us the information when the documents have been studied, and could he indicate how long that will take?

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators. I hope there is no misunderstanding. I did not intend the supplementary answer today to satisfy the undertaking that I gave Senator Doody earlier in the Question Period.

WHEAT—PROPOSED CARTEL OF EXPORTING COUNTRIES

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin, which has to do with our credit arrangements with Poland. If it can be taken as read, we will ask that it be printed in Hansard.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I think I should like to hear it.

Senator Argue: I hope it is a repetition of what I said.

The grain agreement with Poland—

Senator Roblin: Is this a question I asked some time ago?

Senator Argue: It is a delayed answer to a question the honourable senator asked on November 16.

Senator Roblin: Very good. Let us have it printed in Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

> The grain agreement with Poland covers the period January 1, 1980, to December 31, 1982, and calls for repayments at commercial interest rates within three years. Canada agreed, in concert with 15 western creditor countries, to reschedule 90 per cent of the principal and interest originally falling due between May 1 and December 31, 1981. These amounts are being repaid over eight years, including a four-year grace period. There is no subsidy element involved as interest continues to accrue on the outstanding balances and we anticipate being paid in full, albeit over the longer term, as further arrangements are made to deal with Poland's debt problem.
> Canada has been selling grain on credit to Poland since 1955-56. The revolving government guaranteed credit limit for Poland has been increased from time to time, most recently by $500 million, mainly to cover 1982 shipments under the government to government grain agreement. The credit guarantee for Poland is currently $1,225 million.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for second reading of Bill C-134, respecting rebates of interest on farm loans made under the Farm Credit Act.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am in the process of preparing my final notes for my remarks on this bill. I understand the sponsor of the bill has information that was requested by Senator Roblin yesterday. I would ask that he be allowed to give that information, after which I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, with leave, I am prepared to reply to the question posed yesterday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: The situation is as I described it then. Senator Roblin asked for more precision as to what would happen at the end of two years. The loan is based on a mortgage which may be 10 years or as long as 29 years. The interest rate is fixed. As of October 1, the rate has been set at 15.75 per cent. For the first two years there will be a rebate of 4 per cent; after that it is at 15.75 per cent. Obviously, if two years down the line the rates are going to be higher than 15.75 per cent, then the farmer will be happy to continue at that rate. If the rates are going to be lower—and there is no guarantee that he can get a lower rate—the Farm Credit Corporation will entertain a visit at that time by any farmer under the plan. However, it is clearly understood that before a loan is made under this special program there is a complete plan set out with the farmer, with his agreement, and it is based on his ability to pay the present going rate, or the loan is not made. So presumably the farm, two years down the line, will be in a position to carry the rate of interest of 15.75 per cent.

• (1530)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I presume that the willingness of the Farm Credit Corporation to consider an application for a lower rate at the end of the second year applies only to this type of loan; it does not apply to the general run of their business already on the books.

Senator Molgat: No, and I should make it clear that there is no commitment by the Farm Credit Corporation that it will revise the rates. There is absolutely no commitment. But, obviously, if there were a substantial change in rates the matter could be reviewed.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 3, 1982, the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on November 26, 1980.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when I had the honour and the privilege, so to speak, of taking some law courses at the University of Ottawa in 1968 and 1969, one of my best teachers at the time was Professor Dussault, who taught administrative law.

I believe he later became Deputy Minister of Justice and then Attorney General of the Province of Quebec. I remember he was very keen on having his students prepare outlines, especially for exams. This was in the so-called cartesian tradition that one must organize one's thoughts before putting words on paper.

That is why, honourable senators, I have prepared a one-page outline of my speech, listing the subjects I intend to discuss at this time.

I have had a few copies printed, and if honourable senators agree, I shall have them distributed by the pages.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to have your permission to refer to the plan that is now being distributed and request that the plan appear on the record at the beginning of my intervention so that it may be followed by anyone interested in reading what I have to say.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

for intervention

I. "Model" for an elected Canadian Senate.
  (a) What do we want from our Senate?
  (b) Canadian Regionalism.
    (i) Historic tensions.
    (ii) Fragmentation of federal representation for national parties.
    (iii) Regional parties.
  (c) The Australian experience.
  (d) Model for an elected Senate to meet Canadian needs—How and why it would give us more of what we want from our Senate.

II. Constitutional and political obstacles.
  (a) The amending formula.
  (b) The Senate.
  (c) The House of Commons.
  (d) The Provincial Premiers.
  (e) The long range target.

III. In the meantime—
  (a) gradual change through changing attitudes.
  (b) the "Lamontagne Report" and other interim steps.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I propose to divide my intervention into three parts. First, I shall, with respect, present my plan of a model—using the term "model" in the sense that economists use it—for an elected Canadian Senate. In doing so I want to deal with some sub-topics as set out in the plan now being distributed.

It seems to me that I should start by asking the question: What do Canadians want from their Senate? The second topic, still under Part I, will be Canadian regionalism. Under that sub-topic reference will be made to historic tensions, and the fragmentation of federal representation for national parties and regional parties. I shall deal with paragraphs (ii) and (iii) together. I shall then report on my impressions of the Australian experience.

Following that, still under Part I, I propose to extract from paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) what I submit is a model for an elected Senate which I believe would meet the needs of Canadians. I hope that by then I will have described how and why I consider the model would give us more of what we seek from our Senate.

Part II will deal with the constitutional and political obstacles to the implementation or establishment of that model. Under Part II I will speak of the amending formula, the Senate, the House of Commons, the provincial premiers, and the long-range target.

Under Part III I will make some suggestions as to what we might do in the meantime by way of gradual change, through changing attitudes, and make some reference to what has become known as the Lamontagne report and other interim steps. I suspect that if I receive permission to adjourn the debate, I will probably deal only with Part I today and with Parts II and III when the debate is resumed at a later date.

When dealing with any question of Senate reform, it seems to me that we should try to address the question of what it is that we want from our Senate. What are the functions which Canadians expect the Senate to perform? Perhaps somewhat appropriately, since I am speaking under the inquiry that deals with the Lamontagne report, as is its short title, I consider that the work of the Lamontagne subcommittee, as it is set out on pages 33 and following, remains valid from the point of view of the traditional functions of the Senate and those functions which I believe Canadians will expect of it.

The first function referred to is the legislative function. Clearly, as it states in the report, that is primary.

The second function is the investigative function. In the Lamontagne report reference is made to a recommendation in an earlier report of a special joint committee on the Constitution that the Senate's investigative role should be continued and expanded at the initiative of the Senate itself.

The third function referred to is the regional function. Reference is made to the increase in regionalism. I will come back to that subject under another topic, because it seems to me that the regional function of the Senate will be the Senate's most important function in the future; and, of course, it spills over into all the other functions, namely, the legislative function, the investigative function, the representation of minorities and the human rights function. Then there is the constitutional clarification of the Senate's role, as described in that report.

Honourable senators, I warn you of another matter. The regional role of the Senate, to me, is of such importance to my whole thesis that some of you may feel that I am using un pavé de l'ours—that is, a great paving stone—to squash a fly when I discuss with you some of the material that I have dug up on the question of regionalism. I say that for the reason that I do not think I need to prove to any one of the honourable senators present that since the beginning regionalism has been a serious problem for the Canadian confederation. I have done some research on some aspects of that regionalism. I will refer to that research for the purpose of building a foundation for my case, because my case depends very much on the Senate's solving what I consider to be one of the main problems, if not the main problem, still remaining unsolved by Canadian institutions, which is regional alienation or regionalism. The other reason that I want to do so is because I want to share with you some material for use by other honourable senators in this ongoing debate on the question of regionalism.

So, first, let me refer you to a book by David Bercuson. It is entitled Canada and the Burden of Unity and it is published by Macmillan, Toronto, 1977. Essentially, the book is an overview of the enduring importance of the regional factor in Canadian politics. My first reference is "Canada is a country of regions", page 1:

> There is nothing new or extraordinary about this observation, and the fact is recognized, sometimes grudgingly, by academics, journalists, and politicians. Our trouble is that, having paid lip service to the concept, too many Canadians who should know better wish regionalism would go away . . . the experience of regionalism remains prominent and distinctive in Canadian history—and time has tended less to erode it than to develop it.

I go now to page 2, where it says:

> There are probably as many definitions of regionalism as there are people defining, the most common being that which distinguishes five major areas in Canada: the Maritimes, Quebec, Ontario, the Prairies and British Columbia . . . Ontario and Quebec together have always held an absolute majority of seats, making it possible for a government to sit at Ottawa without one Western or Maritime representative. In a liberal democratic society it is hard to see any alternative.

The next reference is to George Rawlyk. The title of his book is Regionalism in Canada: Flexible Federalism or a Fractured Nation. I should perhaps describe this book. It is very interesting and I have not run into it before. It is a gathering under historical periods of many documents sourced in newspapers—the Vancouver Sun and others—on the subject of regionalism. Let me give honourable senators a sample from page 145, which deals with dominion-provincial relations in the late 1930s:

> Eastern Canadians were for a long time wholly ignorant of British Columbia, and very indifferent about its welfare. In fact, generally speaking, the mental attitude of the people towards the Province for about thirty-five years was not only of a negative character, but to a very considerable extent unfavourable; not intentionally so, but, because they did not understand the real situation and had been prejudiced on account of a long political fight in which British Columbia and the Canadian Pacific Railway were the principal issues. Hence, even if various Governments had been more favourably disposed, the mental attitude of the people as a whole would have prevented a betterment policy being carried out. British Columbia was not only commercially isolated, but she was politically isolated as well.

Another reference is: Paul Fox, "Regionalism and Confederation", in Regionalism in the Canadian Community 1867-1967, edited by Mason Wade. This is the earliest material I have. I refer honourable senators to this material because of the definition that begins Professor Fox's book, which reads:

> The term "regionalism" is very vague and subject to many different interpretations. In Canada one can think readily of geographic regions, climatic regions, economic regions, political regions, resource regions, planning regions, and no doubt many more. We have all been long familiar with the traditional conceptualizations of Canada as a country divided into geographic, climatic, economic and political regions. With the recent attention paid to the development of natural resources and to economic planning, we are now becoming familiar also with the concepts of resource regions and economic development regions. But this elaboration adds to the confusion in the use of the term. Obviously, there may be many different kinds of "regions" and many different ways of classifying each kind. In fact, there may be as many definitions of "region" as there are persons defining it.

I have a few more references. One is The Roots of Disunity: A Look at Canadian Political Culture, by David Bell and Lorne Tepperman. I have noted that the conclusions to this book see regional fragmentation, continentalism and political economy of divide and rule as one of the chief obstacles to the full development of Canadian nationhood. Again, I sampled, or dipped into the book, as Clyde Gilmour says when he is sampling records. At page 248 the authors refer to how little most Canadians identify themselves with the federal state. They go on to say:

> When asked to which level of government they feel closest, most Canadians reply "the province"; only in Ontario does a majority report feeling closer to the federal government. Strong regional or provincial loyalties have tended to supplant national loyalties, keeping truly national institutions and alliances from coming to fruition.
> Canada's political institutions have not dealt effectively with these problems . . . Canadian federal politicians can no longer resolve regional conflicts through mutual compromise at the federal level. Instead, these conflicts are being fought out between federal and provincial leaders, who increasingly think of each other as antagonists rather than compatriots.

Roger Gibbins wrote a book which may be known to many of you here called Prairie Politics and Society: Regionalism in Decline. It was published in 1980 and it provides an extremely interesting analysis of the underlying tendency of regionalism and provincialism in western Canada and of the implications for national politics of the ascendancy of the latter over the former. There is a section dealing with the decline of regionalism on pages 197, 199 and 201, and the ascendancy of provincialism. On the question of better regional representation I dip into this book at pages 210 and 211. This is not to say that I do not recommend the rest of the book to honourable senators who may wish to intervene on this general subject. I quote from page 211:

> It has been a longstanding grievance of western Canadians that their interests are not given appropriate weight in the national government. Therefore if western Canadian interests are to be more adequately protected in the national government, western Canadian representatives must be given more power than they would be entitled to by any calculation based on the premise of one man one vote . . . Potentially the most viable approach is to argue that territorial units should receive equal representation as they do in the American Senate. While territorial representation would not be the principle to be followed in the House of Commons, it could be adopted in other national government institutions such as the Canadian Senate, provided that the latter possessed the power to check the House of Commons when regional interests were at stake.

Honourable senators will see that I am now leading up to the question of institutional reform. Let me pause at this point to emphasize something that is, perhaps, self-evident; that is, whether a second chamber is required at all.

I have moved quickly to consider the question of what we want from our Senate. Perhaps it was careless of me not to deal with the basic question, which is: Why do we need a Senate at all? I do not intend to dwell on that subject, because it seems to me, from all of the discussions I have had with my honourable colleagues, that the basic understanding of the need for a second chamber—especially in a country which is as large as Canada and which is regionally divided and federally organized—is relatively clear. To bring together a group of political entities or units which are not equal in terms of population requires a principle which alleviates or mitigates the concept of representation by population. I think that concept is evident to most Canadians. Anyone who has read the debates at Confederation will realize that that was precisely why the Senate was instituted for Canada. I have never read anyone who quarelled with the idea put forward by Sir John A. Macdonald and by Mowat to the effect that, without the Senate, which is based on regional representation rather than representation by population, there would never have been a Confederation.

The whole point of a Senate, therefore, is to ensure that those areas of any federation that enjoy population concentration do not totally dominate the political units that are established at the federal level.

Honourable senators, let me move to another topic, and that is fragmentation. I shall refer honourable senators to a few sources on that subject, the first of which is written by Alan Cairns and is entitled The Electoral System and the Party System in Canada, 1921-1925. In this article, Cairns outlines the following thesis: Our electoral process has greatly and unnecessarily exacerbated regional and sectional tensions. I do not think honourable senators will have much trouble with the idea that our regionalism has had an effect upon the electoral system. If I read Cairns correctly, he goes one step further to say that, in his view, the party system has been sectionalized and distorted to the detriment of national unity. I refer honourable senators to pages 230, 231, 232 and 234, which have to do with minor and major parties; and, for system-wide effects, to pages 240 and following.

I shall give honourable senators a sample of just a couple of those references so that they can then decide whether they are interested in studying these matters in any further detail. At page 228, he says:

> The analysis to follow will suggest that the electoral system has played a major role in the evolution of Canadian parties, and that the claim that the party system has been an important instrument for integrating Canadians across sectional lines is highly suspect.

At page 228 there appears a table dealing with percentages of votes and seats for government parties. On page 230 there appears a table on the bias of electoral systems in translating votes into seats. A third table concerning minor parties and percentages of seats and votes might also be of interest to honourable senators. I would ask that these tables be incorporated into the text so that honourable senators can have a look at them.

† In this election the Conservatives received both a higher percentage of votes, 46.5%, and of seats, 47.3%, than the Liberals. The Liberals, however, chose to meet Parliament, and with Progressive support they retained office for several months.

Note: The data for this and the following tables have been compiled from Howard A. Scarrow, Canada Votes (New Orleans, 1963), and from the Report of the Chief Electoral Officer for recent elections.

Independents and very small parties have been excluded from the table.

The measurement of discrimination employed in this table defines the relationship between the percentage of votes and the percentage of seats. The figure is devised by dividing the former into the latter. Thus 1 — (38% seats/38% votes), for example — represents a neutral effect for the electoral system. Any figure above 1 — (40% seats/20% votes) = 2.0, for example — indicates discrimination for the party. A figure below 1 — (20% seats/40% votes) = 0.5, for example — indicates discrimination against the party. For the purposes of the table the ranking of the parties as 1, 2, 3 ... is based on their percentage of the vote, since to rank them in terms of seats would conceal the very bias it is sought to measure — namely the bias introduced by the intervening variable of the electoral system which constitutes the mechanism by which votes are translated into seats.

[Senator Frith.]

Honourable senators, I shall quote from page 231 a passage which is concerned with sectional intra-party discrimination and its effect on all parties. This information is taken from the historical period which is referred to in the tables I just mentioned.

> The electoral system consistently minimized the Ontario support of the Progressives, which provided the party with 43.5 per cent, 39.7 per cent, and 29.4 per cent of its total votes in the first three elections of the twenties. The party received only 36.9 per cent, 8.3 per cent and 10 per cent of its total seats from that province. Further, by its varying treatment of the party's electoral support from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, it finally helped to reduce the Progressives to an Alberta party.

I ask that tables 4 and 5 form part of the text as well. They deal with this question and provide the figures for this phenomenon, if I can call it that, of fragmentation.

I also refer honourable senators to a paper written by Richard Simeon, and included in The Canadian Political Process.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Before the deputy leader moves to another topic, would he say whether Professor Cairns' prescription was to reform the Senate? My impression, from some earlier research, is that the prescription put forward was that the House of Commons ought to be reformed by the introduction of some type of proportional representation. When the honourable senator is dealing with these authorities, would he indicate whether their prescriptions involve some changes in the Senate?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have two comments to make in response to that question. Senator Murray is quite correct as to the prescription for remedying regionalism, which prescription is found not only in Cairns but also, I believe, in Smiley and in Irving, who wrote a book entitled Does Canada Need a New Electoral System? I am not referring to their prescriptions because I am not quoting them as authorities but, rather, for the research that they have done on the subject. I am coming to the opposite conclusion. I am grateful to Senator Murray for raising this point.

I disagree with the thesis that the solution to the problem of regionalism is to abolish the Senate and to change the House of Commons, particularly as some of the recommendations embodied in that solution involved having two classes of members, provincial members and other members. That is why I am merely using these references as groundwork for my suggestion that the real solution lies not in changing the House of Commons but in leaving it as the house of representation by population and making the Senate a truly regional body.

Honourable senators, I return to Roger Gibbins because he has produced a recent piece of work which I wanted to bring to your attention. This study was prepared in 1982. In it a contrast is drawn between the Canadian and the American electoral and party systems. I do not want to dwell greatly on this subject because I do not consider the American system to be a model for Canada. I say this most particularly because it is not a parliamentary system. Honourable senators are probably aware that I am edging my way towards the view that the Australian system gives us more assistance than does the American system. The Australian is a parliamentary system developed for a country that is organized in a manner similar to ours.

I should like to make one reference to this more recent work of Gibbins because it deals with another important part of my thesis, that is, the question of organization based on senatorial regions rather than on provinces. I refer honourable senators to pages 160, 165 and 166, wherein he discusses the dangers of provincially-centred rather than federally-centred territorial cleavages.

Honourable senators, I think I will leave it at that. I just wanted you to know that the same author had dealt recently with that comparison between Canada and the United States.

The last reference is to a piece by Peter McCormick, Regional Representation: The Canadian Partnership. This was a task force report prepared by Peter McCormick, Ernest C. Manning and Gordon Gibson for the Canada West Foundation in September 1981. I think honourable senators are rather familiar with it and I recommend particularly its table of contents because it deals with many of the topics I have already discussed. I think it will be found useful.

Honourable senators, I am coming to something now that I believe is a little more original than what I have already regaled you with. I believe that so far I have done what I attempted to do, namely, to show that there is a good deal of support for this political problem of regionalism in Canada. Perhaps what is original is the thesis or the conclusions I draw from that material and from the balance sheet of the Senate's performance and the outlining of the Senate's functions contained in the Lamontagne report. I think most members of this house and many Canadians would feel that his thesis is valid. I conclude, first, that we must have a second chamber, that the Fathers of Confederation were right when they insisted that we have a second chamber; second, that it should be organized essentially on a regional basis and that it is there as a balance or mitigating factor for the principle of representation by population; third, that, essentially, it has done its work well; fourth, that it could fulfil all of those functions more effectively if it were elected.

It may be that I lose a bit of support as I move to some further logical developments from the facts as I have stated them. But I say that, although the Senate has done its job well and although there is clearly a role for it—and I will try to outline that role particularly on the question of regionalism, which I consider the major weakness in Canadian federal institutions—in my opinion it could do the work it has already done and could meet the challenges of the future more effectively, and in this I join Senator Roblin, if it had more political muscle, and the only way it can acquire more political muscle is to be elected. That is not to say that the present Senate does not fulfil its duty, or that past Senates have not fulfilled their duty, in the framework of the method of their appointment. It is simply to say that, if the Senate is to have the strength it needs to do the job I believe it is uniquely and perfectly designed to do, it needs more muscle, and in my view that can only come from a source of power arrived at or achieved by election.

Honourable senators, I now propose to report to you on my impressions of the Australian experience and my own experience in looking at the Australian system as a possible model. If I may, I will do that by first posing questions and then answering them.

The first question is this: Why use the Australian Senate as a model for a reformed Canadian Senate? First, because there are similarities between the two countries. Australia is large—about the size of the continental United States; geographically and demographically it is as diverse as Canada and, consequently, has a deep-rooted sense of regionalism. For example, there is a remarkable and startling similarity between the attitudes found in Perth, which is in the west of Australia, and the attitudes found in Calgary, and, to complete the analogy, between the attitudes found in Sydney and Melbourne and those found in, say, Montreal and Toronto. As is ours, Australia's political system is federally organized and is modelled on the Westminster parliamentary system. Australia is also a member of the British Commonwealth and, incidentally, the Government of Australia is referred to by Australians as the commonwealth government rather than a federal or dominion government. The provincial counterparts in Australia are the states, some of which are still bicameral.

Let me give you some of the facts as I found them. What is the legislative structure of the commonwealth government? The House of Representatives is like our House of Commons in function, term and method of election, except that election is by preferential ballot and the riding or constituency is called an electorate. Representation is by population with one representative per electorate. There are 125 electoral divisions. Each of the six states is entitled to ten senators; the two territories are entitled to two each, for a total of 64 in the Senate.

Population is irrelevant. The population of New South Wales is 5,221,600. It has ten senators. The population of Tasmania is 426,000. Tasmania also has ten senators.

What is the ratio of representatives to senators? There being approximately 125 representatives to 64 senators, the ratio is two to one, and that ratio is constitutional. Half the Senate is elected every three years—that is five senators per state and one per territory, unless there is double dissolution.

Until 1949 the Senate was also elected by preferential ballot, but almost inevitably that led to an almost total control by the two major parties of the electoral system and of the electorate, in the sense that almost all Australians form loyalties to either one or the other of the two major parties and their vote is almost, if not entirely, predictable. Those two parties are the Liberal National Party, which is more or less the equivalent of the Progressive Conservative Party here—at least it is considered more the conservative party—and the Australian Labour Party.

In any event, until 1949 the Senate was elected by the same system as the representatives, but because of the almost total control of the two major parties they ended with a lopsided Senate, because it depended entirely on which party got the most votes. Out of a possible 64 senators they might end up with 60 from one party.

Senator Murray: How did the preferential ballot lead to the result the deputy leader describes in the Australian Senate?

Senator Frith: From what we were told, it came about because of the non-assignment of balances and because of the fact that people would vote a party slate in such a way that whoever received the higher amount, if it fell down, it fell down on another party person. As they reflected it in the way they assigned preferences, they assigned them on the basis of popular vote and as a result it was sort of winner take all, although in a different sense from that in which we use that expression.

With proportional representation, the two major parties are close to even, normally, and a balance of power is often in the hands of a minority party. At present, for example, the Australian Labour Party and the Liberal Country Party coalition is balanced by one independent and the Australian Democratic Party of five senators. So of the total of 64 you have one independent and five of the somewhat new Australian Democratic Party and the other divided almost evenly between the Australian Labour Party and the Liberal Country Party.

Does the government usually control both houses? The answer to that is no. Since 1949 it has been more common for the government not to control the Upper House. The government is responsible directly to the Lower House, but has certain responsibilities to the Upper House resulting from its wide powers. I will deal with those later.

When we were there, the Labour Party coalition had effective control of the Senate, whereas the Liberal Country Party held the majority in the House of Representatives and was the governing party. Does it not cause serious problems if the government has a majority in the House of Commons, nominates the members of the cabinet, but does not control the Upper House?

Some told us that it would, and some said that it would not. The system seems to work. Some said that the system works even better when the Upper House is not controlled by the governing party, because if that were the case the Upper House would always rubber stamp government programs.

Is there not a dilemma, then? Either the Upper House is a rubber stamp of the Lower House, or it frustrates the responsibility and duty to govern. In theory that is right, but without question the most significant and impressive experience I gained on my trip to Australia was that, although in theory that is right—in other words, it either rubber-stamps or it frustrates—in practice it is not true. That is the one basic and central thing that I did not find in the marvelous briefing I had, and I do not think I would have known it had I not travelled to Australia. Senator Roblin and I, and I believe other senators, had a feeling of diffidence about going on the trip because we received such wonderful briefings. We wondered what the point was in going since it was all there in front of us, but it really wasn't.

As I said, that was the most significant experience I gained on the trip. The reason I say that is that I have never been able to solve that dilemma in the case of a Canadian-elected Senate—in other words, if the Senate is a carbon copy of the House of Commons, what is the point in having a Senate, and if the Senate is not a carbon copy of the House of Commons, then how will the government govern? That is what takes place most of the time in Australia, and the system seems to work.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Would you permit a question?

Senator Frith: Certainly.

Senator Thompson: In your nine-day trip, how did you arrive at the conclusion that in practice they are not faced with those two dilemmas?

Senator Frith: Simply by asking. As soon as I was told that the government had not normally controlled the Senate since 1949, I realized that this was the situation which would totally constipate and frustrate government. So everywhere I went I asked questions about that. I received different views, but I came to the conclusion that people thought it worked.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: If questions are in order, I have one or two.

Senator Frith: I only ask that the questions relate to where I am in my speech.

Senator Stollery: Yes. In fact, you have already passed the point on which I wish to ask a question. Is there still a fine if someone does not vote in Australia, and, if so, did you inquire as to what effect that has on the system?

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: Yes, there is, and yes, I did. Of course, that results in high voter turnout because it is against the law not to exercise one's franchise. I asked many questions on that and found that the government keeps track, that it actually sends letters out to those who did not vote asking why they did not vote, and so forth. There are not too many prosecutions under that law, but there are some.

As far as the second part of the question is concerned, the effect it has on the system, I do not think there is any doubt that it has a salutary effect. The fact that a large percentage of the people vote makes the system work better.

Senator Stollery: As I recall it, approximately five years ago—and this was reported in the international press—there were three or four elections in a short period of time and there was a great period of political instability. If I am wrong, I am sure that Senator Frith will correct me. I understood that that was brought about precisely because of a conflict between the two chambers.

Senator Frith: I was not told that, although I was told about the situation that had developed. I was told that it did not develop for those reasons. The question of double-dissolution, and the ability of the Senate to cause an election without having to go to the electorate itself is a part of that problem. I was never told that their constitutional problems related directly to that fact.

What are the Senate's powers?

The Australian Senate has the same legislative powers as the Lower House, except that it cannot introduce money bills. That is the situation both here and in the United States. All legislation requires the Senate's approval before it becomes law.

Senator Thompson: The Senate can refuse to pass money bills.

Senator Frith: I am coming to that. The Senate also has the power to review and block executive orders; that is, regulations, orders in council, and so forth. We have the power to review them, but they have the power to block them. We heard about that from Senator Godfrey.

Does it have the power to amend financial bills and refuse supply? The Australian Senate has that power, and the power to refuse supply seems to be one of the most controversial of its powers.

What is the justification of such a power?

Those who support the Australian Senate's current role and powers argue that these powers are necessary if the Senate is to remain the only check on the executive. They say that a party in the House of Representatives with majority control in fact elects the cabinet and the Prime Minister. So effectively the majority in the House of Representatives has no control over the executive, and is expected to support the executive's legislative program.

If the Senate is controlled by the party in power it has the same role; if it is not, it becomes the only effective check on the executive, and the only way it can exercise that check is to have the power to refuse supply. It is a constant threat.

Has this power been used often? No, it has not, but it was used in the famous double-dissolution crisis of 1975.

Senator Thompson: I suggest to you that the Australian Senate has threatened to use that power on a number of occasions.

Senator Frith: As I said in my previous comment, its existence is a constant threat.

The next question: If the Senate exercises its right to refuse supply, is there always a double-dissolution so that senators have to go to the electorate also? The answer is no. Double-dissolution is ordered by the Governor General on the recommendation of the government, providing there are, on the shelf, as they say, a certain number of bills that have been refused approval by the Senate. Once the Senate refuses a number of bills, they are shelved, and that shelving triggers the mechanism for double-dissolution, which takes place on the government's recommendation to the Governor General.

Is it common for there to be bills on the shelf that have been refused by the Senate? Apparently that is so. There are usually a few bills which have been refused by the Senate, and, when they remain on the shelf, that loads the double-dissolution gun, although there is nothing requiring the government to pull the trigger.

Does that mean that the Senate can force the House of Representatives to hold an election without going to the electorate itself? It can, but I found fairly solid opinion that it ought not to do so, and that it ought to be ready to go to the electorate itself if it forces the House of Representatives to do so.

How does the proportional representation system work? It is a bit complicated and, before explaining it in detail, I ask honourable senators to remember that there are hundreds of ways to implement the principle of proportional representation. It is not a single, fixed system. I refer you to Professor Irving's book, written as part of the Queen's study group in Kingston about two or three years ago, entitled: Does Canada Need A New Electoral System? In his book Professor Irving discusses proportional representation and reviews its various forms. Senator Murray made a suggestion for reform of the House of Commons on the basis of proportional representation, but I do not support that view.

In any event, here is the Australian system. The voter marks his ballot preferentially, but those votes in excess of the minimum required for election are transferred proportionately to the other candidates. Therefore, you can see that the key is a quota. Proportional representation utilizes a quota system which requires a successful candidate to gain a specific percentage of first preference votes to be elected. This is the way the quota is expressed. It is going to sound somewhat obtuse and perhaps enigmatic, but I am going to read it so that it can appear in Hansard. Perhaps it can be discussed later after honourable senators have seen it. It is expressed this way:

For example, if 100 valid ballot papers had been cast, and the total number of seats to be filled was five—

As you know, half the Senate is elected in each one so you know the number of seats to be filled.

—the quota would be:

$$\text{Quota} = \frac{100}{5 + 1} = 16.67 \text{ per cent}$$

That is the basic vote that you have to get in order to be elected. It someone gets 16.67 he is elected. With respect to the ones who do not get 16.67, you take the preferences and spread them along until someone does get 16.67. You do that until you have the required number of people to be elected.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Can you explain to us whether the second and later preferential choices on the valid ballots which elect a candidate, must of necessity be forgotten and you are concerned only with the ones which by accident have not been used to elect you?

Senator Frith: No, I do not think I can. I may be able to answer your question by explaining the system as it was shown to us. It does require, and perhaps this is part of the question, that you must mark a choice by preference for every candidate. There was an election when they had something like 70 candidates and people had to sit and mark down 70, 69, 68, and so forth, because the system will not work otherwise. That normally does not happen because you usually do not have that many candidates.

Let me just finish this description, if I may. It says:

> Only five candidates can in fact obtain that quota.

It is mathematically impossible, as I think Senator Donahoe appreciates, once you pick the five and put in the formula, for anyone to get more than that. To continue:

> The quota therefore represents the minimum figure necessary to elect five, but no more than five candidates, on an absolute majority principle. This means that in the three-yearly Senate elections, where normally five places have to be filled in each state, each successful candidate must obtain a fraction more than one-sixth of the total ballot first preferences votes cast (or 16.7 per cent of the total). Where ten senators have to be elected—

That happens in the case of double dissolution, for example.

> —the quota for each candidate becomes a fraction more than one-eleventh (or 9.10 per cent of the total). In such an election, each voter marks his preferences opposite the > names of the candidates according to his choice, 1, 2, 3, 4 (and so on). In Senate elections each candidate must be ranked for the ballot paper to be valid. Candidates who achieve the quota on first preferences alone are declared elected and their surplus votes redistributed according to a somewhat complex formula. If no candidate achieves the quota on the first count, then the candidate with the lowest number of first preferences is eliminated and the second preferences on his ballot papers are distributed, and so on until the requisite number of candidates have achieved the quota.

Incidentally, the source of that is not Irving's book, but a book by H. V. Emy, The Politics of Australian Democracy, Fundamentals In Dispute (Macmillan, Melbourne 1978) page 202.

I should like to pause there for a moment to assure honourable senators that although that sounds terribly complicated, the man who is the chief electoral officer for the Senate, Mr. Pearson, showed us a film depicting this system and he had all his officers there, and perhaps this is a good time to say that I took some tapes of the interviews. I had the tapes transcribed. They are in my office, and available to any honourable senator wishing to hear them. I started taping these interviews by using my own little dictaphone which was very unsatisfactory because there is only 15 minutes on each side and the recording was not that clear so I bought, at my own expense, a small cassette recorder and I asked them if they objected to my taping the interviews. If there are enough honourable senators interested I think it would also be useful to get the film because it shows the system of counting. It is not a long film. Of course, it depends on how quickly quotas are met, but the system does not require a long wait. You very seldom get the results that night, but it is not a matter of a week although the results can take that long.

Senator Stollery: What is the turnover in the Australian Senate? In other words, what is the average number of years that an Australian senator serves?

Senator Frith: I do not know. It is a six-year term. I do not know what the average term is but I will endeavour to get that answer for you.

How does one get to be a candidate for the Senate? The constitutional qualifications are: 18 years of age, a British subject, three years as a resident within the limits of the Commonwealth at the time the person is chosen, who must be either an elector entitled to vote in elections of members of the House of Representatives or a person qualified to become such an elector.

In practice—and this part of the Australian system I do not think we need to borrow, and I hope our system does not evolve that way although I am sure if any such system is put in practice ever in Canada, it will evolve in a Canadian way—selection is governed by a very strict party control of the electoral system. Candidates must go through their party's "pre-selection" procedures to become one of its candidates. One has very little hope of being elected without a party's "pre-selection." I suggest, honourable senators, that that will not be the system that will evolve in Canada, but this is the way it is there.

Senator Thompson: Am I correct in assuming that the candidate for the Senate must take an oath that he will follow the party's program?

Senator Frith: Literally, yes, for the Labour Party; and no, for the other party. The chances of being elected as an independent are very slim. When we were in Australia there was one independent senator in the Senate.

The two major parties are the Australian Labour Party, and the Liberal Party which is governing now in a coalition with the Country Party. Their pre-selections make up most of the senators, the ratio depending on how their party does at the polls. We were told that most people vote according to the party loyalties and that the vast majority of Australians support either the ALP or the Liberal-Country Party.

As I said, I am going to indicate why I do not think that situation will evolve in Canada. However, because of the proportional representation system a party that receives a certain number of votes can elect senators and that is what happened with Senator Chip's Australian Democratic Party, and this is what I think will happen in Canada. The Australian Democratic Party is not to be confused with the Democratic Labour Party which previously held some seats. Senator Chip's successful slogan was: "Keep the bastards honest." That helps illustrate how Australians have come to assume major party domination of the Senate.

• (1630)

Hon. Eric Cook: That slogan will never meet with any success here.

Hon. C. William Doody: He will not make it in Canada.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I too was once a cynic who thought you could never succeed that way. I can only say, "Oh, ye of little faith," and, "Listen a little longer." I do not expect you will agree with me, but I do promise I will deal with the question of whether it is going to be possible to have such a system in the Canadian context.

The next question is: Are there ministers in the Senate as well as in the House of Representatives? The answer is, yes, and support for that idea was divided. Some purists feel that the major role of the Senate is as a check on the executive, and they prefer not to have government ministers in the Senate.

When we were there, there were six ministers in the Senate—Sir John Carrick, Minister for National Development and Energy and Leader of the Government in the Senate; the Honourable Dame Margaret Guilfoyle, Minister for Finance; the Honourable Peter Durack, Attorney General; the Honourable F. M. Chaney, Minister for Social Security; the Honourable Peter Baume, Minister for Education; and the Honourable Anthony Messner, Minister for Veterans' Affairs and Minister Assisting the Treasurer. Honourable senators, I am giving you this detail so that you can see the kind of portfolios held by senators.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Is the Leader of the Government in the Australian Senate an ex officio minister of the Crown?

Senator Frith: I am not sure of that. In this case I did not have to find out because he was a minister of the crown holding another portfolio. As Senator Deschatelets knows, that was not always the case in Canada. Only fairly recently has that been so. I am not sure whether that is automatic in Australia.

The next question is: Has the Australian Senate succeeded in representing the states as a states house? There was unanimous agreement that the Senate has not been a states house as originally conceived. Because of the party system, the Senate tends to represent the views of the major parties rather than the interests of the states whose electors send 10 senators each to Canberra.

However, there was an almost unanimous opinion that, informally, the Senate does operate as a states house because states' interests are strongly represented in the party room—which is our caucus room—and in informal political conferences and horse-trading.

The next question is: What, if any, features of the Australian system can be borrowed for application to a new Canadian Senate? I suppose that again brings us back to the original question—that depends on what one wants for the Canadian Senate. I am assuming that the objective is still to have a second chamber of legislative review, but one that better represents regional, not necessarily provincial, interests with the necessary powers to fulfill such a constitutional mandate.

It follows that those powers must come directly from the people in some way; therefore, by election. If it is not to be elected, but is to continue as an appointed body, honourable senators, it seems to me that it cannot expect to have such powers.

Because of the similarities, constitutional and otherwise, between Australia and Canada, I think a significant number of Australian features could be adapted to the needs of the Canadian Senate.

Honourable senators, that brings me to the last section I will deal with today, section D of Part I.

Senator Thompson: I appreciate Senator Frith's courtesy of allowing us to interrupt to ask questions. I am very impressed with all the work that he has obviously done in connection with this matter.

Could he explain to me why one of the major parties in Australia, namely, the ALP, has on its party platform the abolition of the Senate and of the upper houses of the legislatures? My understanding of the situation is that they have said that the upper house is undemocratic in two aspects, one being equality with respect to the basis of elections and the other being the six-year term of office.

Senator Frith: I think part of their reason may be similar to that of the NDP—it is just a bad habit. The impression I had, when driven to it, was that the main reason was the inequality of representation between the states.

Senator Thompson: They are different from the NDP.

Senator Frith: Perhaps I should not have mentioned that since I do not want to debate it.

Senator Thompson: While that was on their platform, I understand they received sufficient support for it from the Australian people. They were the former government.

Senator Frith: Senator Thompson is quite right, and I am sorry I alluded to the NDP. This just proves that, when you are trying to make a sensible intervention, you should not try to be a smart alec. I withdraw that comment.

When driven to it, I felt the main reason given for the suggested abolition of the Senate was that it was undemocratic, not because the Senate represented regional representation versus population representation, but because of the inequality of the state representation. In other words, they were prepared to reject the principle of one-man-one-vote, but not when it caused a huge swing between Tasmania, New South Wales and Victoria. They felt that the only way to do this was to abolish the Senate because they would never encourage Tasmania to give up its 10 seats.

As I am going to point out in just a moment, we are lucky—

Senator Donahoe: P.E.I. has four.

Senator Frith: Yes, but it does not cause nearly the same amount of swing. We are lucky that our Fathers of Confederation did not saddle us with that inequality which exists in Australia and in the United States where Rhode Island and California cause the same sort of swing. At least the principle of regional representation as opposed to provincial representation was set up by our Fathers of Confederation when they selected the number 24. However, it is true that Ontario and Quebec have the same allocation as the so-called "region of the maritimes."

This fact is quite important to my thesis, which is that we do not have that fight on our hands. Almost everyone I spoke to in Australia, except the Tasmanians, expressed the wish that they had had never organized in that way. Their amending formula makes it totally impossible for it ever to be changed because Tasmania will never give up its 10 seats.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, the fact that a majority is required to form a government means that the majority of Australian people have considered the process of election. The fact that they want to abolish the upper chamber means that they feel that it still is not democratic.

Are we hoping that, if we have an elected Senate, it will be the basis for giving prestige and strength to this chamber? It is my feeling that we have all the power we need in this chamber. In Australia, the very fact that one is elected is not considered to be sufficient justification for that power.

Senator Frith: First, it depends upon what Senator Thompson means by "democratic." Second, he is saying that there are those in the Australian Labour Party who hold this view.

My experience in Australia indicated that most people do not think the second chamber should be abolished, but do think that it is democratic. My impression was that most of those who think it should be changed think it should be changed only in such a way as to have more regional rather than state representation, and that is exactly what my proposal is going to be.

Senator Cook: First, I should like to congratulate Senator Frith on a most structured form of address.

He spoke of bills being put on the shelf or rejected by the Senate, thus triggering suspension. How many bills are on the shelf? What was the formula?

Senator Frith: I wish I could give you the exact number. I know it is not very many—perhaps two or three.

Senator Doody: Did you say they were "important" bills?

Senator Frith: No, just "bills". As I remember, it just has to be a certain number of bills, not many, in order to load the double dissolution gun. As I say, the government does not have to pull the trigger, but once they are there, that can happen.

• (1640)

The next question, that I have used simply as a topic heading, is No. 17:

> What, if any, features of the Australian system can be borrowed for application to a new Canadian Senate?

As I said, that brings us to the question of what we want for the Canadian Senate. As I have said before, I assume the objective is still to have a second chamber of legislative review, but one that better represents regional interests, and so on. But I have covered that.

I come now to subheading (d) under part I: Model for an elected Senate to meet Canadian needs—based on what I hope are foundations for such a model that I have so far tried to present.

I propose a division of Canada into senatorial regions, using the original British North America Act concept of 24 senators per region. I should say immediately that I am not wedded to any particular number. I am of the opinion that a system that might work could be based very much on our present system. However, I cannot see that it would be that difficult to establish senatorial regions. Right now we have the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission, which uses a certain number of basic criteria to decide on the natural boundaries of a riding or electoral constituency in the Canadian system. I would therefore suggest that we should not kick the idea to death, because I am not wedded to any particular number or distribution, but I have a suggestion to make, as a working start.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Are you going to give us your views on that?

Senator Frith: Yes, but as a working start only, because I am of the opinion that the eventual solution would be to set up a senatorial electoral region commission, which could take its time in determining this matter, and it could also be subject to revision, as are the recommendations of the present Electoral Boundaries Commission after every census, and so on.

What is the best way to start? In my view, we should start by asking ourselves what a Canadian says when he is asked, "Where are you from?" In most cases he will reply that he is from a certain province. But often he will say, "I am from the west", or, "I am from the east", or, "I am a maritimer", or, "I am from British Columbia", or "I am from the north". So, in general terms, I believe that regionalism represents a sense of community, and we have to start from that point. I suggest that we have to adopt the concept that we are looking for regional boundaries rather than provincial boundaries, and that we are deliberately doing that.

In my opinion, the system would work better if senators represented regions rather than provinces, and I will try to explain why I hold that view. As an example, Ontario and Quebec could continue as regions with 24 senators. However, that is an exception to the rule, and, although theoretically right, it would be hard to consider that as a senatorial region or that one was not representing a province as distinct from a region. The Atlantic provinces, including Newfoundland, could continue to constitute a region of 30—that is, 24 and six. The boundaries commission would listen to representations and might decide that it would be a good idea to have sub-regions, with senators coming from sub-regions rather than a region as a whole.

For the west, the number at present is 24. That could be increased and the region divided, with the prairies becoming a region. British Colombia could be another region, and the Territories could be included with British Columbia as a sub-region or as part of the region. However, I repeat that I am not wedded to any number; but I am convinced that the system—and this is important, because to disagree with this principle is to disagree with the fundamentals—should be regionally organized rather than provincially organized.

I believe that the concept of sub-regions within any of the above, including Quebec and Ontario, is consistent with the geographic and political regionalism that actually exists within those regions, and unwanted divisiveness might arise if that did not exist. The machinery would not be controlled entirely by the parties, as in Australia, although there is no reason why parties should not support certain candidates.

That deals with the question of provinces versus regions. I would ask honourable senators to refer to the Lamontagne report, which is the central focus of this inquiry. I would remind honourable senators that the report of that committee was based essentially on the following: that the problem of provincial representation at the centre would be better solved by institutionalizing, as part of our Constitution, the first ministers' conferences; that, in fact, any federal institution that was nominated directly by provincial governments would, in effect, simply be reflecting the views of provincial premiers, and that there absolutely must be provincial input at the centre; that there must be some organization, some institution, on a regular basis, that gives the opportunity for federalism to work by having the first ministers—and, of course, other ministers—meet regularly to discuss federal government versus provincial government questions. The reason why it would be good to institutionalize that is because it has been a Canadian evolution. The fact is that without anything in the Constitution institutionalizing that institution, it grew up, and important decisions are made, as they should be, each year at first ministers' conferences.

Senator Benidickson: And at other ministers' conferences.

Senator Frith: Yes, but it seems to me that it leaves a hole. It means that the federal government tends to say, "You do not necessarily represent federal-regional interests"—that is, regional interests at the federal level—"because you are concerned with your provinces. That is your jurisdiction, your responsibility, and you should accept it and defend it." But there are duties, responsibilities and powers that are provincial, and duties, responsibilities and powers that are federal. The hole that is left is regional representation at the federal level—that is, people who say, "I am electing a provincial premier, or a provincial government, to look after the constitutional responsibilities and powers of the province; but that does not mean that he or she is necessarily the one that I would want to represent my region's interests at the federal level, dealing with federal responsibilities."

That is why I believe that the organization of our federation on the basis of provincial governments, plus a Senate on a regional basis, plus a House of Commons on a national basis—representation by population—was right, was sound, and is still sound. The only problem is that the Senate does not have the political powers and political clout to represent the interests of the regions, because its source of power is not the people.

Honourable senators, I will move away from that subject to just a couple more points on the model. Should the Senate elections take place simultaneously with the elections of the House of Commons? There was divided opinion on that question in Australia, where there is some movement for simultaneous elections, which they do not now have. The Senate there seems mostly opposed to the suggestion, and I feel that if the Senate is to fulfil the roles that I have discussed it is better not to have the Senate elections take place simultaneously—at least, not for the whole of the Senate.

The question also turns on fixed terms, another controversial issue in Australia. I recommend a fixed term for Senate elections—one third every three years or four years. I even recommend that it be one half of the full term. If the full term is 10 years, perhaps one half of the Senators would go out every five years. The number is not important, but I do not think that the whole Senate should be elected at one time.

Should the Senate be required to have an election if it forced the House of Commons into an election, as is the case in Australia? I say no because I do not recommend that this new Canadian Senate have power to force an election. I do not think it is consistent with Canadian political reality and I do not think it would be acceptable to the people for the Senate to be able to deny supply. I do not think that the government should be required to go to the electorate if the Senate refuses approval of a bill. The Senate should not have an absolute veto on bills in any event, but should have a substantial suspensive veto. Refusal to adopt a bill in the Senate should not be considered a vote of no-confidence. That does not mean that the government could not have an election on an issue arising from Senate refusal to pass a bill if it wished, but it would not be required to do so.

Senator Deschatelets: Is it your intention to try to Canadianize the Australian system as far as a veto for the Senate is concerned? It seems to me very strange that you would suggest that the Senate could force an election of the House of Commons without the members of that house being involved.

Senator Frith: That is why I said that we should not have the same powers as the Australian Senate in that regard. What I am trying to do, having suggested what I think are some of the good points of the Australian system, is outline some of the bad points that I do not think we should acquire.

Senator Doody: I do not want to impose on the will of the valiant few who remain, but how can the honourable senator suggest that the regions will be protected if in the long run the Senate does not really have the kind of authority or power that the Commons has? We will not have a veto—and when I say "we" I mean the new Senate, and, obviously, I am being very optimistic—or, in other words, authority equal to the House of Commons?

Senator Frith: By doing it, that is all. It is an opinion, and there is no perfect answer. It seems to me that if we have a suspensive veto with the power to generally slow up bills, we will slow up a lot more of them, and if we are elected we will not have any apology for doing so. My whole system is based on a model of what I think will give us, not only enough power, but that amount of power that we will exercise it and, therefore, protect the regions accordingly.

Senator Cook: Would the deputy leader care to mention a few recent bills which we should have slowed up?

Senator Frith: No, I would not.

Senator Thompson: I just want to be clear on the point the honourable senator made. Did he say that when the Senate refuses to pass a supply bill, for example, it could cause an election. Is there double dissolution?

Senator Frith: No, that is the point.

Senator Thompson: Do you want double dissolution?

Senator Frith: No, not here. My suggestion is that we do not have an absolute veto and we do not have the power to refuse supply. Our whole job should be to act as a legislative body representing the regions and reviewing legislation with the political power and the modified legislative power to cause us no embarrassment or diffidence about exercising it.

Senator Deschatelets: But not the power to defeat the government in any case?

Senator Frith: Only in a case where the government feels that the particular bill is so important that they would call an election on it to prove the Senate wrong.

Senator Cook: We would be the same old toothless monster we are now.

Senator Frith: I do not think so. If I did, I would not be saying what I am saying. My views may not be sensible, but they are sincere.

The next question is: Should we have a Senate election and a House of Commons election take place simultaneously? I have said no. Would the Senate be required to have an election whenever it forced the House of Commons into an election? I say no because I do not recommend that the new Canadian Senate have the power to force an election.

Under the system of proportional representation applied to Canada, would it not be likely that we would have a house of many parties considering the existence of provincial or regional parties who might very well send senators to Ottawa? For example, there is the Social Credit Party in British Columbia, the western separatist party in Alberta, the Parti Québecois in Quebec. My answer is yes, I think that would be the result. In addition, it would mean that we would have more evenly spread representation than with the big three, namely, the Liberal Party, the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party. However, there would also be regional parties. I think that would be a good thing because it would reflect the reality of Canadian regionalism.

In my experience in Canadian politics, the basic reaction to regionalism is that it should go away. We say to people, "Stop being so regional, so parochial." This is after 100 years and it is still going on. How can any democrat say, when he is trying to organize or suggest a system or institution to reflect a political reality and a given opportunity for expression of political reality, "I know you are regional but it is too much trouble to set up any kind of an institution that is going to give you a chance, so stop being regional because it is too damned much trouble to force us to set up an institution that can give regionalism an opportunity to express itself"?

Senator Thompson: What public leader has said, "Stop being regional?"

Senator Frith: I say that every Canadian at one time or another, when it did not suit his purposes because he disagreed with some form of regionalism has said, "We should not be so regional." That is my experience.

A good deal of my reasoning is inductive, rather than deductive. It is based on my experience in Canada and my experience, of course, in Australia and that is what I am trying to share with honourable senators. I believe that an analysis, and the analysis of these books that I have read, would support the fact that proportional representation in the form that I am suggesting would probably result in some members of the Conservative Party from all parts of Canada, some members of the Liberal Party and some members of the NDP plus members of regional parties and splinter parties being represented in the Senate. I know that this view may sound rather radical, but I do not see it as a bad thing considering the powers that I am talking about. The fact is that such parties exist and such regionalism exists, but I do not think they are adequately represented in our federal institutions.

Would that not result then in coalitions that could stifle the government's legislative program, and power and duty to govern? I do not think so. I expect there would be many ad hoc coalitions dealing with particular bills and particular issues, and I think that would be healthy. I doubt that there would be permanent coalitions established after elections, because the nature of the Senate as so reformed would not lead to such permanent coalitions. Elections would not be simultaneous and the whole Senate would never be elected at any one election.

What about ministers in the Senate? We would develop our own answer to that question. If, for example, review of executive action and counterbalancing to executive power evolve as the most important role of a new Canadian Senate there should be few, if any, portfolio ministers in the Senate.

How does the Australian system work regarding responsibility of Senate ministers to the lower house? Ministers in the Senate are responsible for their own portfolios and also are officially responsible for answering questions dealing with portfolios of certain of their House of Representatives colleagues. The Attorney General, for example, who is a senator, may be responsible in the Senate for other portfolios. Senator Durack, who was the Attorney General when we were there, was also responsible for Defence, Defence Support, and Immigration and Ethnic Affairs. Similarly, a minister in the House of Representatives will be responsible for the Attorney General's portfolio and other Senate portfolios.

Our system can evolve in either direction. I think it would most likely evolve in the same way as it has evolved in Australia. There would be some senators in the cabinet, and the grouping of portfolios for answering questions in the two houses could easily evolve in the same way.

In summary, honourable senators, in my opinion we can borrow from the Australian system the following good points: For the most part, elections would be held by proportional representation for senatorial regions rather than on the basis of representation by population, by state or by province. The House of Commons should continue to be elected on the principle of representation by population. As to features of the Australian system which can be applied in Canada with modification, I think that representation ought to be regional rather than provincial or state. Power should be given to reject bills on a suspensive veto.

I think we should reject these features of the Australian system: The power to totally refuse bills, the power to refuse supply, and the feature of double dissolution.

Honourable senators, I wish to raise a matter which might be of marginal interest but which should, nevertheless, be mentioned. What will happen to present senators if the Canadian Senate were reformed in the way I propose it? I believe that they should stay on for their constitutional term.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: That is the basis upon which they were appointed to the Senate and accepted such appointment. Provision should be made for supernumerary status, as it is with judges. This was referred to in the Lamontagne report.

Senator Deschatelets: It was different in the Lamontagne report.

Senator Frith: Yes, the judges' supernumerary status is different. There is no question about that. I think that voluntary full retirement should also be available to senators.

There is something further about the Australian experience that I have to comment upon. We might wonder whether an elected Senate would create an invidious distinction between elected and appointed senators.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. It is a pity that this most important speech is being delivered on a Thursday afternoon, but have we a quorum? Nobody will read it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the Clerk has counted the senators, and there is a quorum present.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to share the aspect of the Australian experience respecting whether or not there would be an invidious distinction drawn between elected and appointed senators. I thought that such a distinction might be drawn, but was surprised to find that, when a similar system was used in New South Wales, we were told that it just did not work that way. In New South Wales, where there is a second chamber, the senators used to be elected on a restricted ballot. I cannot provide honourable senators with the details of this, but the ballot was restricted on a sort of aristocratic basis. It was decided that that system should be abolished. The new system was in place when we were there. I asked what happened as between the elected senators and the senators who were virtually appointed by the previous restricted franchise system. They seemed surprised by the question. They said that it just did not turn out to be a problem in any way. There was simply no invidious comparison drawn between the senators who were elected under the former system and those who were elected under the new system. In any event, soon there will be none of the former in office. My point is that the system of transition worked perfectly well.

Senator Thompson: The senators there only serve for six years.

Senator Frith: That is correct, it is a six-year period in New South Wales.

Senator Thompson: We have a longer term.

Senator Frith: That is right. I am simply pointing out that, if these reforms are considered to be desirable, this problem will not be encountered. As well, it will be an inexpensive reform.

Honourable senators, that brings me to the end of Part I. It will be recognized that there are many aspects of the so-called model that I have suggested that will certainly bear closer scrutiny. I hope that the proposal will receive that scrutiny.

I propose, if honourable senators are in agreement, to discuss on another occasion the constitutional and political obstacles which I see as standing in the way of such a model. I will discuss what I think should be the long-range target, which, in effect, is what I have just described, and what we should do in the meantime to reach that target. I thank honourable senators for their attention. I thank them for their questions, which have sharpened my perception of the points I have made. I can only close by saying: To be continued.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I should like to ask one question, to be answered at the next sitting, when this debate is resumed. In the beginning of his speech, Senator Frith said something that I did not like too much. He said that he is in favour of an elected Senate because the Senate needs muscle. I would like to know from him, in his future observations, what he means by "muscle"? Would he qualify that term? Why must senators be elected in order to bring muscle to the Senate?

He seems to suggest that an elected body means that that body will have muscle. Here we have many elected members of Parliament, and I think to be elected in the House of Commons does not necessarily mean there is any muscle there.

I would like to know from the honourable senator, if he will be good enough to define it for me, the meaning of "muscle." I would like to see how we could arrive at a big Senate full of muscle by electing senators.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, in all fairness, if my friend is asking about Senate muscle, that question should be directed to Senator Perrault.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am grateful to Senator Denis for his question. I thought I had defined, or tried to define, what I meant by "political muscle," "legislative muscle" and "parliamentary muscle". In asking me this question, Senator Denis has given me the opportunity to "play it again" for some of the honourable senators who were not present to hear it the first time.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

• (1710)

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 7, 1982, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 7, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Buckwold be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Lewis on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—EFFECT ON CANADIAN-OWNED SECTOR OF PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. No doubt the leader has read that profits in the petroleum sector have declined by 54 per cent during the first six months of 1982 compared with the same period in 1981. Worse than that, profits for the Canadian-owned sector are down by 87 per cent compared to the average decline of 54 per cent.

Given that the National Energy Program was designed to promote and help the Canadian-owned sector of the petroleum industry in particular, can the leader give the Senate an explanation as to why it has had the opposite of the desired effect?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure that the National Energy Program has had the opposite of the desired effect.

Hon. R. James Balfour: The facts speak for themselves.

Senator Olson: The preamble to the question is difficult to agree with, so it is not possible to answer the substantive part of the question. If the preamble is not part of the question, it should not be put. That is the problem I have, and why I have to answer the question—

Hon. G. I. Smith: Why don't you answer the question instead of giving a lecture?

Senator Olson: I am answering the question.

Senator Charbonneau: Would the leader permit me to rephrase my question?

Senator Olson: Certainly.

Senator Charbonneau: Profits in the petroleum industry decreased by 54 per cent in the first half of 1982, compared with the first half of 1981. The profits of Canadian-owned companies in the same period were down 87 per cent, compared with the average of 54 per cent over all. Can the minister explain why that is so, given the National Energy Program, which was supposed to help promote profits for Canadian-owned companies?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the National Energy Program was designed to do more than that. It was designed to enhance the percentage of ownership by Canadian companies, which even my friends opposite would agree requires some investment, and that, of course, has been achieved to a large degree.

However, I will take the honourable senator's question as notice and obtain a response from the Ministry of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am tempted to give the honourable senator an obvious answer from the top of my head, but perhaps it would be more satisfactory to him if I take his question as notice.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, would my honourable friend undertake, at the same time, to look into the curious circumstance that the profits of Canadian oil companies have gone down 83 per cent while the profits of foreign-controlled companies have gone down only 38 per cent? That seems to be a complete contradiction in terms. We understood that among the goals of the National Energy Program was that of improving Canadianization. How can Canadianization proceed if Canadian companies are reduced to such sore straits in terms of profits, compared with foreign-owned companies, bearing in mind also that the decrease in the profits of Canadian oil companies is greater than the average decrease of Canadian industry as a whole, which, God knows, is bad enough?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, apart from the arguments advanced by Senator Roblin, his question is exactly the same as that asked by Senator Charbonneau, and I have already given an undertaking that I will obtain a reply.

NEWFOUNDLAND

CORNER BROOK—SUGGESTED LOCATION OF FISHERIES COLLEGE—EXPANSION OF JOB CREATION PROGRAMS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in response to questioning in the other place last week concerning the serious situation affecting the Bowater Corporation in Corner Brook, Newfoundland, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated that he might review the situation regarding the location of a fisheries college, with a view to moving it from St. John's to Corner Brook, on the west coast of Newfoundland. That was coupled with other prospective ideas. Has the Leader of the Government anything further to report on that situation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first I would have to inform myself concerning any speculation attributed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with respect to that college or institute. Perhaps that is what the honourable senator is asking me. In any event, I would need to know the basis upon which he is asserting that speculation before I can reply.

Senator Marshall: On November 30 there was a press release from the office of economic development initiatives concerning an announcement by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Economic Expansion of various job creation programs under the enterprise development program, support for technology and enhanced productivity, defence industry production, Research Council programs and other programs that would provide up to 13,300 jobs. In view of the wide area of responsibility and impact that the minister could have, is any consideration being given to having that department look into the situation which has occurred on the west coast of Newfoundland, and, hopefully, come up with some type of replacement for the loss of almost 800 jobs in the forest industry?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in response to the first part of the question as to whether the two ministries suggested by the honourable senator will be looking into the matter, I will say there is no doubt in my mind that both of those ministries are keenly aware of the economic distress being felt by those affected, and, therefore, they are looking into it.

• (2010)

With respect to the second part of the question—that is, whether they have reached any conclusion such that they would be ready to announce some affirmative action which would deal with it—I cannot give any undertaking until I ask them.

NATIONAL UNITY

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In the spirit of freedom of information, can he confirm whether public opinion polls are being conducted by one or more departments of government on the question, broadly speaking, of western alienation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Nurgitz should be a little more specific in framing his question. I say that because I believe there have been a number of polls taken, either directly or—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): For the sake of Hansard, it should be noted that Senator Perrault has just entered the chamber carrying a heavy load of files.

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators, I have had the same experience. I know that Senator Perrault now realizes how acutely he is missed in this place. That was a great welcome.

Senator Flynn: You certainly have contributed to that feeling.

Senator Olson: Perhaps I could get back to answering the question of Senator Nurgitz.

Honourable senators, I would have to make inquiries to discover whether any recent polls have been conducted. There are a number of organizations in Canada, in addition to the Liberal Party, if you like, or the Government of Canada, which are interested in the very matter raised by Senator Nurgitz. I will have to make some inquiries in this regard. I believe the senator addressed his question more specifically to whether the government was undertaking such polls now.

Senator Nurgitz: In asking a supplementary, honourable senators, perhaps I could be more specific. When the minister is making his inquiries, could he confirm whether it is the Secretary of State, the Office of Federal-Provincial Relations or the Office of the Prime Minister that is conducting these polls? Will the results be made public?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall take those questions as notice.

THE ECONOMY

COST OF DAVEY-JOYAL REPORT

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I address this question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, realizing that he will have to take it as notice. Would the minister undertake to provide the Senate with particulars of the total cost involved in producing the so-called Davey-Joyal, or Joyal-Davey, committee report on the six-and-five program, including the physical cost of producing the material and the cost in terms of man-days that went into the preparation of that blatant piece of Liberal Party propaganda?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I suppose that the simple answer to the question is yes. I could comment on the other remarks that have been made, but the Leader of the Opposition would not like that, so I will just say, "Yes."

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Bravo!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FRANKS REPORT—RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to refer the Leader of the Government in the Senate to the fact that reference was made, in one of the committees of the other place, to a document called the Franks Report. I believe that document was a study conducted by Professor C.E.S. Franks and that it was commissioned by the Speaker of the other place.

My question is: Does my honourable friend know whether there are any recommendations contained in that report that affect the Senate or any of the committee of the Senate?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall have to take that question as notice.

Senator Roblin: I wonder whether it would be possible for my honourable friend to produce a copy of that report so that it may be examined by the members of this house?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take that into account and make the necessary inquiries. I hesitate only because it is my understanding that this is something undertaken by the other chamber. I do not think that, at this point in time, I can give an undertaking to bring the document here.

Senator Roblin: I am a little puzzled by that reply. I believe the report was examined by one of the committees of the other place. If so, it is obviously in the public domain. Therefore, I think my honourable friend could well undertake to produce it.

• (2015)

Senator Olson: If that is the fact—and I am not questioning that it is the fact—I think it is as simple as my honourable friend says it is.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend still has not said he will produce the report. That is the question I would like him to answer.

Senator Olson: I did answer the question very specifically, with some qualifications. Then you came along and offered a reply to those qualifications, that it was already in the public domain. I now reply that if it is that simple, obviously we can get it. However, if the qualifications have more validity than your explanation of them, then those qualifications still apply.

Senator Roblin: That is the trouble with my honourable friend; he won't come clean, and he won't say that this document should be provided. If it affects the Senate, which was my original question, then I think we have a right to ask that it be produced without qualifications.

Senator Olson: I have an equal, and perhaps even superior, interest in whether reports are being prepared that affect the Senate, but my friend is asking me to give a firm, irrevocable undertaking that I will produce something, when I am not sure at this moment whether—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You could never do that.

Senator Olson: —I, as a minister of the government, have the right to give it. I said I would make inquiries. Obviously, I am as interested in this and in seeing that the Senate gets it, particularly if it deals with the Senate, as he is.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend agree that if the document does affect the Senate he will produce it?

Senator Olson: Your honourable friend will agree to what he has already said he will agree to.

Senator Flynn: That is the best he can do.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend object to being described as a cream puff?

Senator Olson: I do not think you can make that assumption.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE FOR HEART ATTACK VICTIMS

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the minister of physical fitness. I give him that title having seen the heavy load he carried in. My question is directed to the prevention of heart attacks in this building. I would ask him, with the emphasis on prevention, why we have not followed through with the recommendations made across the provinces by cardiac divisions with respect to buildings where there are large numbers of people employed, pertaining to signs, directions, and so on.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, the idea advanced by Senator Thompson has, I think, a great deal of merit. The situation in the Parliament Buildings is such that, should an emergency arise, there are certain offices which really would not know what to do.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Which ones? I can think of some where they do not know what to do already.

Senator Perrault: I am talking of matters relating to health, Senator Smith.

The idea advanced by Senator Thompson is an excellent one, and I am going to take the matter up immediately with parliamentary officials and with the Department of National Health and Welfare. There should be an emergency telephone number posted prominently in all offices or at least some directive available for secretaries and other staff with respect to emergency procedures to be followed should someone in those offices suffer some physical malady.

Hon. Jack Marshall: There should be some doctors in the Senate.

Hon. Robert Muir: May I just add that I agree with the minister. In my years here I have seen many people, in both the Commons and the Senate, die from heart attacks. There should be emergency assistance available.

INDUSTRY

Hon. Robert Muir: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I ask him, because of the urgency of the situation, if he could possibly give a report tomorrow on the situation respecting assistance to the Sydney Steel Corporation, the financial assistance promised by the federal government. I understand that the Honourable Ed Lumley is rather hesitant about coming forward with the promised assistance. I would appreciate it if we could get something on that.

● (2020)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can give an undertaking that I will try, and most of the time when I give that undertaking I have been able to deliver the answers on time. I did give an updated reply on that subject some time ago. I do not believe it went quite as far as Senator Muir was asking at that time, but I will make an inquiry to see if I can be more specific and more up-to-date.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN FORCES—ACCOMMODATION FOR PERSONNEL

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Marshall on August 4, 1982, concerning housing for the Canadian Armed Forces.

Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not taken any recent initiatives regarding the provision of housing for the Canadian Forces. However, CMHC has set up, in co-operation with DND, a joint CMHC/DND task force to undertake a comprehensive review of all DND married accommodations. This task force started work in September 1982, and will be reporting in early 1983.

AIR CANADA

CHARGE FOR CREDIT CARD

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question asked on December 1, 1982, by Senator Marshall concerning the $15 charge for En Route credit cards. He wanted to know the justification for Air Canada's introduction of this charge.

There are two reasons for this decision. First, the rising cost of operations in recent years. In the last year, the cost increased by 20 per cent. Air Canada is attempting to cover these costs.

Secondly, the decline in the proportion of cardholders—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Does that have the six-and-five rule in it?

Senator Olson: That is not in the reply that I am coming to now.

Senator Roblin: It certainly isn't!

Senator Olson: The second reason is the decline in the proportion of cardholders who make use of extended credit terms. Those who make use of extended credit terms provide interest income which helps offset operating costs.

Hon. Jack Marshall: At 24 per cent it should.

Senator Olson: The proportion has declined from 66 per cent previously to below 50 per cent in 1982. The alternative to an annual fee presumably would be to charge a higher interest rate to the declining group of cardholders who make use of extended credit.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SOUTH AFRICA—CRITERIA FOR ISSUANCE OF EXPORT PERMITS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer. This is a little Christmas present for Senator Nurgitz, but I do not want to get his hopes up because it is—

Hon. R. James Balfour: Senator Nurgitz does not celebrate Christmas.

Senator Frith: —more like something for a Christmas stocking.

Senator Balfour says that Senator Nurgitz does not celebrate Christmas. Hanukkah will do then.

It deals with that part of the question that Senator Nurgitz put to me some time ago, and the part that bears in common on the question asked by Senator Lang on December 1, 1982. The answer deals generally with the export of military products.

Existing Canadian regulations and policy regarding exports of military products and components is a restrictive one. In general, it is based on the principles that such equipment should not be supplied to countries considered as representing a military threat to Canada; to countries involved in hostilities or which may be involved in imminent hostilities; to those countries to which U.N. resolutions forbid the export of arms; or to regimes considered wholly repugnant to Canadian values and especially where such equipment could be used against civilians.

Controls on the export of military and strategic goods and technologies are maintained under the legislative authority of the Export and Import Permits Act. Under the Export and Import Permits Act, permits are required for a wide range of strategic industrial goods and technologies as well as military and nuclear goods and technologies as defined in the Export Control List. Goods identified on the Export Control List require permits for export from Canada to all destinations except the U.S.A., where permits are generally not necessary if that is the ultimate destination of the goods.

This act and its regulations had previously been administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in consultation with other concerned departments and agencies, and export permits were issued under the authority of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Following the government reorganization announced in January, responsibility for the issuance of export permits is now legally vested in the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Canadian export licensing authority, the Office of Special Trade Relations, Export Control Section, is also now located within the Department of External Affairs.

The process of export permit approval provides, and will continue to provide, for close scrutiny of individual applications. Where political or security implications exist, permit applications are reviewed by both the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence. Difficult or sensitive cases are submitted to concerned ministers and may also be referred to cabinet wherever the same is deemed to be appropriate.

It should be noted that COMECON is an independent institution and is not part of NATO. Canada is a member of COMECOM and participates in the establishment of COMECON policies. Canadian export controls on strategic products, which are reviewed by COMECON, are in accordance with our obligations as a member of the organization. It should be noted that COMECON is concerned about exports to only a limited number of countries; that is, Warsaw Pact countries, the People's Republic of China, Albania and Mongolia.

Military goods and technologies subject to the U.N. arms embargo on South Africa are identified on the Export Control List. The majority of goods listed on the Export Control List are not military but, rather, strategic industrial items; that is, equipment and technologies of a commercial civilian nature and design that could have a military application. Included here are items such as computers, telecommunications systems, certain civilian aircraft, avionics equipment, sophisticated industrial fabricating machinery, and so on. Exports of this type of equipment to South Africa are allowed only when destined to bona fide commercial concerns for civilian application.

Where doubts are raised about the end user of such equipment, permit applications are considered interdepartmentally. Should there be any evidence that the equipment in question is to be used for military purposes or against the civilian population, the permit application is denied in keeping with U.N. Security Council Resolution No. 421. No export of military goods to South Africa is approved.

Honourable senators, and in particular Senator Nurgitz, will have noticed that this answer begins with a very general application and narrows down to South Africa. However, I have still only given the general principles as far as South Africa is concerned.

As I understand it, I still owe Senator Nurgitz the actual statistics he asked for. I hope they will complete the picture.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—THIRD READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the third reading of Bill C-135, to amend the National Housing Act (No. 2).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

[Senator Frith.]

FARM LOANS INTEREST REBATE BILL (NO. 2)

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, December 1, the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for second reading of Bill C-134, respecting rebates of interest on farm loans made under the Farm Credit Act.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, Bill C-134 attempts, in a way, to deal with a major problem facing the agricultural industry in Canada. Before dealing with that problem, it might be worthwhile to review, for a moment, the importance of the agriculture industry to Canada. There are in Canada over 300,000 farmers who provide direct employment for 500,000 people. In addition, there are approximately 400,000 restaurants and food outlets providing an additional 200,000 jobs. The fact is that agriculture is the largest single employer in Canada. The agri-food industry constitutes 40 per cent of our economy and employs 25 per cent of those fortunate to have jobs today.

Agricultural products also play a major part in our exports. In 1980 we exported $8 billion. In turn, we imported $5 billion, leaving us with a surplus of $3 billion. Despite all these important statistics, agriculture remains neglected by the government. The government is very quick to act on behalf of industries such as Canadair and de Havilland, but the agriculture industry can get in line and wait its turn.

Farm production costs are increasing each year and the profits are declining. It is estimated that farm profits will decline by 20 per cent this year. This results in a reduction of farm purchases. The loss of farm income affects small rural towns and villages where people such as the machinery dealer, the automobile dealer and the local service station owners are hard hit. Market prices for farm produce are, in many cases, below the cost of production. In my province it costs approximately 5 cents per pound to produce potatoes, and at present they are selling for about 2 cents per pound. Needless to say, the farmers are really feeling the squeeze. Net farm income has changed very little since 1974. Apparently the farmers have had their six-and-five program for some time.

The total farm debt is also a most interesting statistic. It is almost frightening in its magnitude. The Farm Credit Corporation is generally thought of as being the principal supplier of credit to Canadian farmers. At the present time Canadian farmers owe the corporation $4 billion, and 11 per cent of the borrowers are in arrears or default. But the Farm Credit Corporation is not the sole supplier of credit; indeed, it supplies only about 20 per cent of the credit given to Canadian farmers. The total debt owed by Canadian farmers is $20 billion, and the annual interest is $3 billion. That is a major factor in the cost of food in the retail stores. At the present time 150,000 farmers have outstanding loans. The average farmer is paying $20,000 per year in interest payments. The CBC program The Journal recently reported that some farmers were paying approximately $20,000 per month in interest. I have never pretended to be a mathematician, but an interest payment of $20,000 per month could only result from a loan in excess of $1 million. I would think that any farmer with a debt that great has very little hope of repaying it under present conditions.

The two main factors in increased cost of farm production are interest rates and energy costs. I shall deal with interest rates later, but I would like to say a word now about energy costs. Energy costs range from 8 per cent in beef production to approximately 30 per cent in cash crops. One of the major factors in energy costs is the federal taxes on farm fuels. That tax is 62 cents per gallon on diesel fuel and 69 cents per gallon on gasoline. Honourable senators, I would like to give you a breakdown of those costs: federal excise tax, 7 cents per gallon; sales tax 15 cents per gallon; petroleum compensation charge, 18 cents per gallon; Canadian ownership charge, 4 cents per gallon; petroleum and gas revenue tax 7 cents per gallon, and corporate tax 18 cents per gallon. Thus the tax on gasoline alone totals 69 cents per gallon. The excise tax of 7 cents per gallon does not apply to diesel fuel, reducing the federal tax fuel to 62 cents per gallon.

When I came across that information I phoned a Prince Edward Island farmer who runs an average operation. I knew he kept very accurate records. He told me that he burned 1,700 gallons of diesel fuel in a year, on which he paid federal taxes of $1,054, and 700 gallons of gasoline, on which he paid federal taxes of $483, for a total of $1,537. The total taxes paid on fuel by Canadian farmers last year was $145 million. I cannot think of a better place for the federal government to begin assisting farmers than to reduce or eliminate that fuel tax. I believe all of the provinces have now eliminated their provincial taxes on farm fuels, and I see no reason for the federal government to keep on taxing the farmers at the present rate.

Energy costs include the cost of electricity. The cost of electricity in my province is particularly high because we depend on oil-generated electricity. We have no control over the cost of oil. Prince Edward Island farmers pay 2.5 times the average Canadian rate for their electricity. In preparing my notes for this debate I phoned the premier of the province and asked for information in this regard. He told me that he had just come from a meeting with Cavendish Farms, a frozen food company on Prince Edward Island, and they were complaining to him that their electrical costs for the year amounted to $1.2 million. This will give honourable senators an idea of the problem faced by industry on Prince Edward Island.

The province signed an agreement with the federal government under the DREE Program. There are what is called free unilateral dollars unspent in this program. The province asked the federal government to provide a temporary subsidy while some other form of assistance was worked out. The premier wrote to the Prime Minister on this matter over a year ago. Approximately six months later he received a reply that the matter had been referred to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Six months later the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources replied that they were beginning to study the program. In the meantime, however, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has changed, so no one knows what is going on.

I hope that some honourable senators on the other side will exercise their influence and urge the current Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to give that suggestion some consideration.

While farmers are having difficulties, honourable senators, I feel that the Minister of Agriculture is also having difficulties. He recently boasted of his influence within the Liberal Party, and said that no other cabinet minister supported the current President of the Liberal Party. He took responsibility for the election of the lady.

It is too bad, honourable senators, that he did not spend a little more time campaigning within the Liberal Party—and more particularly within the cabinet—on behalf of the farmers, because he has hit a dead end on a number of problems.

The minister has said that he agrees with the Conservative program that was developed by the Honourable Alvin Hamilton—the agri-bonds. He agrees with the program, but he cannot persuade his cabinet colleagues to accept it.

The Lortie Commission, which, incidentally, did not have a representative from agriculture on it, recommended against the principle of agri-bonds. I am sure the minister has run into all kinds of problems within the cabinet with respect to that.

Several months ago the minister issued a pamphlet called "Agri-Strategy". Although the cabinet has agreed in principle, it has refused funding for the programs suggested in that pamphlet. I would suggest that he spend some time with the Minister of Finance to see whether he can change his mind on that.

The minister has been dealing with the banks with respect to small business development bonds, but has received little co-operation. I suppose he cannot expect their co-operation since he has spent the greater part of the past year and a half criticizing banks for charging too much. He is now in the position, as the minister responsible for the Farm Credit Corporation, of charging a higher rate of interest than the banks charge, and I am sure the banks remind him of that when he approaches them.

A few months ago the Farm Credit Corporation Act was amended to allow long-term borrowing by that corporation. The minister said there was all kinds of money floating around for long-term borrowing. He said there were Euro-dollars and American dollars, and that in Switzerland he could get money at 8 or 9 per cent. Honourable senators, he has not been able to borrow one cent. Again, has he received cabinet permission?

An Hon. Senator: He probably needs a new Visa card.

Senator Phillips: One of my colleagues suggests that he probably needs a new Visa card, and I agree with him. That would be the solution.

I point out that the former Minister of Public Works ran into a great deal of difficulty and was demoted to Minister of State (Finance). Surely we can find some place to put the current Minister of Agriculture so that we can make a fresh start.

Honourable senators, the Special Farm Assistance Program was designed to deal with two things: interest rates and refinancing. The program was originally announced over one year ago, and a year later we find the legislation has just been introduced in Parliament. Obviously, there was no great rush with that. After all, the government had to deal with important problems such as Dome, de Havilland and Canadair. The farm economy was left waiting.

In the November budget, $50 million was provided for assistance to farmers, and in the June budget an additional $50 million was added. After that, the minister went to the Farm Credit Corporation and said, "You have a lot of money to lend, so I will take $100 million and put it into a special program."

Honourable senators, normally that would have been a far greater disaster than it is at the present time, because normally the Farm Credit Corporation runs out of funds around October, and can then only accept applications for loans based on the next year's funding. This year things are in such a "Liberal" mess that no one is making application for farm loans, so the money is available.

We now have $200 million for that program. That might seem to be generous funding, but it is only $200 million for the refinancing of $20 billion of debt. Dome Petroleum received $500 million for refinancing $3 billion. There is a vast difference between the funding available for certain corporations and the funding available for farmers, and I fail to see why we have a double standard.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has stated that the funds are insufficient and that $1 billion is required. There are 20,000 farmers in need of refinancing, but there is only $200 million available, with $130 million designated for this year and $70 million for next year.

Honourable senators, the program will not succeed because there is not sufficient funding available to meet the problem.

The sponsor of the bill has stated that 554 loans were applied for and approved, totalling $80.1 million. A rebate of 4 percentage points amounts to $3¼ million. That is not exactly a large amount when one considers that de Havilland and Canadair each received $200 million in the one day, and yet we have provided only $3¼ million for farmers in the one year.

In Atlantic Canada the amount loaned totalled $2.7 million. A rebate of 4 percentage points in that region amounts to only $108,000. Honourable senators, that was far less than the minister's travelling expenses for last year, because they amounted to $156,000.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture estimated, as I said earlier, that the amount of money required for refinancing is $1 billion. A rebate of 4 percentage points over a two-year period amounts to $80 million. The $16 million provided for the interest rebate is 20 per cent of the amount required.

Honourable senators, I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill to tell us how many farmers have received the maximum amount. The average loan so far, I believe, has been in the vicinity of $145,000. I should also like to ask why there is no provision for prepayment. Money is being loaned over a period of 10 to 29 years. I am always optimistic that a Conservative government will be elected. Surely in the next 10 years we will win an election and then interest rates will come to refinance and take advantage of lower Conservative interest rates. That is not impossible. Today the ordinary mortgage on a home provides for repayment, and I see no reason why a farmer should be held to an interest rate of almost 16 per cent for 20 years. Interest rates will come down some day, honourable senators, and I look forward to seeing farmers free to take advantage of that situation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Molgat has authorized me to say that he has nothing to add on second reading. I have discussed the matter with Senators Molgat and Phillips, and Senator Phillips is of the opinion that this bill could stand some study in committee. Therefore, if the bill receives second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Frith, for Senator Molgat, moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA EVIDENCE BILL, 1982

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 30, the debate on the motion of Senator Lewis, seconded by Senator Barrow, for second reading of Bill S-33, to give effect, for Canada, to the Uniform Evidence Act adopted by the Uniform Law Conference of Canada.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, as sponsor of this bill, Senator Lewis has spoken with a great deal of competence. His presentation was very objective, and he has demonstrated an uncommon knowledge of how our courts function in the matter of presenting evidence leading either to the conviction or acquittal of the accused.

The proceedings must maintain a careful balance in the presentation of evidence, to protect society and to guarantee the accused a fair trial to protect him from what in many cases can be irreparable prejudice. I think that Senator Lewis has demonstrated that the aim of this bill is to achieve these two goals, and that the bill deserves our undivided attention.

The Uniform Evidence Act adopted by the Uniform Law Conference of Canada is legislation that is vitally needed, considering the fact that the Canada Evidence Act dates back to 1893 and was amended piecemeal over the years, leading to confusion, contradictory judgments, legislative overlapping, and too many anachronisms, anomalies and unnecessary technicalities.

Honourable senators will recall that the recent passage by Parliament of three important Bills made it necessary to amend the 1981 bill.

Thus, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms orders the courts to exclude evidence obtained in a manner that infringes or denies any rights or freedoms guaranteed by the Charter. In addition, according to the Charter, a witness is automatically protected against the use of incriminating evidence in subsequent proceedings, except in the case of perjury and contradictory testimony.

This legislation also became necessary because the Access to Information Act requires the addition of clauses to the Evidence Act regarding the disclosure of government information.

Finally, certain clauses of the 1981 bill relating to evidence required in the case of sexual offences have been omitted, since this is now covered by recent amendments to the Criminal Code relating to sexual offences. I am referring to evidence of the sexual behaviour of the victim of a sexual offence and the repeal of evidence of recent complaint by the victim of a sexual offence.

Obviously, the proposed legislation does not cover all the aspects of the Canada Evidence Act. There are still certain areas where it is preferable to let the law develop within the framework of court decisions. What is important in the legislation being considered today is that it applies to all federal and provincial jurisdiction, in both criminal and civil proceedings.

In its brief and comments on this bill, the Department of Justice stated the following:

> The new Act improves the present law by clarifying the rules of evidence and bringing most of them together within a single body of legislation. It also establishes rules that apply to both provincial and federal jurisdictions and are applicable in both criminal and civil proceedings. If it is adopted in each jurisdiction, it will prove to be a clear affirmation of the law. It will smooth over jurisdictional differences in matters of interpretation of the law of evidence, and will certainly reduce court costs for the parties concerned.

Honourable senators, the other day, Senator Lewis gave us a broad outline of this legislation. He also gave a detailed explanation of the main changes that will be brought about by the Uniform Evidence Act. I do not intend to follow in his tracks, however, and to comment on the various clauses he dealt with in his presentation.

I think it is very important that for once, agreement has been reached among all governments on a new law. Consultations were held with members of the Bench, the Bar and the various legal associations in Canada. Finally, it was agreed to table this bill in Parliament.

There are some points I would like to emphasize, and I feel these are essential points regarding the rules of evidence. The bill refers to the legal burden. Basically, no striking changes have been made. It is generally up to the prosecution or the Crown to prove the guilt of the accused—what is referred to as presumption of innocence—or to provide proof on a balance of probabilities, in some cases. Some exceptions are provided under clause 12, in subclauses 1 and 2 and in clause 13, which refers to the mental fitness of the accused. In the past, it was not clear on whom the burden of proof lay, and who was supposed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused party before the jury or the court was not mentally fit, in order to decide whether the accused was capable of mental discernment when he committed the act in question. Often it was up to the defence or to the accused himself to call a psychiatrist before the court to testify to the mental state of the accused and his fitness to stand trial. Now it is up to the Crown to prove to the court that the accused who is before the court or the jury is mentally fit to stand trial. This is a new rule under the proposed legislation.

There is also the matter of formal admissions which is dealt with in clauses 16 and 17. From now on, the parties to a proceeding maybe asked to make formal admissions on questions of law and fact. This will shorten trials considerably, since counsel and their clients will be able to make admissions in a case on questions of law or fact. Often, counsel will agree on questions of fact. We say that we agree on such and such a fact in order to shorten the proceedings. On the other hand, it is often difficult to agree on questions of law, and the court was not allowed to hear admissions on such questions. In future, counsel will be able to make admissions in a case on questions of law or fact.

The legislation also deals with character evidence, in clauses 23 to 32. The bill retains the basic common law rule that the prosecution cannot adduce evidence of the accused's bad character unless the accused has put his character in issue. What is new in this part of the legislation is that the accused will have to give notice to the court, at least seven days before the trial, of his intention to adduce character evidence. This is also a new law.

Will the Criminal Code retain the admissibility of character evidence in the case of an offence? When we were considering the bill on sexual offences, we defined in one section of the Criminal Code the admissibility of character evidence in cases relating to sexual offences.

Returning now to opinion evidence and experts, no new rules have been written. We who are often in court tend to call various experts when we want to establish certain scientific aspects of the evidence. Under the proposed legislation, written reports of an expert may be introduced without the expert himself actually testifying. This means that written reports will have the status of evidence as soon as they are laid before the court. Under the present Evidence Act, we have to bring the expert into court, so that he can describe his report during the trial, and it may take days before he is asked to testify. This is very expensive for the parties who are calling in the expert. They have to pay the expenses of such witnesses who may be spending days on end in court. The legislation provides that not more than seven experts may be called in to testify at the same trial. The defence or the prosecution will no longer be able to bring in a long list of experts to prove a point in the evidence. This was a waste of the court's time, and it was very costly for the parties in the proceedings. In future, not more than seven experts may be called in, without the permission of the court.

Interestingly enough, in a criminal case an expert could be appointed and required to submit a report on any contentious issue in the dispute. Once this bill has been enacted, the same procedure will apply in civil cases.

One aspect of the bill which also drew my attention has to do with hearsay evidence as referred to in sections 45 to 73. In my opinion, that is the most difficult part of the bill. The bill deals at length with the voluntary statement theory. In the future, it will no longer be necessary to prove beyond a reasonable doubt, presumptive evidence will be sufficient; and that is the test applicable to other questions of admissibility.

As everyone knows, hearsay evidence is always risky because it is impossible to cross-examine a person who has made such a statement outside the court. I would suggest that the committee will have to take a very close look at that section or that part of the bill which deals with hearsay evidence. Even for a lawyer, it is difficult to explain the whole bill in a speech such as I am making now. I think the committee will have to call in expert witnesses to establish just what is the philosophy underlying this section on hearsay evidence, which could also have included the competence and compellability of the witness. There is improvement over the current situation, a change in the principle of evidence.

The list of cases where the spouse may be a witness or be forced to be a witness for the prosecution is rather extensive in this new legislation. It now includes such offences as treason, murder, attempted murder, child murder, homicide and other major offences listed in the Criminal Code. In addition, in all cases, the Crown's interest is naturally deemed to be more important than the harmony between spouses. Indeed, in light of the competence and compellability of the witness as provided for in the new legislation, it would be possible for the Crown to call in as a witness a spouse who would testify against the other spouse, the accused. It can now be done in certain criminal cases whenever the evidence warrants it, but the fact is that, in a criminal case, a wife cannot be forced to stand as a witness against her husband. She can be a witness for the defence, but the Crown cannot force her to testify against her husband. However, under this new bill, in some cases the Crown will be able to compel a spouse to be witness for the prosecution and to testify against his or her spouse.

Of course, there are a great many other clauses with which I will not deal in depth tonight. There is the matter of alibi evidence. This type of evidence is very important but has often been misused before the courts. The Crown would strive to prove the accused guilty, and in the end counsel for defence would produce this evidence of which the Crown was completely unaware. I suggest this was detrimental to the best interests of society, because this evidence took the Crown by surprise. From now on, thanks to this bill, counsel for the accused will be required, as soon as the indictment is submitted to the court, to give notice of alibi evidence to the Crown, indicating the whereabouts of the accused at the time the offence is alleged to have been committed and the names and addresses of the witnesses in support of the alibi, so that the Crown is not taken by surprise and has the opportunity to check the alibi. I suggest also that this amendment may put an end to some legal proceedings, for if the alibi evidence is well founded, the Crown will not try to prove that the accused is indeed guilty. It will be able to prove that the accused was somewhere else at the time the alleged offence was committed. This will save the parties a lot of time and money.

I could deal also with other matters, such as recorded evidence, statutory privileges, court privileges and privilege for psychiatric assessment. In short, the Uniform Evidence Act has not been well received by all members of the judiciary because of its deficiencies.

A detailed study will be needed to discover and correct these deficiencies. For instance, the Canadian Bar Association has still not defined its position on this bill. The Alberta Law and Reform Research Institute has made constructive suggestions concerning the Uniform Evidence Bill. Its report was published in June 1982. The Criminal Trial Lawyers' Association of Edmonton has also made some interesting comments about this bill.

We should also hear the opinions of defence lawyers associations about the various clauses of this bill which, in certain cases, do not in my opinion really assure the accused of a full and complete defence. In summary, this bill is a commendable effort to correct some of the anomalies of the Evidence Act, but there is still room for improvement. After a detailed and careful study in committee, we should be able to amend and improve the bill so that it can fully serve the interests of society and protect the rights of the accused in a democratic society such as ours.

In closing, may I point out that, in view of the great number of measures passed this year by our Parliament, it might become imperative for a Standing Joint Committee of Parliament, that is of the House of Commons and the Senate, to carry out a continuous examination of the studies made by the Law Reform Commission of Canada and other organizations so as to amend the legislative process and, by the use of more modern tools, make it more responsive to the needs of a democratic society going through constant changes and to provide an on-going interpretation of the rights, freedoms, privileges, constraints and limitations of that society. Finally, I want to say, and I believe that I speak for our entire parliamentary group, that we support the principle of this bill. However, we are prepared to examine it in depth in the appropriate Senate committee. Of course, this examination will be lengthy, difficult and arduous, but the committee will be able to call on the expertise of those among us who practise law to work with the party in power with a view to making a serious examination of the bill, and amending some of its clauses if need be, so that this bill can be used as soon as possible to help all those concerned.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may, I shall rise to commend and thank Senator Asselin and Senator Lewis on behalf of the Senate for providing explanations on this major bill, clarifying its principles, and the issues that, of course, deserve consideration in committee.

Incidentally, the two honourable senators who helped us clarify the principles and details of the bill are involved this week before the courts, which shows they are well qualified to help us as well as their own clients.

Senator Lewis will be away at the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Senator Asselin cannot be here with us tomorrow because he will be at the Quebec Court of Appeal.

In any case, these are also the reasons why Senator Lewis has allowed me to state he has no further comments to make at this stage. Although he has a right to answer, he will not. So, if a second reading can be moved, Mr. Speaker, as in the other case, I would suggest on behalf of Senator Lewis that the bill certainly deserves study by the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on 26th November, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Frith for clarification of a point he made in his speech on Senate reform. He said that the regional role of the Senate is of much importance to his whole thesis. Specifically, at page 5112 of the Debates of the Senate he said:

> . . . I do not think I need to prove to any one of the honourable senators present that since the beginning regionalism has been a serious problem for the Canadian confederation.

A few sentences later he said:

> . . . my case depends very much on the Senate's solving what I consider to be one of the main problems, if not the main problem, still remaining unsolved by Canadian institutions, which is regional alienation or regionalism.

I would like Senator Frith to tell us, when he resumes his speech, what he means by "regionalism", because he quoted two authors who dealt with this word. At page 5112 he quoted one author as saying:

> There are probably as many definitions of regionalism as there are people defining—

Further on he quotes another author as saying:

> The term "regionalism" is very vague and subject to many different interpretations.

Since "regionalism" seems to be the basis of his theory on Senate reform, could he tell us, when he resumes his speech, what he means by that term?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it might be appropriate for me to do so right now in order to ensure that we understand two aspects of what Senator Deschatelets has raised. It is not quite correct to say that I think regionalism should be solved in the sense of being eliminated. In fact, my contention was the exact opposite, namely, that regionalism is a healthy, normal and natural thing in Canada. The mistake that some Canadians have made over many generations is to say to Canadians, in effect, "You are regional; stop being regional." In other words, to say that the solution to regionalism is to tell people to make it go away. My thesis is not that it should go away but, as I mentioned in the quote that was cited by Senator Deschatelets, that it is a problem that has not been solved by our institutions. In other words, the institution of the federal Parliament and the institution of the provincial legislatures have left a hole that should be filled by the federal Senate. I am not suggesting that regionalism should disappear. On the contrary, I am suggesting that we should accept it as a natural and healthy thing in a country as large as Canada and organized in the way it is. However, I will be happy to try to further define the word "regionalism", although I tried to underline those definitions of regionalism by quoting the authors who I felt were closer to a definition of the problem of a forum for regional interests that I believe a renewed Senate could help solve.

I will come back to other aspects of that question when I continue with parts two and three of my speech, which I hope to give in one sitting. I am sure honourable senators will be glad to hear that. Just what I mean by regionalism is that I think it is natural and healthy in Canada but it has not been properly solved nor given an opportunity for expression in our federal institution.

Senator Deschatelets: Will you permit another question? When you propose that senators be elected, do you mean by regions and not by province?

Senator Frith: There is nothing I am happier to make clear because that is a cornerstone of my thesis, that representation should be organized by senatoral regions and not by provinces.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Charles McElman, for Hon. Hartland de M. Molson, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Wednesday, December 8, 1982

The Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its Third Report as follows:

Your Committee, pursuant to Rule 67(1)(e), having examined the Rules of the Senate, recommends the following amendments to Rule 67(1):

1. add a new paragraph (n) as follows:

"(n) The Senate Committee on Energy, composed of fifteen members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred, if there is an order of the Senate to that effect, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters, relating to energy generally, including:

(i) the exploration, production, conservation, transportation and marketing of hydrocarbons;

(ii) the production of electricity by any means, its transmission and marketing;

(iii) the import and export of energy resources;

(iv) renewable energy resources;

(v) mineral resources."

2. delete subparagraph (i) (iv);

3. delete subparagraph (l) and substitute therefor the following:

"(l) The Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred, if there is an order of the Senate to that effect, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to social affairs, science, and technology generally, including:

(i) veterans affairs;

(ii) Indian and Inuit affairs;

(iii) cultural affairs and the arts;

(iv) social and labour matters;

(v) health and welfare;

(vi) pensions;

(vii) housing."

Respectfully submitted,

H. DE M. MOLSON,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government. We have read or, at least, have had glimpses of the Auditor General's report which states that 30 per cent of the civil servants "don't know what they're doing."

Hon. Jack Marshall: The same as the government. Well, 90 per cent of the government do not know what they are doing.

Senator Charbonneau: My question is: Is the government going to adopt measures in order to reduce the number of federal public servants either through attrition or by other means?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to answer that question in two parts. First, the government has for some time had a program of restraint with regard to the expansion of authorized person-years within the public service.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: That has been adhered to, I think, very satisfactorily. Obviously, there are some areas—for instance, the RCMP and other essential inspection services—where it has not been strictly applied, but the overall expansion of authorization of person-years has been held substantially below the growth in the economy since 1976.

To answer the other part of the question, it is only a matter of days or even hours since the Auditor General's report came out. As is normal, there are some comments and recommendations in the Auditor General's report, which the government needs a few days to look at in order to find, for example, the reasoning behind the comments made. I hope that Senator Charbonneau understands that we need a day or two to consider them. We take such reports very seriously, but we shall be in a position, within a few days, to make some comments on this report.

I cannot say now that we agree or disagree with, or even attempt to qualify, the assertion that 30 per cent do not know what they are doing. I cannot accept that statement at face value without an explanation of the reasoning which led up to that assertion.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

INDOCHINESE FAMILY REUNIFICATION PROGRAM—NUMBER OF IMMIGRANT VISAS

The Hon. the Speaker: Delayed answers to questions.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You wanted a short Question Period, and you have had it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I want to acknowledge what the Leader of the Opposition has just said. Since there are two committees meeting this afternoon, it has been useful to have the short, concentrated and illuminating Question Period we have had.

Senator Flynn: As far as the questions are concerned, there is no doubt.

Hon. Jack Marshall: The light should come from both directions.

Senator Olson: I thank the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues. I might suggest that they almost overdid it!

Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers, the first of which is to Senator Godfrey's question of November 25 respecting the Indochinese Family Reunification Program.

As of October 31, 1982, 6,696 persons have been interviewed. This resulted in the issuance of 5,708 visas, and, up to that date, 5,430 people had arrived in Canada.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FRANKS REPORT—RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I also have a reply to Senator Roblin's inquiry of yesterday respecting a document entitled The Role and Function of the Law Branch of the Canadian House of Commons.

Honourable senators, I have had some research done into this matter and have been informed that the study is available to any interested honourable senator through the Library of Parliament.

Indeed, I have gone one step further and have brought with me a copy of this document in both English and French, which I will send to Senator Roblin.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Thank you.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Send the French copy to me.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF THE FIRST REPORT OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces", tabled in the Senate on 10th February, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Lafond.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Lafond speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on this report.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, the co-ordinating committee chairman is grateful for the short Question Period, which he suggested some time ago. He will not take advantage of it.

• (1410)

Honourable senators, I have no theme to develop, but I do have a few observations to make in closing this debate, if I may.

First, I wish to express my own and the Senate's gratitude to all honourable senators who have participated in this debate. This has established the contention I put forward a few years ago, when I moved the institution of the subcommittee, to the effect that this chamber was the indicated forum in Parliament, at this time, to attend to matters of defence policy. In this context, honourable senators will have noted in the official report of last night's deliberations an alphabetical list of standing, special and joint committees. The Subcommittee on National Defence, by our rules, is not listed and is not shown on the records of this chamber of Parliament.

Our report, I believe, has been widely quoted in the press in Canada as well as abroad. In fact, on December 1, 1982, there appeared in the Wall Street Journal a substantive summary of our report, which it ascribes—and I am not jealous; I apologize to my senior—to the Canadian Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

I think it would be a good idea, for consumption both at home and abroad, if it were shown that the Parliament of Canada has somewhere, a permanent body concerned exclusively with matters of defence. I think it would help our country in its dealings with our allies abroad. I am not giving notice of anything, but I am alerting honourable senators to the possibility that at an appropriate time they will be invited to constitute what is now the Subcommittee on National Defence into a Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence. This would not offend the rules, but would enable the committee to be listed and shown as one of the parliamentary structures of Canada.

Honourable senators, I would also like to express thanks to the Minister of National Defence for the government's formal response to our report, which was placed on the record of the Senate by Senator Perrault on June 22 and 28 last. I have been told that this is the first instance in which such a response has been given in this manner to a report of this nature. I have not verified the fact, but, if this is the case, surely governments should make it a practice in the future.

If I may here make another minor digression, I would draw the attention of the Senate to the absence of government members in the Senate from the Cabinet Committee on Foreign and Defence Policy. In view of the quality of the reports made to the Senate on these subjects, this seems to me to be an anomaly which should be considered and corrected.

Senator Molgat, in his intervention of Wednesday, November 17, quoted the minister as saying recently:

> As far as I am concerned, white papers generally, and white papers on defence in particular, have been used mainly as vehicles by which the government has laid before Parliament and the public its defence policy. They have provided a means for explaining decisions which the government has taken either on major new policies or on major changes in policy. White papers have, in other words, been vehicles for announcing policy decisions resulting from a process of policy review by the government—

I shall repeat that:

> —resulting from a process of policy review by the government rather than vehicles for stimulating public debate on policy issues and policy options.

Senator Molgat interprets this statement as follows:

• (1415)

> —the minister seems favourably disposed, but at this point, if I understand him correctly, he feels we are not ready for a white paper as such. I accept that.

Senator Smith last week appeared to be inclined to agree as well.

I regret to say that I am not disposed to accept this argument so readily. In fact, I find it a rather disingenuous argument. First, in terms of parliamentary practice the British government, we have been told, issues an annual white paper on defence. Surely there is no major shift in British defence policy each year. Secondly, if we look at this from the opposite angle, does that statement by the minister constitute an admission by the government that our defence policy has not altered, indeed has not been reviewed, in the last 12 years? Surely there has been enough change in the world scenario during that period, even changes in our own commitments in terms of defence and in terms of our contribution to our alliances, to make such an admission absurd.

I am not faulting the minister by any means. On the contrary, I believe we all applaud his efforts and support him to the limit, but we also share his frustrations. Here I join Senator Molgat and Senator Smith in saying that any paper—white, green, grey or pink—would be welcome if it gives Canadians some enlightenment of what our government's defence policy is for the 1980s and 1990s.

In the classical view, honourable senators, a country's defence policy is the arm of its foreign policy, and therefore the same juxtaposition exists in the respective ministries. I submit that this does not apply to our case. First, if our foreign policy has a tool at all—and I believe it has—it is much more economic than military.

In military terms, I stated when I opened this debate, it is unthinkable that we can effectively defend ourselves and our own territory. Canada's policy is one of multilateral disarmament, and I agree with it. We all agree with it. Canada has renounced nuclear weapons, and for that matter strategic weapons. We have no such forces, and have no wish to acquire any. But where this policy is misconstrued is when, with all due respect, peaceniks, and the media which features their demonstrations and their outbursts, translate disarmament into depriving ourselves of a reasonably effective shield against the initial shock of an encroachment by a foe who is already identified.

What I seek, and what I believe we all seek, is defence, not war; armour, not armament. The stimulation of such public debate and awareness was, and remains, to my mind, the essential purpose of our subcommittee. We may have made, I would like to believe, a modest beginning at it, but we cannot do it all, and we cannot do it alone. Leadership is required, national leadership, which has to come from the national government, and which, I am afraid, has been sadly lacking.

I say that is particularly so—and this was noted by Senator Smith—when two-thirds of the present generation have no knowledge of the curses of war, and so are eager to accept the sops which are propagated by the equally misinformed and misguided freaks of total, and, if need be, unilateral, disarmament.

We must at any cost maintain the necessary firemen and policemen who, effectively equipped, will provide us with the shield I referred to earlier. I say "at any cost", but Canada, in common with our allies, is in a state of very serious economic convulsions. However, these would increase a hundredfold should worldwide conflict erupt.

The current wisdom seems to rest in holding back on defence needs and to hedge on our commitments because we cannot afford the cost involved. Yet in the last decade our government has readily entered into astronomical commitments of financial resources for mega-projects, many of which have not seen, or will not see, the light of day, or have collapsed.

A recent headline quoted the Economic Council of Canada as stating that "Government has too large a share of money-lending." During these current months, governments are devising a variety of schemes involving hundreds of millions of dollars to create some tens of thousands of temporary jobs which may temporarily stem the tide of unemployment.

Honourable senators, I sincerely believe that some new perspectives have to be used in viewing the nation's business. Your subcommittee's modest proposal to increase our armed forces personnel by 8,400 in this decade—this decade, mind you—at an annual cost of $350 million would account for that many permanent jobs which would not have to be created. They already exist and have to be filled to satisfy our needs and commitments.

If we can get the Canadian patrol frigate program going and grant it the longevity our maritime forces require to survive, thousands of new permanent jobs will be produced in the private sector; and other such cases can be discovered if, as I suggest, new perspectives are sought.

During September, I believe, a trial balloon was launched of a possible—again temporary—employment program for youth, which would extend to six months and include three months of technical and three months of physical training. Of course, this was only an idea on paper, but why should it not have included an option of obtaining this training under an armed forces reserve training initiative?

Honourable senators, new perspectives are indeed needed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to participate in the debate, this order is considered debated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Government indicated, we are adjourning somewhat early today because there are two important committee meetings scheduled for mid-afternoon. I remind the house that the Governor of the Bank of Canada is appearing before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which is studying the main estimates, and that the Minister of Agriculture is appearing before the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture with regard to Bill C-134.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is that all?

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 9, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

BUDGET TAX MEASURES

FIRST REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the first report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the advance study of budget resolutions respecting income tax and other matters relating thereto. I ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 5160)

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE BUDGETS TABLED

Hon. Charles McElman, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled reports approving budgets and/or supplementary budgets of the following committees:

Banking, Trade and Commerce;

Foreign Affairs; and National Finance.

(For text of reports see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

FARM LOANS INTEREST REBATE BILL (NO. 2)

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 9, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture to which was referred Bill C-134, intituled: "An Act respecting rebates of interest on farm loans made under the Farm Credit Act", has, in obedience to its order of reference of Tuesday, December 7, 1982 examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,
HERBERT O. SPARROW,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—ESTABLISHMENT OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON ESTIMATES

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I should like to inform the Senate that at a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance this morning the committee created a Subcommittee on Estimates. Obviously, all matters within the mandate of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will be referred by the Senate to the main committee. It is the intention of the main committee to refer certain items relating to the main and supplementary estimates to the Subcommittee on Estimates, which will allow that subcommittee to make a micro-examination of those items, thus relieving the main committee to make what can be called a macro-examination of the estimates and the economic factors surrounding government spending.

I would also inform honourable senators that Senator Doody was elected Chairman of the Subcommittee on Estimates.

[Translation]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, December 14, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

• (1405)

[English]

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Honourable Senator Frith a question with respect to our plans for next week. Are we to assume that the Senate will be adjourning on Thursday afternoon next week as it normally does?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators, one cannot make that assumption because, as I believe honourable senators know, the House of Commons is now operating under a rule requiring it to adjourn at 6 o'clock in the afternoon of December 22. The attendance of the House of Commons is necessary for royal assent, so we will have to judge whether we are required to sit on Friday on the basis of the amount of legislation we will have received from the other place next week. We will do that in consultation with the Leader of the Opposition and his deputy.

Perhaps I should take this opportunity also to mention that it has been pretty well decided that we will sit on the Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of the following week.

Senator Rowe: Thank you.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

VISIT OF MINISTER AND TRADE MISSION TO JAPAN

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for the Wheat Board.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Argue!

Senator Phillips: I am sorry to interrupt your conversation, Senator Argue, but I want to welcome you back. I presume you came back by CP Air.

I wish to ask the honourable senator if he will confirm that he went to Japan on a complimentary ticket provided by Canadian Pacific Air Lines.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I have been confirming that for a long time, and quite frequently. I don't know how long news is news, but I will give you my answer. As I understand the situation, when ministers are travelling internationally they are not likely to be billed for their tickets or to be asked to pay for them out of their own pockets—any more than I presume the senators who went to Australia were asked to pay their air fare out of their own pockets. I imagine somebody picks up the tab.

As I understand the practice, Air Canada and CP Air provide ministers with complimentary passes. That practice has been in effect for quite some time. The former Conservative government followed the same practice, and I understand that even now the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the other place has the same privilege. Perhaps even the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate has that privilege, although I am not sure of that.

Senator Flynn: Not from CP, no.

[Senator Rowe.]

Senator Argue: On that I stand corrected, but I understand that the same practice is followed with respect to the Leader of the Opposition in the other place and the Leader of the New Democratic Party. Obviously, even if the practice were for these tickets to be paid for out of the national treasury, the minister would not, in any event, be paying for the ticket out of his own pocket.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, if I may direct a supplementary to the minister, as befitting his station in life I understand he was accompanied to Japan by an appropriate retinue of friends and followers, including officials of the Wheat Board and of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and, I presume, an RCMP bodyguard. Were any of those individuals provided with complimentary tickets by CP Air?

● (1410)

Senator Argue: I would think the answer to that is no. I did not have a bodyguard—at least, not one of which I was aware.

Senator Flynn: You don't need one.

Senator Argue: Nobody is interested in a minister who is a farmer from the hills south of Regina dealing in food products. I have not felt the need for a bodyguard. I can assure you that I did not have one on that trip, but I had some farmers representing farm organizations with me. They were all in pretty good shape, and I think they could have taken care of any problem that arose.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary. I presume the minister had certain expenses in Japan such as hotel bills and at least one meal a day. Was he dependent upon the charity of Canadian Pacific for those expenses or were they paid for by a government department?

Senator Argue: CP Air provided the normal fare on their flight. I got no better fare from CP Air than my neighbour. I said goodbye to CP Air when we landed in Tokyo, and I had no further connection with them in any way until I boarded the plane for the return flight.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): It is a good airline, and so is Air Canada.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, my question was based on the situation in Japan, not the getting there. I want to know, if the government paid the expenses within that country, why it was necessary for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board to depend on charity to reach Japan when he was going on official business?

Senator Argue: It is the normal practice followed by ministers, including the Right Honourable Joe Clark and others. I do not want to carry this too far, but perhaps in this instance I might even be travelling in good company.

Senator Phillips: I would remind the minister that the Right Honourable Joe Clark was not responsible for introducing Bill S-31.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I want to make it perfectly clear that I make no apologies for having taken that trip, nor do I make any apologies for the circumstances surrounding that trip. It was beneficial to Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: It was supported by farm organizations, and because we went there and kept up our good relations with Japan we have been able to conclude another very important sale to that country.

I wonder if I might be allowed to quote from The Palliser Wheatgrower, the newsletter of a farm organization in western Canada, dated November 1982, as follows:

> In early October, 1st Vice-President Ron Simpson was invited by Wheat Board Minister Argue to be part of a trade mission to Japan. On his return, Simpson said the trip could not have been more timely or valuable to prairie agriculture.
> "We spent a week visiting flour millers, grain importers, oilseed crushers and others in the trade. And these people were extremely pleased to see us. They left no doubt they are hungry for information on the Canadian crop situation. They have an enormous stake in our industry. They want to continue to buy our products if we can deliver them in reliable quantities and qualities."

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue:

> "I was surprised at how well-informed they are about Canada," said Simpson. "They are knowledgeable about our western rail transportation problems. They are concerned about the Crow issue. They continually asked how it is being resolved."
> "They are alarmed about our small canola acreage this year, and about the frost damage. They want to buy our canola for their crushing mills. They want to know if we can continue to offer them good supplies."
> "This was the first such agricultural trade mission from Canada to Japan in ten years. We producers will get benefits from it many times over, because Japan is an incredibly important market for Canada. We sell Japan over $4 billion of goods a year, and 35 per cent of it is farm goods."

I am pleased that Ron Simpson was able to be a part of this trade mission to Japan, and the opinion he expressed was shared by other farm leaders on the delegation. It was a very beneficial mission for Canada.

● (1415)

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Can the minister tell us whether he was the author of that press release.

Senator Argue: No, it is in much better English than I could possibly write. I did not know the press release, which was put out in Regina, was out until I saw it. It is an excellent press release. However, this is not that release. This is a further statement by the First Vice-President, Ron Simpson, of the Palliser Wheat Grower's Association. Without casting any aspersions on anyone in this assembly, I think that his words are authoritative.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): And thank you for asking.

Senator Phillips: I thank the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board for his dissertation. Can he tell us what the exports were to Japan over the past 10 years, when neither the minister or any of his retinue had visited Japan?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): It has gone up ever since he was there.

Senator Argue: Exports have been going up steadily. I do not have the figures at hand but last year we sold approximately 1.3 million tonnes of wheat. Our sales for this year will equal last year's. We sell Japan high quality wheat which is absolutely essential for their mills. They have assured us that their trade with Canada in this regard will continue.

The Japanese have bought from us for some years close to 1 million tonnes of rapeseed. The acreage planted in rapeseed this year was not as high as normal because we suffered a frost. They were interested, because of the frost and because of our low acreage, in whether we would be able to meet their market demand with our own canola production. I was unable to assure the Japanese representatives in any absolute way that we would be able to meet their demand for this year, but I was able to say that about 60 per cent of the canola production is of the first two grades and that we have some carry-over of canola from last year that is of very high quality.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: The Japanese wanted the assurance from us that we would continue to produce and supply them with one million tonnes of canola per year in the years ahead because they have a crushing industry that is built on our canola production. It is a challenge to Canadian canola producers to keep on producing these quantities.

The Japanese went on to say—and I was very interested in this statement—that if we were able to improve the quality of our canola so that the protein content of the meal would be fit for human consumption, they would be prepared to take another million tonnes of canola from us in the years ahead. The Canadian official who was with me, who understands the oil seed business very well, was able to assure them that we have the plant breeding going on that should result in this kind of quality of canola being produced in the next three years to five years. So it is a challenge to Canada to continue to produce the quantities that Japan now requires and it is a further challenge to improve the quality of our canola to take advantage of that market.

I am very proud and happy over the exports of grain from Canada. We are breaking all previous records in many markets. Indeed, a United States Department of Agriculture official who spoke at the Outlook Conference in Ottawa on Monday—

Hon. Jack Marshall: Who asked this question?

Senator Argue: —said that the markets for U.S. production are becoming more and more difficult and to some extent are going down. He said he had to take his hat off to the aggressive Canadian Wheat Board which keeps on expanding its markets.

Senator Olson: Especially under this minister.

Senator Argue: That is a great thing in these difficult economic times.

Senator Perrault: The minister should travel more.

● (1420)

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Would the minister who has just spoken, Senator Argue, enlighten me, although I am prairie born, as to why we use the name canola now instead of rapeseed?

I recall that some time ago a colleague of mine in the House of Commons, Mr. Rapp then an opposition MP representing a constituency on the prairies, was very famous for and involved in the development of recognition of the possibilities of rapeseed. The name Rapp and the product rapeseed were similar, and we enjoyed toying with them when I was, in opposition days, the agriculture critic.

I do not remember the reason for the use of the name canola. Could you tell us why it is being used now?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, Reynold Rapp was a great promoter of rapeseed, and his predecessor in the House of Commons was Alex Bryson, who was also called "Mr. Rape" because of the great promotional work he did for rapeseed in Saskatchewan.

Rapeseed was the name originally given to that particular grain. We have been able to develop a substantial market for rapeseed, but the original seed had some liability in that it carried something called erucic acid, which is a semi-toxic element and not a desirable ingredient.

The oils from rapeseed were considered edible and have been used for human consumption, but the rapeseed meal, because of the erucic acid, was not considered suitable as an animal feed. Rapeseed meal containing that acid was basically used as fertilizer. So, the meal had little economic value.

By improving the quality of the rapeseed, the breeders feel that they have obtained a vastly different product, and to identify that it is an entirely different product the name has been changed from rapeseed to canola. Canola does not carry the liability that rapeseed had, namely, a meal that was not suitable for animal consumption.

The canola that is produced today produces a good edible oil. Over half of the margarines and edible oils consumed in Canada are produced from canola. Today the canola meal is fit for, and is used for, animal consumption. So that is an important economic gain.

If our plant breeders are successful—and I believe they will be—within three to five years in obtaining an improved type of canola—

[Senator Argue.]

An Hon. Senator: Speech, speech!

Senator Argue: I was asked for information, and I am providing that information. If you do not want it, I am prepared to sit down. In any event, I was asked why there was a change in the name.

If the improved canola is a meal fit for human consumption, it will increase the value of the current canola, and perhaps give us an additional million-tonne market in Japan. Even at today's rather low prices for canola, that quantity is worth between $300 million and $400 million, and that is a large amount of foreign exchange.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Would the leader make inquiries and advise the Senate whether or not ministers in the former Clark government, including senators who were ministers, used their passes when travelling by Air Canada or CP Air, or whether they purchased tickets, and, if they did purchase tickets, whether or not they were reimbursed?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can make those inquiries. I am reasonably certain that those ministers used their passes in exactly the same manner as do ministers in the present cabinet.

I need not repeat what the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board has just said, but, as far as I am concerned, that has been the standard practice for at least the past 20 years.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, earlier today, on the eve of the United Nations Human Rights Day which is commemorated on December 10, the Canadian Parliamentarians for World Order held a luncheon meeting. Invited to attend were representatives of the Solidarity Movement who are working in Canada. Some of the invited guests present in the gallery this afternoon are Mr. Zygmunt Przetakiewicz, the Head of the Solidarity Information Office in Canada and a member of Solidarity's Council of the Co-ordinating Office Abroad, headquartered in Brussels; Mrs. Hanna Federowicz, and Mr. Andrew Kostecki.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

CANADA-POLAND GRAIN SALE CONTRACT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board whether it is the intention of the Government of Canada, in the forthcoming negotiations for a Canada-Poland grain pact, to entertain commitments from Poland such as, for example, that, before Canada concludes its grain sale to Poland, Poland must lift martial law and release all the Solidarity detainees and other political prisoners.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have, on more than one occasion in the Senate, answered questions about the situation as between Canada and Poland. Whether Canada will provide grain for Poland, and the credit conditions attached to such an arrangement, will not be decided solely on the basis of Canada's looking for a particular sale of grain to a particular country. Discussion within government circles on the amount of credit that may be provided to Poland in its time of difficulty will depend on Canadian international policies and on international considerations. I have not heard discussed the kind of conditions that have been suggested by the Honourable Senator Haidasz that would be attached to these negotiations.

I have said quite often that I think in international affairs neither food nor medicine should be used as a kind of weapon of war, or any sort of weapon, in diplomatic relations. I think we need to look at the question from the broad point of view of whether, in these difficult times in Poland, we would be assisting the Polish people by providing further sales of grain under particular credit terms.

I believe that we have already shown major generosity in dealing with Poland. Some have criticized the action with respect to Poland taken last year by the current government, but I maintain that we were generous, because we provided credit of $500 million while others did very little. It seems to me that, in providing credit last year and in considering a policy for this year, the government bases its decisions not on the natural desire that our farmers sell grain, but, rather, on what we feel is wise within what might be considered our international obligations.

We have not yet arrived at a particular credit provision for further sales of grain to Poland. That is being considered. If Senator Haidasz is suggesting that, unless particular conditions are met, there should be no credit granted, that will be his position and that position will be known. The government is considering it, however, on the basis of a new deal. I am not at all certain of its magnitude, or of what its provisions may be.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development concerning the Auditor General's report.

The Auditor General mentioned the problem he sees regarding crown corporations and their creation. One example he cites as a crown corporation without adequate parliamentary review is the Canada Development Investment Corporation. I am wondering whether the minister shares that view and feels that some steps should be taken to see that Parliament has more input into the activities of CDIC.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, some time in September. Mr. Dye came to see me to discuss CDIC. At that time his concern was whether the corporation would be, in some form, reviewed by Parliament. I assured him that legislation would be submitted to Parliament, and indeed I sent him all the corporate material, including the special resolutions which were submitted to the shareholders of Canada Development Corporation on June 29.

I want to assure honourable senators that it is the intention of the government to submit legislation to Parliament dealing with both the Canada Development Corporation and the Canada Development Investment Corporation in the context of the special resolutions of Canada Development Corporation made pursuant to an agreement between the government and Canada Development Corporation on May 27, 1982. Other items will be included in that legislation relating to the duties assigned to Canada Development Investment Corporation by order in council on November 23 last.

Senator Doody: I thank the minister for his comprehensive reply. In light of the fact that the resolutions of the corporation to which he refers are not yet available to Parliament, would the minister undertake to assure the Senate and the people of Canada that major acquisitions and disposals of major assets will not take place until such time as parliamentary approval is in place?

Senator Austin: I cannot give such an undertaking at this time. I am not certain what the honourable senator apprehends, but I will bear his representation in mind. At this moment we have no instructions from the Government of Canada to acquire any further assets; nor do we see any possibility, in the immediate future, of divesting ourselves of any assets.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to assure the minister that I have nothing specific in mind. I am thinking in terms of the principle of parliamentary control of the nation's purse. I was delighted to hear Senator Austin agree that the principle was paramount when he told us that legislation would be sought in Parliament to cover these matters. Since the minister agrees, and since Parliament will be asked to provide legislation to cover the sort of activity I have mentioned, I simply ask the minister to assure us that until such legislation is in place major activities will not take place without parliamentary approval.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the difficulty I have in giving that assurance is that the good commercial management of the assets, which are now the responsibility of CDIC, may require some steps to be taken. I cannot predict what advice will be given to me by the directors of CDIC, but no doubt I will have to address myself to commercial changes as they take place and make some recommendation to the Governor in Council pursuant to the wise management of taxpayers' funds; and also take responsibility before Parliament for my stewardship in that respect.

I repeat that I can think of nothing specific that must be done, or that will be done, prior to the legislation being placed before Parliament. I would like to be in a position to have that legislation on CDC and CDIC before Parliament early in the New Year. It is now being drafted.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I thank the minister. Obviously, there is a divergence when it comes to the ultimate responsibility. The minister feels that the board of directors and he himself are responsible for the stewardship of the corporation; but I consider that the stewardship is not even possible without prior parliamentary approval. So, obviously, there is a difference in our conception of the mandate.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the Canada Development Investment Corporation exists as a legal entity, and has the capacity to act in pursuance of the responsibilities which the Governor in Council has assigned to it.

Parliament will have its opportunity to speak to the issue. If I consider that something major has to take place relating to those assets, then I will do my best, within the caveat of commercial stewardship and the most prudent management of public funds, to bring that before to Parliament by way of notice.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have one final comment. I just want to repeat what I said before, that, in my opinion, the stewardship under which the minister takes his responsibility is not, to me, as important as the responsibility of Parliament. I think that should be the first step.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

PROPOSED STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order to ask Senator McElman a question concerning the third report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, which was presented yesterday. My question relates to the proposed amendments to rule 67(1). It has been submitted that the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology shall have referred to it bills which deal with health and welfare, pensions and housing.

It was my understanding that consumer protection was to be included in the terms of reference of that committee. I should like to know the reason why this responsibility was deleted from the new umbrella of responsibilities of the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Hon. Charles McElman: I apologize to the honourable senator. I was engaged in a conversation, and missed his question.

Senator Marshall: My question relates to the third report of the Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders which was presented yesterday as it relates to the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

[Senator Austin.]

I believe that one of the recommendations had to do with including consumer protection in the overall responsibility of that committee, but I notice there is no mention of it in the report.

Could the honourable senator find out and let us know at a later date why consumer protection was deleted from the responsibilities of that committee?

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, the report of the Rules Committee will be considered shortly, and perhaps I can deal with the question at that time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXPENDITURES FROM FUND—DEFICIT—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN CONTRIBUTIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers today. One is in response to a question by Senator Roblin on July 21 having to do with three questions respecting the Unemployment Insurance Fund deficit. It is a fairly long reply, but I am, nevertheless, prepared to read it. Alternatively, I could give it to the Hansard reporter, and have it taken as read.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Having it appear in Hansard is fine with me.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Auditor General, in his appearance before the Public Accounts Committee, stated that "U.I. benefit payments . . . will probably exceed $7 billion for the year ending December 31, 1982": that was not a government forecast. It is currently expected that, at an average unemployment rate of 10.9 per cent for 1982, "UI benefit payments" will exceed $8 billion this year.

The higher rate of payout this year will lead to a substantial cumulative deficit of the order of $2.4 billion in the U.I. Account by the end of 1982, i.e., the amount of employer/employee premiums collected plus the surplus in the U.I. Account at the end of 1981 will be far less than the private sector share of U.I. program costs (which also include administration costs).

In accordance with the provisions of the U.I. Act, any operational deficits in the U.I. Account are covered by way of repayable interest-bearing advances from the Minister of Finance. Under the U.I. Act, repayment of these advances must eventually be provided for within subsequent U.I. premium rates.

The government policy on U.I. premium rates was announced by the Minister of Finance in the House, on October 27, 1982, and explained further by the Minister of Employment and Immigration on the same day.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

CANADIAN BROCHURES POSTED IN UNITED STATES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall concerning U.S. mailings by the Stratford Festival.

This was a U.S. mailing using the American postal service to reach an audience in the U.S.A. As such, it is not illegal.

It would be a different matter if a Canadian mailer went abroad to mail back into Canada. This would clearly be against international postal agreements that are designed to protect domestic services throughout the world.

While it would be preferable if a famous Canadian cultural organization used Canadian stamps to promote its activities, it should be pointed out that there are no special rates between Canada and the U.S.A. for this type of bulk mailing.

For this reason, U.S. companies often find it advantageous to use the Canadian postal system to reach Canadian audiences rather than pay the full first class rate they would otherwise have to pay.

As a little bit of background information, the Stratford Festival trucks 85,000 brochures to the U.S. for mailing to U.S. addresses or addressees.

● (1440)

As a registered non-profit organization in the U.S., it qualifies for a special rate of 6 cents Canadian, applicable only in the United States. The rate is subsidized, of course, by the United States Congress or administration. The lowest rate for domestic Canadian mailings would be bulk third class rate of 13 cents; to mail to the U.S. it would have cost 35 cents. Had the Festival been mailing to Canada from the U.S. it would have paid the first class rate of 20 cents U.S., thus making it advantageous to mail in Canada in order to benefit from the 13-cent bulk rate.

That is the end of the prepared answer. However, I think I ought to add that it points out the risk of accepting newspaper speculation as to what in fact happened, because the facts completely destroy the speculation.

Hon. Jack Marshall: When I have had a chance to read the lengthy and technical answer just given I will respond by putting a supplementary question at a later date.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I move that the report be adopted and that the amendments come into force at the commencement of the next session of Parliament.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Explain.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I would recall to your minds that there was a discussion in the chamber last week, initiated by our colleague Senator Hastings, about the formation of a new committee of the Senate on energy. In consequence, the proposal was approved by the Senate, and referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, because the establishment of this new committee and the delegation of responsibilities to it required amendment of the rules. The rules have to be amended not only to establish that committee, but to take from two other standing committees of the Senate certain responsibilities that they currently have. The other committees concerned were the committee now known as the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, which would be re-established as the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, and the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

The proposed amendments in the report now before honourable senators take into account the establishment of a new committee, and the re-allocation of responsibilities among committees in general.

Concerning a question asked by Senator Marshall about "consumer protection", there was considerable discussion in the committee on whether this should be specifically placed within the responsibilities of the new Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. It was not felt wise to remove consumer affairs from the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. So much of the legislation that comes forward with respect to consumer matters is of a highly technical nature that quite properly falls within the scope of consideration by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. After due deliberation, the committee decided not to recommend that this subject be transferred to the new committee.

There are other responsibilities now allocated to the new Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology that would permit the Senate, in its wisdom, to refer to it certain matters relating to consumer affairs that do not involve technical and legislative aspects. The Senate could refer such matters to the new committee when it felt it advisable to do so, but to transfer overall responsibility for consumer affairs would be a mistake at this point in time.

If there are any questions with respect to the report I shall be pleased to try to answer them.

Senator Roblin: There is a small matter that perhaps Senator McElman would clarify for me. In the proposal for the Standing Senate Committee on Energy I see that as item (n)(v) "mineral resources" is included in its mandate. Yet I notice that rule 67(k)(vii) still leaves the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with "natural resources and mines." Thus we have "natural resources and mines" in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and "mineral resources" in the Energy Committee. Is there any way of reconciling those two so that we do not get conflicts of jurisdiction?

Senator McElman: There was discussion on this point. It was considered desirable to have in the terms of responsibility of the new committee on energy a reference to minerals that would apply to hydrocarbons, specifically to coal. The committee decided that it was not necessary to break it into the specific of coal, and that the reference given by Senator Roblin should remain in the other committee. Again, it was thought that the Senate, in its wisdom, would, when questions arose, decide to which of the two committees a particular matter should be referred. Perhaps that is not wise, but the committee decided that it was the most appropriate way to deal with it. There are many aspects of the mining industry at large that should remain with the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, but when it comes to coal in the energy field it was felt that that should be dealt with by the Energy Committee. That is the best I can do in the way of an explanation.

Senator Roblin: If I may be allowed a comment, I follow my honourable friend's reasoning, but I express the opinion that it would have been preferable to say "hydrocarbons" rather than "mineral resources", because there is a clear conflict between the two. While I am sure common sense will straighten out most of the problems, it would seem desirable to be specific, fi it is possible to be specific, and in this particular case we can. To have said "hydrocarbons" would have eliminated any problem.

Hon. Jack Marshall: In view of the fact that various areas of the economy are changing in importance, has any consideration been given to revamping all of our committees and redefining them under a new structure so that we can deal with the various areas that are coming into focus at this time?

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, there was some limited discussion of that idea. You will note in the report, for example, that the Standing Senate Committee on Energy is to be composed of 15 members. That is a departure from the norm, because under the existing rules our committees are composed of 20 members.

There was discussion on whether we should accept the number 15, or should stick with the norm. The consensus reached, to the best of my recollection, was that it would probably be better if the membership of all committees were reduced to 15; that there should be a consideration of the number, types, and responsibilities of committees; and that this consideration should be undertaken early in the New Year.

There was no motion to that effect; there was no decision to that effect. However, it is my recollection of the general consensus of the members of the committee that our whole committee structure could stand review and change early in the New Year.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

[Senator Roblin.]

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 2, 1982, the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on November 26, 1980.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, you may recall that in commencing my intervention on this subject one week ago today I used as a guide for my remarks a plan I furnished to honourable senators at that time. According to that plan, which appears at page 5111 of Debates of the Senate for December 2, I have delivered the first part of my intervention, and it remains to me now to deal with the second and third parts.

Before continuing, however, I think it would be useful to give you a brief reprise of Part I. Let me do that by referring to the plan for the intervention. Part I is a "Model" for an elected Canadian Senate, and under that heading there are several subheadings. In my reprise I propose to refer to those subheadings again and then, following that, to proceed with Parts II and III. Under Part II, the constitutional and political obstacles, I will be dealing with various subheadings: The amending formula; the Senate; the House of Commons; the Provincial Premiers; and the long range target. Under Part III, headed "In the meantime—", my remarks will be directed to the subheadings: Gradual Change through Changing Attitudes; and the "Lamontagne Report" and other interim steps.

Reverting then to the reprise of Part I, honourable senators, the model for an elected Canadian Senate, I started with this question: What do we want from our Senate? Honourable senators may recall that for a listing of what I considered the desirable functions of the Senate I used those listed in the Lamontagne report. As referred to at page 5111 of Debates of the Senate for December 2, those functions are: first, the legislative function; second, the investigative function; third, the regional function; fourth; the representation of minorities function; and, last, the human rights function.

I pointed out, honourable senators, that it would be on that basis that I would try to build my model for an elected Canadian Senate, and that I would emphasize particularly the third function, that of representation of regional interests.

In turn, that led me to the second aspect of the first main subject, namely Canadian regionalism. It will be recalled that I spent quite some time on the question of regionalism. I gave what I hoped honourable senators would find a useful bibliography of some of the writings on the subject of regionalism. Indeed, I believe that bibliography consisted entirely of Canadian writers.

Honourable senators, part of the reason for giving you this reprise is that I believe certain questions were left dangling last week, and I think particularly of Senator Deschatelets's question with respect to what I meant by regionalism. In particular, I should like to refer Senator Deschatelets to the sources I referred to in Part I of my intervention, but in more general terms, by way of synthesis, may I say that my use of the word "regionalism" in the context of my remarks on this subject last week was meant to convey the feeling of community and loyalty that Canadians have, and usually have at the same time, for two basic communities—the Canadian community and their particular regional community. I do not think it is possible to define the term any more directly than that without limiting it, because to define is often to confine.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Sometimes a precise definition of terms is required for the proper conduct of human affairs and communications, but I think this is one of those terms that are generally better understood in their usage than in their precise verbal definition. I will try to build on that in the thesis that I will attempt to develop as well as in my replies to questions that may be asked.

Honourable senators may also remember that during the course of my speech last week, in referring to Canadian regionalism, I made use of the bibliography I have just referred to in dealing with the historic tensions that have characterized the regional phenomenon in Canada, the fragmentation of federal representation for national parties and the existence of regional parties. All of those subheadings and all of the material that I have referred to are important building blocks in the proposition I am putting forward.

The historic tensions are important as illustrating what I conceive to be a lack of institutional resolution of the problem of Canadian regionalism. The fragmentation of federal representation for national parties is a further reflection of that problem. The existence of regional problems is even more important because it illustrates the point I was making at that stage, namely, the problem of regionalism. It also is important because, in my view, the existence of regional parties in Canada is one of the reasons why an elected Senate, on the basis of proportional representation for senatorial regions, will not work out as it has in Australia but will work out in a way more beneficial for Canada.

Honourable senators, I then moved to the Australian experience by giving my impressions of how the Australian system worked. I did that by means of questions and answers, not only by questions that I put and tried to answer but also by questions put by honourable senators with attempts to answer them. You will find that at page 5117.

On that topic there remained one dangling question. That is a question asked by Senator Stollery as to what the average length of Senate tenure is in Australia. I said the actual term is for six years but the average length of term I did not know and still do not know, but I will endeavour to get that information.

I then moved to the model for an elected Senate to meet Canadian needs, and why I thought it would give us more of what we want from our Senate. I have already said that I believe the general functions and roles of the Canadian Senate are and should be as set out in the Lamontagne report. What, however, were the basic elements of the model for what I considered a workable and successful elected Canadian Senate? They were the following: That the Senate should be elected; that it should be elected from regional senatoral districts rather than from provinces; that those senatorial regional districts should be established by an electoral boundaries commission functioning as our present Electoral Boundaries Commission functions with reference to ridings or to constituencies for election to the House of Commons; and that such regions should be based on regional homogeneity of interest, a sense of community and a sense of belonging rather than on representation by population, because the reason for a second chamber in a country with diverse population concentrations is to mitigate or smooth out the dangers of domination by those population concentrations with their resulting heavyweight representation.

In other words, if you are going to have a federation, you are bringing together certain communities—certain political entities. If those entities do not have equality in terms of population, and if you have, as you must, one legislative body that is elected on the basis of representation by the population, the only way you can mitigate or smooth out the difficulty of domination by those concentrations, is to have another federal body that looks after regional interests, not just defined by population.

Continuing with the essence of the model, the selection should then be for senatorial regions set up in the way I recommended. One might like to address the possibility that the original work in setting up such regions might well be done by a special Senate committee. I would be interested in the observations of honourable senators as to whether we might do the groundwork, at least.

The elections should be for a fixed term. I suggest that half of the Senate should be elected for each period, although it would be up to the final constitutional amendments to settle exactly what the terms should be and how often elections should be held.

I mentioned that they have six-year terms in the United States with elections every two years for one-third. I think that tends to produce too frequent elections. I prefer a ten-year term with elections every five years for one half. I am not adamant on that any more than I am on the exact composition of the regions.

The elections should not be simultaneous with the elections for the House of Commons. It could accidentally happen that an election for the House of Commons takes place at the same time, but it would usually be coincidental rather than by design.

I suggested, on the basis of the material I had studied and on the basis of my experience as a Canadian, that it is likely that a Senate so elected would probably consist of coast-to-coast representation from what I call the big three as long as they still are natural outgrowths of political reality in Canada. I am speaking of the Progressive Conservative Party, the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party. I believe that there would always probably be in the Senate some representatives from regional parties such as the Social Credit Party in British Columbia, and perhaps a western party.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Not likely.

Senator Frith: It could easily result in the election of separatists and might well result in an election of—

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: The Rhinoceros Party.

Senator Frith: —some splinter party such as the Rhinoceros Party. That would depend on whether the proportional representation system produced that result. That is more or less the structure of what I label as a model for an elected Canadian Senate. That was the model that I tried to outline and illustrate in my last intervention.

Honourable senators, that brings me to the two other parts of my intervention—the constitutional and political obstacles, and what we can do in the meantime. First, I will deal with the constitutional and political obstacles. I consider the amending formula as both an opportunity and an obstacle, but in realistic terms, we have to recognize that the model I have suggested represents absolutely fundamental changes to the Canadian Constitution. Honourable senators will recall that Section 38(1) deals with amendments and it provides as follows:

● (1510)

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada—

And, as I say, there is no question that my proposal would require such an amendment.

> —may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by
> (a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and
> (b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces that have, in the aggregate, according to the then latest general census, at least fifty per cent of the population of all the provinces.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: May I make an observation at this point?

Senator Frith: Is it a question or an observation?

Senator Deschatelets: It is a question. The honourable senator will recall that just a few years ago there was a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada concerning the Senate. The Supreme Court decided that the federal government could not amend the Constitution with respect to the Senate without the consent of the provinces, but did not indicate whether it had to be the consent of a majority of the provinces. Does the honourable senator have any observations to make on that matter because, at first sight, the two judgments of the Supreme Court concerning amendments to the Constitution regarding the Senate are rather contradictory.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Deschatelets is referring to the reference to the Supreme Court of Bill C-60 which attempted by a federal statute to amend the Constitution of Canada as in section 91(1) relating to the Senate. It was a reference for an opinion as to whether such an amendment could be made by the federal Parliament alone under that head. The decision was that it could not. Then there was a subsequent reference as to whether the Constitution Act, including an amending formula, could be passed without the consent of all the provinces. I do not believe that those two judgments are contradictory. The first one said that the provinces had to be involved in any amendment of the powers of the Senate.

Senator Deschatelets: But it implied that the unanimity of the provinces was required.

Senator Frith: Not really, but, in any event, the next question that was referred to the Supreme Court was the question of the British North America Act, and while it was not clear as to how many provinces were required to agree—and there were some dissenting judgments—Parliament proceeded with a joint resolution which was supported by all but one. At this point both of those judgments are of academic interest only because we now have an amending formula. The judgments to which the honourable senator has referred dealt with amending the British North America Act, which does not have an amending formula. Now there is an amending formula and, therefore, what governs is what I have just read.

The amending formula requires, as I mentioned, a resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons, and a resolution of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces. So let us deal with those organizations.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Will the honourable senator allow a question at this point?

Senator Frith: Perhaps at this point I should say something about questions. When I made my first intervention we did have a rather good time. I enjoyed last Thursday. There were questions and I took every question at no matter what point in my intervention and I am prepared to do that again today. However, I would ask honourable senators to remember that when they are making a presentation or a speech themselves it is rather useful to be able to keep a certain momentum going. On the other hand, sometimes it is also very useful to have the opportunity to clarify a point at the very stage at which one is presenting it. So with those general guidelines and without wishing to restrict anyone, I am glad to take questions in the course of my intervention. I believe Senator Tremblay has a question.

Senator Tremblay: It is a matter of refreshing my memory. I believe there is a list of items which, according to the amending formula, require the unanimity of the provinces. I do not remember whether the Senate or some aspects of the Senate are on that list.

Senator Frith: I thank Senator Tremblay for bringing that to my attention because it might very well be that I have overlooked something. Let me check. On a quick perusal it seems I am right, but that does not mean that I knew I was right because I did not until Senator Tremblay asked me. Section 42 (1) reads:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with subsection 38(1):

That is the one I referred to. Paragraph (b) is:

> the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators.

So it looks as if I, luckily, found the right section.

Honourable senators, you will remember that we are dealing generally with the subject of constitutional and political obstacles. If the amending formula requires action by the Senate, the House of Commons and the legislatures of the provinces, let us take them in that order. What sort of constitutional and political obstacle would the Senate itself be to the establishment of an elected Senate? In order to put that question into some context, I ought to remind honourable senators that in my proposal present senators—and since I am talking about the Senate I must talk about present senators—would, in the event of an elected Senate, maintain their positions according to the terms of their appointment, whether appointed for life or until age 75. One can immediately hear cynical sneers from those who would say, "Of course, they are just protecting their jobs." Be that as it may, it seems to me that there are two things I should underline. One is that it seems to me that that is simple and,—if I may say so parenthetically,—in terms of the long range goal, inexpensive justice. It is not fair and equitable if a political institution is substantially changed to in effect give that change retroactive effect on the tenure of members of that institution.

The second point is that the transition period will work. When I was in Sydney, Australia, I asked a question regarding the upper chamber in New South Wales, which had previously been appointed, or elected on a restricted franchise. The House of Representatives in New South Wales is elected directly by the electorate, but the upper house at one time was elected by a more restricted group.

They made the change to a purely elected upper chamber. I asked what happened when there was a mixture of appointed senators and elected senators. I was told that there was no difficulty with that. They said that after the next election all senators would be elected senators because there were only a few appointed senators left.

I asked how it worked out, or if there was a problem with a sort of invidious distinction between elected senators and the former non-elected senators—at least in the pure sense of the word "elected". They were surprised that I even asked the question. They told me that those who had been appointed, those who were elected on a restricted franchise, were respected. The elected and non-elected senators worked very well together.

If I am right, and I believe I am, that it is fair and just that there be no retroactivity to the establishment of an elected Senate—retroactivity in the sense that it affects the terms, rights and privileges of those appointed under a previous system—then I believe that among those institutions which must decide on such an amendment, the Senate might very well be the least of the obstacles. All the senators I have spoken to are genuinely interested in growth in the activities, responsibilities and duties of the Senate; they are interested in Senate reform, and are, I believe, prepared to keep an open mind on the topic of an elected Senate as a part of that reform.

I come now to the House of Commons. I believe that the House of Commons of Canada—and I do not criticize them for this—would be a more serious obstacle to the establishment of an elected Senate because it would mean that they would have to share a power that they now have, a power which is greater in terms of political muscle than the power the Senate has, and that brings me to Senator Denis' question of last week.

Senator Roblin: The power is constitutionally equal.

Senator Frith: That is why I underlined the word "political". The power, as Senator Roblin points out, is constitutionally equal. Legislatively speaking, I suppose one could argue that there is a slight change in the amending formula because of the veto power, but that is not what we are talking about; we are talking about the constitutional legislative power of the two. That legislative power of the House of Commons and the constitutional power of the Senate is, as Senator Roblin has stated, equal, except for the minor point regarding the introduction of money bills.

Politically, honourable senators, I do not think there is any doubt that the muscle is with the members of the House of Commons. That, of course, if I understood it correctly is the central thesis of Senator Roblin's remarks—that there is a question of, to use his word, legitimacy—and I think he meant political legitimacy—in the sense of the ability to exercise the powers.

Senator Roblin: Not the ability; the willingness.

Senator Frith: A valuable correction, and I am pleased to have it from the author's mouth.

As Senator Roblin just pointed out, and as he pointed out in a speech on another inquiry, the powers are exactly the same, but the political power—and I am saying this, not Senator Roblin—or the political muscle, to use Senator Denis' words, are not the same. Because the political muscle is stronger in the House of Commons, in my opinion, there is an unwillingness, to use Senator Roblin's phrase, in the Senate to exercise its powers. That means that the Senate is, as a corollary to that, unable to fulfil the functions that I started with, namely, those functions that I believe it ought to exercise, and in particular the one of regional representation.

When I say "muscle", this is what I mean; it is my belief that political power in a genuine democracy must always come from the people. The people, through a system of vote, give power to the politicians, to their political institutions. I agree with the late President Harry Truman. He did not use the word "give". He said that the people lend the power, and that the government is a trustee of the power, and it has to go back on a regular basis to get its mandate renewed.

It is on that basic footing that I say that the Canadian Senate, with all of its tradition, with all of its power, with all of its constitutional and legislative power, does not have the political muscle and power and, therefore, the willingness to exercise that power because it does not get it directly from the people. That is why I believe that, in order to fulfil its potential, the Senate must find a way to get its power from the people, and that can only be by election.

That is why I feel that the House of Commons, knowing that, will be one of the obstacles to the establishment of an elected Senate, and an important obstacle, because the House of Commons will not want to share its power in the sense I am using the word—its political power—with the Senate.

That brings me to the provincial premiers. The heading in my document is "The Provincial Premiers". I used that heading because, although I know the Constitution talks about the legislatures of the provinces, and the many provincial proposals that have been put forward over the past few years regarding Senate reform talk about legislatures, I think it will always be the provincial premier who will be calling the tune.

That brings me to an introductory part of the heading dealing with provincial premiers. I believe that any federal system, particularly the Canadian federal system, absolutely requires an institutional opportunity for co-operation and work between the provincial and federal levels, confederal consultation for confederal cooperation. I do not believe that the Senate is that institution. I believe that that institution is the institution recommended by Part I of the Lamontagne report.

Honourable senators will perhaps remember or wish to have their recollection refreshed as to the basic structure of that report, which report is at the very foundation of the inquiry to which we are now speaking. That report was directed towards finding out what, in the opinion of the subcommittee, are the real areas of stress and strain between the provincial governments and the federal government. That committee came to the conclusion that those strains, rather than being regional and federal, could better be called inter-governmental.

Part I of this report recommends an inter-governmental solution rather than an inter-legislative, if I may call it that, or a legislative solution. The report suggests that the Constitution should formally recognize the existence of inter-ministerial—which is inter-governmental—conferences and, in particular, first ministers' conferences.

It seems to me that one of the real values of institutionalizing federal-provincial conferences is that it is the institutionalizing of something which has grown up and evolved naturally out of the Canadian political soil. By way of illustration of this idea, honourable senators, I remember some years ago talking to an architect friend who was showing me one of his designs. It consisted of some very large buildings around what would be a university quadrangle-like large, central area. I said to him, "You have not set out any footpaths. Are people not going to walk from one building to another across this quadrangle?" He answered, "Yes, they will." I asked, "Well, are you just going to have them walk across the grass?" He replied, "Yes, for the first couple of years I will just sod the whole area and let people walk across it. They will show me where I should put the paths."

That is why I am attracted to the recommendation of the Lamontagne report. It comes naturally to us, as a matter of Canadian history, that federal-provincial relations of an intergovernmental nature should be institutionalized in the Constitution. That is where the relationship between the provincial governments should work its way out, not in what I consider to be a truly federal rather than confederal institution—namely, the Senate.

What have been the proposals? I now return to the question of the provinces or the provincial premiers as obstacles to the amendment of the Constitution to bring about an elected Senate.

Honourable senators, I will again make reference to some research which I hope will help other senators who may want to make interventions on this subject. I shall first refer to a book written by Peter McCormick and others entitled: Regional Representation: The Canadian Partnership. It is a task force report for the Canada West Foundation. It provides an incisive examination and critique of all of the major contemporary proposals for Senate reform, tested against the overriding standard—and I refer to it thus because it is a standard that is important to my whole proposition—of balanced regional representation.

I refer honourable senators to the particular sections of this report at pages 67 to 89. These sections deal mainly with the provincialist proposals: proposals in favour of councils which would either replace the existing Senate—proposals such as the Quebec Liberal Party's beige paper which would radically reform it—or proposals which would operate in addition to a basically unreformed Senate. There was also the so-called Best Efforts Draft, and I refer to page 68.

What the authors find in this task force report is that the province-centred nature of all of these proposals is problematic. They say it is insufficient to the demands of regional representation at the national level. The proposals that are covered in this report are those of the Government of British Columbia, the Canada West Foundation, the Advisory Committee on the Constitution, the Canadian Bar Association Committee on the Constitution, the report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity, and the Best Efforts Draft.

All of those proposals accept the basic premise that the place where regional representation is to be achieved is within the national government, through an upper chamber, and that the effective agent for achieving this representation and articulating the regional viewpoint is to be, primarily, the provincial governments. In many cases, the proposals envisage an upper chamber that is to be composed of provincial delegations.

Honourable senators, I quote from page 69 of that report:

> In a sense, the real member of the upper chamber would be the provincial government, a body of considerably greater continuity and resources than any one individual, this member being represented by delegations selected for limited periods and specific proposals.

> In the light of some of the present discontents within the Canadian federation, it is instructive to bear in mind that the representation of the western provinces (whether we want to include three or four) is lower in the Senate than it is in the House of Commons, a graphic illustration to frustrated westerners who feel themselves to be a minor and unheard voice.

I refer honourable senators to page 71:

> The "Best Efforts Draft" emerging from the summer-long deliberations of the committee of ministers is surprisingly the most radical of the proposals in this genre. The hard-headed politicians have in this regard proved more daring. They proposed equal representation for all provincial delegations, regardless of population or arbitrary regional designations.

I support the principle of equality in representation. The idea of equal or balanced regional representation on the basis of provincial boundaries, however, I do not agree with.

As I mentioned, I think we should consider ourselves fortunate in Canada that the Fathers of Confederation did not organize the federal upper chamber as it was organized in Australia and the United States—namely, on the basis of equality of state representation, totally without regard to population or regional representation.

I recommend to honourable senators pages 94 to 108 of the same task force report. I refer to this only to say that I part company with the Canada West proposals—although I agree with a good deal of what they have to say—when they come forward with the suggestion based on the provinces having equal representation. I do not think I need cite from that report. The basic difference between my view and that of Canada West is that they emphasize provincial rather than regional representation.

I refer honourable senators to my third source, written by Gerald Schmitz. It is entitled The Canadian Senate: Between Past and Future, and is a Library of Parliament document. At page 12 of this document there is an outline of some of the more significant recent proposals for reform, some of which I have referred to. At pages 19 to 21 the question of the provincial proposals is dealt with.

● (1540)

I quote as follows:

> Although the provinces have not been silent on the issues of Senate reform, they have been much more concerned about such things as the division of powers. With the exception of British Columbia—

I should add that since this paper was written we must add Alberta.

> —they have given rather short shrift to the idea of a high profile "House of the Federation" in place of the existing second chamber. Provincial governments regard themselves as the chief constitutional spokesmen for provincial and regional interests.

That is where I part company with them. I underline the word "regional". Continuing:

> While most would favour more provincial participation in the appointment of senators, they are loath to see a Senate with expanded powers which might detract from their own role in the federal bargain. Indeed, Alberta's position paper, "Harmony in Diversity; a New Federalism for Canada", tabled during the round of constitutional negotiations in the fall of 1978, simply ignored the Senate altogether.

As honourable senators know, they came out with a paper, to which I intend to refer. I should say that it is pointed out in Mr. Schmitz's paper that the British Columbia and Quebec Liberal proposals would radically increase the power of provincial delegations albeit in Ottawa. Again the emphasis is on "delegations". It is unlikely that any of the province-centred proposals to date, in my opinion—and I feel it is shared by this paper—would be workable as vehicles for national integration through regional representation.

The fourth source under this heading of the position of the provinces is "Proposals on the Constitution 1971-1978, Ottawa, Canadian Intergovernmental Conference Secretariat." There are some selected excerpts to which I will refer. At that time only the Government of British Columbia—but now also Alberta—was firmly committed to major Senate reform. Provinces such as Quebec and Alberta had until then focused almost exclusively on the division of powers. Ontario had remained noncommittal. On the other hand, New Brunswick, if I read these documents correctly, is skeptical of any reform which might be seen as further regionalizing the institutions of the central government.

So this lack of any consensus is probably what led the drafters of the 1980 "best effort" compromise to propose leaving the Senate alone while creating a new federal-provincial council to further institutionalize the present system of irregular federal-provincial conferences. That I support, but not leaving the Senate alone. That is, I support the idea of creating a new federal-provincial council for institutions to further institutionalize the present system of irregular federal-provincial conferences.

May I now refer to the most recent provincial proposal, which is that of Alberta. It is to be found in A Provincially Appointed Senate. By the very title we know what the suggestion is: A New Federalism for Canada. I shall quote first from page 2. At the top of the page reference is made to something which I have already mentioned, namely, the position paper entitled "Harmony in Diversity". The reference to it is as follows:

> While the paper addressed numerous important constitutional questions, it did not cover all possible areas of reform. It was silent on the issue of reform of the Canadian Senate because up to that time the First Ministers' Conference had evolved as an effective institution for representing provincial interests.

I agree—provincial interests.

However, the recent trend towards unilateralism and centralization has convinced the Alberta government that a determined effort must be made to strengthen and protect further the rights of the provinces—

I underline the word "provinces".

—in Confederation if we are to avoid the drift towards a unitary state.

As a passing parenthetical comment on which some other honourable senator might wish to expand, so far as I am aware, of all democratic federal states Canada is one of the most decentralized rather than one of the most centralized. Continuing at page 3, it says:

It is the intention of the Alberta government—

Senator Deschatelets: Who said that?

Senator Frith: I said that. I will be glad to bring some supplementary material on that subject, because there has been a study done. I will get the authority.

Senator Deschatelets: I will challenge that.

Senator Frith: The honourable senator may also challenge the study. Let me say that I did not pull it out of the air. I am sorry that I do not have the reference at hand, but I will get it.

An Hon. Senator: Cairns says it.

Senator Frith: Yes, Cairns says it in the studies to which I referred last week. Dealing with the principle of proportional representation, which is an important part of my proposal, there has been a good deal of material gathered in connection with proportional representation as an opportunity to give regional stresses an institutional expression; but most of them, including Cairns—and, I believe Smiley and Irvine—talk about using proportional representation in the House of Commons, virtually abolishing the Senate and creating two types of members in the House of Commons.

Senator Roblin: Crazy; academic dreaming.

Senator Frith: Did the honourable senator say "crazy"? I will not use that word, but I consider it to be totally impractical. I am quoting from page 3:

It is the intention of the Alberta government to propose that the subject of Senate reform be one of the other matters addressed by governments. The purpose of this paper is to begin the process of public discussion on this important question. The recommendations are designed both to strengthen Canadian federalism and to give Western Canada a greater voice in national institutions.

I do not believe that by increasing provincial representation in the federal house, as distinct from institutionalizing federal-provincial conferences, it would achieve that end. Quoting from page 12:

[Senator Frith.]

Most commentators on Senate reform do not support the continuation of the current federal appointment process.

There is then the suggestion for joint federal-provincial appointments. That is one which I believe honourable senators are familiar with. Then, on page 13, it says:

Exclusive Provincial Appointments.

It has been suggested that the best procedure to ensure the Senate plays a meaningful role in reflecting the federal character of the country within the central institutions is to have senators directly appointed by provincial governments.

That was the proposal of the Government of British Columbia, the Canadian Bar Association, and the Quebec Liberal Party.

Generally speaking the reform models which incorporate direct provincial appointments are adapted from the second chamber of the German Federal Republic—the Bundesrat.

I agree that is what they are based on, and I believe they are inappropriate.

Senator Deschatelets: Excuse me. When you say this proposal has been shared by British Columbia and the Quebec government—

Senator Frith: I did not say that. I said the Quebec Liberal Party. I believe it was the beige paper. But that was not from the Quebec government, and I have not said it was the Quebec government.

Senator Deschatelets: They did not commit themselves as to a future upper house.

Senator Frith: I did not say they had. I referred always to the Liberal Party. Quoting from page 14, concerning Alberta:

Because the actions of the federal government can have a very substantial impact on the ability of the provinces to pursue public policy options, the direct appointment of instructed provincial delegates to the upper house would increase the input and influence of the provinces in those matters of federal policy which directly affect them.

I agree with that. That is exactly what it would do, but I do not think that would be at all desirable. I note that they want a Senate or an upper house that would consist of instructed provincial delegates. That is exactly what we should do through federal-provincial conferences, conferences of first ministers, and conferences of ministers. We could then deal with the question of how these delegations would work.

Although I disagree with it, I congratulate Alberta on this paper. It is a very good one in the sense that it is very clear; there is no mincing of words, and there is nothing mealy-mouthed about it. They say that the upper chamber should be there to protect provincial interests and that it should consist of instructed provincial delegates.

● (1550)

Honourable senators, the recommendation is: one, that the Senate be appointed; and, two, that senators be appointed exclusively by the provincial governments—and we know that they mean that in terms of instructed provincial delegates.

Honourable senators, if I have not taken you too far astray, I ask you to return with me to the heading in my plan "Constitutional and Political Obstacles." I have referred to the amending formula. It requires the participation of the Senate. I have said how I believe the Senate would approach reform, including reform by way of an elected Senate. I have also discussed how I believe the House of Commons would view it.

Honourable senators will note that I am moving upwards in direct ratio of difficulty. Obstacles from the Senate would be the least difficult to overcome; those from the House of Commons would be more difficult; and those from provincial governments would be the most difficult or the most serious obstacles to the establishment of an elected Senate based on the proposal I am making, namely, election based on proportional representation and on a non-simultaneous basis for senatorial regions rather than provincial regions.

Senator Deschatelets: The honourable senator was just enumerating some of the obstacles that he sees in the way of Senate reform. Does he see the Senate itself as an obstacle to Senate reform? As he knows, we now enjoy a suspensive veto of six months. The Senate today could not be considered as a main obstacle to reform of the Senate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the heading in my plan refers to "Constitutional and political obstacles." The whole point of this section is to point out that the Senate is the least of the obstacles. If Senator Deschatelets wants to emphasize that it is even less of an obstacle because of its suspensive veto, I would point out that I do not consider the suspensive veto to be nothing—

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: I do.

Senator Frith: Senator Donahoe does; I do not. I propose that, even for legislative purposes, in the model I am putting forward, the Senate should only have a suspensive veto and that it should not have the power to deny supply, and a defeat in this reformed Senate should not constitute a defeat of the government.

Senator Deschatelets: Are you talking of a suspensive veto for economic as well as other legislation?

Senator Frith: For all legislation. I consider that the whole point of a suspensive veto is to slow the matter down so you can get public input. The final decision should always be made by the people.

Honourable senators, I am, in an ascending scale, establishing what I see as being both constitutional and political obstacles because they are mixed. The Senate has constitutional powers with regard to amendment, and it has some political power. I consider it would be the least obstacle for three reasons: one, because of the suspensive veto referred to; two—and I have already made it a part of my thesis—because the Senate, as an appointed body, lacks a certain amount of political muscle as compared to one that would be elected; and, three, because I believe senators are, intellectually and politically, individually not opposed to a reformed Senate and are not totally opposed to an elected Senate—at least, they are not totally closed-minded to the concept of an elected Senate.

The more difficult obstacle to overcome would be the House of Commons; and the most difficult would be the provincial governments.

Honourable senators, to finish Part II, what should be the long-range target in that context? In my view, the long-range target should be the establishment of such an elected Senate with the elements I have described. I will repeat: It should be elected by proportional representation in non-simultaneous elections; from senatorial regions, not provinces, and with the more limited powers—no power to refuse supply or to defeat the government.

As has been said, every journey, no matter how long, starts with one step. The first step, in my opinion, must be for the Senate to propose something of this kind. It does not have to be by a resolution; it does not have to be by a bill; but, at some point, in my opinion, it should be known that this is the Senate's long-range target. The first step should be for the Senate of Canada itself to say, "This is the kind of institution that would give the Senate an opportunity to really fulfill its potential for Canada."

When I was appointed to the Senate—it seems only a short time ago—I made the usual "maiden speech". Although that speech did not go into this amount of detail, it was on the same subject. I said then, on the general subject of Senate reform, that the Senate itself should be the leading and cutting edge, and that the country should be responding to a Senate proposal. So often the Senate is seen as being in a defensive, fortress-like bunker, trying to fend off suggestions for reform. Since 1977, nothing in my experience has confirmed that that is the attitude of senators. The attitude prevails that everyone is in favour of Senate reform, but that senators, in their concrete bunkers, are refusing to consider the question. As I have tried to demonstrate here, it seems to me that the real obstacles to major Senate reform are going to be the House of Commons and the provinces, not the Senate itself.

That brings me to Part III which is headed, "In the meantime—" What do we do in the meantime? Honourable senators, I believe that we, as part of the leading edge for Senate reform, should start our own gradual changes in order to change attitudes—and I know many senators agree with me on this.

If a major reform of the Senate of the type I am proposing is ever to take place in the light of the political and constitutional obstacles that exist, it will only take place if we initiate our own reforms and play a bigger role in the Canadian scene, as we have very recently with Bill S-31, for example.

Hon. Jack Marshall: What about Bill S-30?

Senator Frith: We played a major role in Bill S-30. If Senator Marshall and Senator Donahoe think that what I am saying is that we played a greater role because the Canadian people saw the Senate in unanimous action, they misunderstand my point. The point is that we were playing a role, and the result of that role did not satisfy all senators. That is democracy.

● (1600)

Senator Marshall: Nor all the people.

Senator Frith: It does not satisfy all the people, exactly. But it was clear during those periods, and recently, that people are becoming more and more aware of the Senate, and I say that is a desirable process.

The only way a major reform of this kind can take place is through continued higher profile activity, fulfilling the functions I started with, as in the Lamontagne report. Then the people may want more and more reform. Then perhaps the people should be given the express opportunity to overcome the constitutional and political obstacles I have described through a plebiscite or referendum. That, of course, is both politically and practically the only way it could happen and the only way it should happen, because it should not happen unless the people want it.

That, honourable senators, is what I mean under Part III(a), "gradual change through changing attitudes." I think that we must start that process. I think we have already started the process with the Lamontagne report and with the motion launched by Senator Roblin. I believe that we should do anything we can to keep alive the principle of Senate reform, and also to make changes that can increase the potential for fulfilling our role. What can those be? I ask honourable senators who might continue with their interventions on this inquiry to make their suggestions, but it seems to me that there are a number of things that we can do to fulfil particularly this role which is central and capital to my proposal, the role of regional representation.

Let me put forward a few. One would be that we could establish regional caucuses on a bi-partisan basis. That is something we do not need to have any amendment of the Constitution for. There is a regional caucus taking place righ now in this chamber between Senator Macquarrie and Senator Muir.

Hon. Robert Muir: P.E.I and Nova Scotia.

Senator Frith: Yes, P.E.I. and Nova Scotia. All they need to fulfil what I am suggesting, which is bi-partisan, is for a couple of Liberals from the same region to go over and join them, and to discuss the community of interest that all senators have in representing their regions that should transcend, and does often transcend, party lines. We are in a position, if we want to, of course, voluntarily to decide that we will only have a suspensive veto. If that happens we might start turning down some bills. We do not have to amend the Constitution to do that.

There are a number of interim suggestions that do not require constitutional amendment that are contained in the report of the Lamontagne subcommittee. It is possible to have term appointments without amending the Constitution. It is practically a possibility for the Prime Minister to recommend appointments only for a term, which of course the appointee would have to accept as a term. That is one of the recommendations. It may or may not find favour with honourable senators, but I give it as an example of something we can do ourselves without amending the Constitution. We can make a number of changes that we have already started to make ourselves with reference to committee activity.

I want to come back and close with the Lamontagne report, because it is the report that is the subject matter of this inquiry. What does that report actually recommend? I invite honourable senators to pursue this in their interventions, to discuss and consider the possibilities for reform that do not require constitutional amendment, and which can take place in the meantime.

Essentially, the propositions of the Lamontagne subcommittee are as follows. First, there is a need in the Canadian Parliament for a second chamber, not as a confederal but as a federal body. Secondly, its recommendation is that the members of the Senate should be appointed and not elected, but that the appointments should be for a fixed term. I have already made some reference to that.

It refers to the legislative function. There is no need to change that. The only way we might consider changing that voluntarily is if we find that by a self-imposed veto it would mean we would reject more bills; then it is worth consideration.

With respect to the investigative function, there is no recommendation for change. I do not recommend any change in it, but I do say that it is something we can increase, and that in doing so we can increase the profile of the Senate.

I have had a lot to say about the regional function. One way that we can do that voluntarily, as I say, is simply by having regional caucuses that consist of members from both sides of the house.

The linguistic function is one we have exercised well, mostly jointly with the other place, and we could easily increase our profile, our effectiveness and our usefulness by widening what is called in the Lamontagne report the human rights function.

Honourable senators will remember other recommendations that were made were as follows. As to the composition of the Senate with regard to size, the recommendation is for 126 members. We cannot do anything about that without constitutional amendment. The method of appointment we can do something about. We can try to have more input into the nature of appointments, and perhaps consider recommending or suggesting that these appointments be made for a fixed term. That will be difficult, I appreciate, with reference to the mixed status of senators, but apparently that sort of thing does work, on the basis of the experience in Australia. Our powers, of course, we cannot do anything about, except on the voluntary basis that I have suggested. There are recommendations with regard to cabinet representation.

I hope that all the suggestions made in the Lamontagne report, including those I have mentioned—regional caucuses, a standing committee on regional affairs, a standing committee on official languages, which we have, a standing committee on human rights, conference between the houses, and the pre-study of bills—will receive the attention of other honourable senators who intervene in this debate.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: I am sorry to interrupt, but I think the Lamontagne report also suggests the election of a Speaker and a greater voice in the internal appointment of officers.

Senator Frith: Yes, I agree, it does, and I hope that we hear more about that. That is a very good example of the reforms that we can make without a constitutional change, and I thank Senator Thompson for reminding me of that.

Honourable senators, let me say this in conclusion. Do I hear relieved sighs? I do not know whether I have mentioned this before, but my father had a definition of an absolutely incurable optimist that is perhaps now appropriate. His definition of an incurable optimist was the lady or gentleman in the front pew of the church who put his or her shoes back on when the minister said, "And now, in conclusion . . ."

So, in conclusion, the outline of my intervention has been a model for an elected Canadian Senate, borrowing very choosily from the Australian experience. As I have said, its essential elements are that it be elected by proportional respresentation for senatorial regions established by a commission for that purpose; that the election not take place simultaneously with that of the House of Commons; that in the legislative area it should not have an absolute veto but a suspensive veto; that it not have the power to deny supply; that its refusal to adopt a piece of legislation should not be treated as a matter of confidence requiring an election; that the government should be essentially responsible to the House of Commons; and that one of the Senate's main functions should be the representation of regional interests. As a very important part of my thesis—and Senator Deschatelets very helpfully drew this to my attention yesterday—I believe that regionalism has always existed in Canada and will always exist, and that it is healthy. It is natural and right that people should sense themselves loyal to, and part of, a region as well as to Canada. Those things are healthy and desirable. The solution, if we want to call it that, to the problems that flow from regionalism is not to try to eliminate them; it is to give them a better national forum, a federal forum for their expression, the Senate.

Honourable senators, even without a truly powerful regional upper house, legislation must be settled and worked out and compromised on the basis of regional interests, and I say, since in one way or another that has to be done, it should be done in a federal institution. That institution should be the Senate.

Honourable senators, my experience has been that no aspect of life on this planet ever stands still. At any one moment everything is either evolving or degenerating. The Senate has not stood still. The Senate has evolved over its period of existence. I think it has to continue to evolve. I think it is a marvellous Canadian institution with great but unrealized potential, and I believe its evolution lies in the direction of changing the root of its power, and that is why the most important elements of my proposal are that it be elected, in order to have the power directly from the people, and that it fill the healthy but pressing Canadian political need for a forum for the expression of regional interests.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I beg your indulgence. In rising to speak now it is not my intention to take part in the debate, and I do not wish to forgo my opportunity of doing so at a later time. I simply want to do two things: first, to congratulate Senator Frith on what I consider to be a tour de force—two speeches on the same subject, one last week and one this week—and, second, to say that I only regret that he had to make his speeches on Thursday afternoons, when the Senate is not at its fullest attendance. I mentioned that to Senator Frith when I was congratulating him on his speech last week. In fact, at that time I was under the impression that there was not even a quorum present because Senator McIlraith had retired, but I learned afterwards that Senator Lucier had returned unnoticed by me, which saved the quorum.

The point I really want to make, honourable senators, is that it should be drawn to the attention of all senators just how important are the speeches Senator Frith has made both last week and this week, and, knowing that many senators pay scant attention to the debates on the previous Thursday when they return on a Tuesday evening, I want to suggest to Senator Frith that he forgo his sense of modesty and cause copies of his speeches to be sent to all members of the Senate so they can become thoroughly familiar with the important points he has made.

Personally, I have not formed an opinion on whether the Senate should be an elective body, but I think the matter is of such importance that it should be given full consideration by all senators.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, may I say that we have listened to a remarkable speech, one which has required much research and reflection, and for that we must all be grateful to Senator Frith.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate, but as I may not be in a position to speak on the matter before Wednesday or Thursday it may be that others will wish to precede me. I would not object to that, because it will require a few days for me to digest some of Senator Frith's remarks.

With that I move that this debate be adjourned.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Before that is done, honourable senators, may I be allowed to put a question to Senator Frith?

As I understood the theory Senator Frith evolved this afternoon, it is that in the future the Senate would be elected but the present senators would maintain their status. In other words, there would be two categories of senator,—elected and appointed. If that theory were to become a reality and we indeed had two categories of senator, would the appointed senators, those entitled to remain until the age of 75, be privileged to run for election, if they so desired? In other words, if they wanted to belong to the superior category of elected senator, would it be their privilege to run for election? If they did so successfully, would they really belong to a superior category? If I understood the deputy leader's speech, appointed senators are inferior to elected senators. Could he give me his interpretation of that?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, what I have said is that I believe there should be an elected Senate, and, in the meantime, because there are a lot of obstacles in the way to achieving it, we should make reforms of the present Senate. If we had an elected Senate and there still remained appointed senators after the system was set up, my suggestion is that the appointed senators would stay on the basis of whatever their appointment was originally. I did not say an elected senator was superior to an appointed senator. I said that an elected Senate, which is something that you would eventually have in my plan, would have more political muscle than an appointed Senate.

As to the question of the two classes, I mentioned last week, and again today, that the experience in Australia is that the two categories of senator worked well together, and eventually the Senate consisted entirely of elected senators. In the meantime, the transition worked well. In answer to the last question as to what would be the position of someone who wanted to run for election for his or her own reasons, of course, the Constitution allows one to resign and do that.

As to the constituencies, I believe that the organization of Senate constituencies should be by regional senatorial districts, with a number of senators for each region, which the boundaries commission sets up, taking into account the existence of present senators within those regions.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Frith a question. However, before doing so, I wish to congratulate him on the thorough research he has done in order to explain his point of view. What concerns me is this desire by others to transplant the Bundesrat principle to Canada, and his suggestion that we take the Australian elected Senate approach with modifications.

I realize that the trip to Australia came up rather quickly, but I ask Senator Frith if he had a chance to actually look at the history of the development of Australian government, the penal colonies and the lack of interest in responsible government in the Australian states.

I could elaborate on that, but I am not here to make a speech. There is the hope of Sir John Quick, one of the founding fathers, who suggested that the states had the sovereign right to develop a number of opportunities for themselves. If we look at the court decisions and the laws that have been passed by the Commonwealth of which an elected Senate was a part, we find, in one case, the uniform tax bill, which, it was suggested by a prominent Australian, makes the states purely administrative units, with the major policy decisions being made by the Commonwealth.

When Senator Frith gave the definition of regionalism, I thought of constitutional experts such as Dicey and Wheare and, in particular, the classic definition by Wheare of a confederation. Many of the Australian political scientists and other prominent Australians agree that Australia no longer fits that definition of a confederation. Some even go so far as to say it is a unitary form of government. That indicates to me that the elected Senate in Australia failed Sir John Quick's high hopes that it would preserve states' rights. My opinion is that by talking of the Australian experience as a basis for our Senate, we are distracted from the purpose of his thesis.

My question is: Why do you always refer to the Australian elected Senate as a model, with modifications, in order to give a central voice and protect the regions when, in fact, the Australian elected Senate failed abjectly to do that very thing?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am grateful to Senator Thompson for giving me the opportunity to underline the fact that very little of the Australian system has been incorporated in my model. However, I realize that once I acknowledge it was to any extent an inspiration for the model I shall spend the rest of my life justifying that. Someone will say, "Oh, you're the one who wants the Australian Senate," to which I will reply, "No, I do not want the Australian Senate." Someone else will say, "Oh, if you want the Australian Senate, then, of course, you want the power to deny supply," and I will say, "No, I do not want the power to deny supply." Someone else will say, "I suppose you are in favour of double-dissolution," and I will say, "No, I'm not in favour of double-dissolution." Someone else could say, "I suppose you are in favour of the system of a state having equal representation," I could reply, "No, I am not in favour of that."

If you really look at what I end up taking from the Australian system, it is very little. Therefore, I am going to do my best not to defend those aspects of the Australian system that are Australian, that some may think were failures and that some may think were successes. There are elements of their experience that I found encouraging as a model for the Canadian system. In important ways I do not think it will work out the same way here as it did there. I do not agree on equal representation for the confederal units. I believe that we should not have a confederal Senate, but that we should have a federal Senate. That is why I went to such pains to go against the provincial representations, which are for a confederal institution.

I thank Senator Thompson most sincerely for his giving me the opportunity to underline this particular point. The Senate does not represent a perfect states' house, because you are quite right in saying that most people said that the Australian Senate works out its representation of the states mostly in the caucus rooms. The big inspiration for me was because I had always had, as I mentioned, this inability to understand how we could have an elected Senate which was elected at the same time and on the same basis as the House of Commons, in which case it would either be a reflection of the House of Commons, and why bother having it at all, or it would not, which would frustrate the will of the government. Therefore, we would end up with the pure dilemma, whichever way it went it would not work. My experience in Australia taught me that even under their system—which is more frustrating than I think it would be in the Canadian reality—it does work and the government, more often than not, does not control the Senate. From that point on I started thinking of a Canadian system that would not be ineffective because it would frustrate the government's intentions. My belief is that application of my proposal to the Canadian political reality will mean that the government will never control the Senate in terms of having an absolute majority. You will have to look at last week's speech for detail as to why I think that would work well.

• (1630)

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I think it was very generous of me to give Senator Frith the opportunity to clarify that point. I appreciate his observations, although I am still opposed to some of the other points he made in his speech.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I apologize for speaking again but I have a question for Senator Frith. He has spoken a couple of times on two separate items on the order paper.

Senator Frith: Senator Benidickson, I may have confused things there. When I decided I wanted to speak on this question of Senate reform and an elected Senate, I had the choice of speaking either on Senator Roblin's motion on an elected Senate or on the inquiry on Senator Lamontagne's subcommittee report. I chose to speak on the Lamontagne report. Although I am in favour of an elected Senate, I did not speak on Senator Roblin's motion—

Senator Benidickson: I think you have spoken now on both items on the order paper, or perhaps on another item.

Senator Frith: No, I have not. I am dealing with the subject of Senator Roblin's motion in the form of an intervention on Senator Lamontagne's inquiry.

Senator Benidickson: I shall still put a question to Senator Frith on those two items on the order paper. The item in Senator Lamontagne's name dates back to January 13, 1981, and the item in Senator Roblin's name has been on the order paper for some time. Early in 1982 there was a great deal of discussion among ourselves to the effect that we should be the people to make the first judgment and recommendations on how Senate reform should develop.

I recall ill-conceived old Bill C-60, which, in my opinion, was conceived by a bunch of people who had very little political or parliamentary experience. I refer perhaps to people in the Prime Minister's Office. The whole thing was ridiculous and, of course, fortunately it died on the order paper. But I do recall that earlier this year there was general agreement that we would try to make recommendations in 1982 ourselves. So I ask Senator Frith, with his great influence: Is it not now timely and appropriate to set up a committee of our own—even though it will not achieve our intentions as they were stated early in 1982—to hear outside opinion from all corners and to perhaps then make suggestions on reform of the Senate?

Senator Frith: That, of course, is what the Lamontagne subcommittee proposes. As to the portion of the senator's comments about future action by the Senate, either through a committee, a joint committee or other activity, I am sure that it will receive attention from other honourable senators speaking to the inquiry.

On motion of Senator Deschatelets, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 14, 1982, at 8 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

FIRST REPORT ON THE ADVANCE STUDY OF BUDGET RESOLUTIONS RESPECTING INCOME TAX AND OTHER MATTERS RELATING THERETO

December 1, 1982

On November 12, 1981, the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, Minister of Finance, delivered a budget in the House of Commons.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred the following:

(i) Budget tax changes tabled by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on November 12, 1981, and the impact thereof on taxpayers; documents tabled December 18, 1981, by the said Minister of Finance in the House of Commons relating to some enumerated Budget tax measures announced on November 12, 1981, and describing the tax treatment proposed to be accorded thereto;

(iii) the proposals made by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on December 18, 1981, for adjustments in some measures contained in the Budget resolutions;

(iv) the further proposals made by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on December 18, 1981, for referral of some tax measures contained in the Budget resolutions to a parliamentary committee as follows:

Rules relating to corporate re-organization, taxation of whole life insurance, charitable foundations, retirement allowances and work in progress; and

(v) any bills based on the Budget tax changes in advance of the said bills coming before the Senate and any other matters relating thereto, has, in obedience to the order of reference of March 24, 1982, examined and considered the above and for the reasons hereinafter mentioned, now makes its first report as follows:

In accordance with the Orders of Reference, your Committee has considered the Budget tax changes tabled on November 12, 1981, and the documents tabled December 18, 1981, by the former Minister of Finance. The Committee has also considered press releases issued by the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue announcing amendments to income tax legislation and assessing practice, the Budget tax changes announced June 28, 1982, the detailed Notice of Ways and Means Motions tabled the same date and the Statement on the Economic Outlook and the Financial Position of the Government of Canada presented by The Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of Finance, on October 27, 1982. In connection with such consideration, the Committee has engaged the services of Mr. Charles Albert Poissant and Mr. Helmut Birk of Thorne Riddell, Chartered Accountants, Montreal and has retained as its counsel Mr. Thomas S. Gillespie of Ogilvy, Renault, Montreal. The Committee has heard representations from The Federation of Automobile Dealers Association of Canada, Life Underwriters Association of Canada, the Tax Executives Institute, Inc. and the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association Inc. The Committee has heard from Mr. Glen Jenkins, Assistant Deputy Minister, Tax Policy and Legislation Branch, Mr. Satya Poddar, Director, Tax Analysis and Commodity Tax Division, Mr. Tim Morris, Director, Tax Policy—Legislation Division, Mr. R. A. Short, General Director, Tax Policy, all of the Department of Finance and Messrs. A. G. Cockell, Director, Regulations Division and Legislation Branch and Mr. D. S. Brooks, Legislation Branch, both of the Department of National Revenue.

The Budget tax changes tabled by the former Minister of Finance on November 12, 1981 included 162 paragraphs in the Notice of Ways and Means Motions to amend the Income Tax Act as well as important changes to the regulations to the Income Tax Act and changes to the assessing practices of the Department of National Revenue. The result was important and extensive amendments to Canadian income tax legislation and assessing practice. Since November 12, 1981, a number of releases have been published by the Department of Finance. They are enumerated as follows:

1) November 17, 1981—Amendments to the Budget tax changes were announced with respect to the deductibility of the so-called "soft costs" relating to multiple-unit residential buildings (MURBs) and the deductibility of interest expenses on funds borrowed by first purchasers of MURBs.

2) November 18, 1981—Amendments were announced respecting reorganizations made after the Budget date pursuant to binding commitments concluded before the Budget and to accommodate the acquisition by Dome Petroleum Limited of the remaining shares of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited from minority shareholders.

3) December 18, 1981—Extensive amendments were announced of a "grandfathering" or transitional nature. It was also announced that the Budget proposals respecting reorganizations would be postponed to January 1, 1983.

4) April 21, 1982—Revised rules were announced relating to minimum disbursements for charitable purposes by public and private foundations and to financial transactions between foundations and related persons.

5) May 31, 1982—Amendments were announced respecting the first year rate limitations on capital cost allowance.

The Department of National Revenue also released new administrative guidelines on January 22, 1982, governing the taxation of certain fringe benefits.

The effect of all the foregoing releases was the introduction of amendments of a relieving nature. Protection was given to certain transactions or events which took place prior to Budget night and certain proposed amendments were deferred or phased in.

On June 28, 1982, the Minister of Finance delivered another Budget and tabled a comprehensive Notice of Ways and Means Motions relating to the November 12, 1981 Budget as modified by measures announced on December 18, 1981. Excluded from such comprehensive Notice of Ways and Means Motions were measures relating to corporate reorganizations, restricted interest expense, life insurance and charitable foundations.

On October 27, 1982, The Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of Finance, made a Statement on the Economic Outlook and the Financial Position of the Government of Canada in the House of Commons. Further changes in income tax legislation were included in the Statement.

On November 15, 1982, the Minister of Finance announced changes in the application of the "undue delay" test as it relates to the construction of MURBs.

The principal amendment proposed by the Budget measures tabled November 12, 1981 was a reduction in the federal marginal tax rates for taxpayers in higher taxable income brackets as reflected in the following table:

Taxable income bracket	Rate Proposed in Budget	Old Rate
(dollars)	(percent of income in bracket)

TAX EXPENDITURES

At the same time, the November Budget proposed to reduce or eliminate "tax expenditures".

The concept of "tax expenditures" was discussed in a paper entitled "Government of Canada Tax Expenditure Account" which was published by the Department of Finance in December, 1979. Tax expenditures were defined at page 1 as follows:

> "The Canadian tax system contains a number of provisions that give preferential treatment to certain groups of individuals or businesses in the form of tax exemptions, deductions, reduced tax rates, or tax credits. The purpose of these provisions is to grant a subsidy or incentive for those engaging in a specific activity or for those in certain special circumstances by lowering or deferring their tax liabilities. In addition, the Canadian tax system contains provisions which reduce or eliminate tax in respect of certain activities carried on by other governments. Such tax forgiveness or postponement is equivalent to the government first collecting the sums involved by imposing tax on a more comprehensive base at uniform rates and then making a direct expenditure or loan in an amount equal to the revenue foregone due to the tax preference. Such provisions have thus come to be called tax expenditures."

The concept of tax expenditures was rationalized as follows:

> "Tax expenditures are a means by which the government can pursue public policy objectives and, as such, they can be viewed in most cases as alternatives to direct budget outlays or other policy instruments. Indeed, both tax expenditures and direct budget outlays are used to meet many of the same objectives. Tax expenditures are used to encourage economic and social activities such as saving, investment, regional development, housing, resource exploration and development, and charitable giving. They have been used to aid taxpayers who suffer from special economic hardships such as the disabled, the elderly, or those with large medical expenses. They have also been used for effecting a fiscal transfer from the federal to provincial and municipal governments."

The Canadian tax expenditure account is primarily based on the criterion of neutrality, that is to say, a system where there are no preferential tax treatments. This strict criterium has no resemblance to the actual tax system. For example, the definition of income under a neutral system would include the value of services provided by spouses and other individuals at home as well as the imputed value of owner-occupied houses.

It is interesting to note that the U.S. tax expenditure accounts are not comparable to the Canadian account because they are based on—

> "widely accepted definitions of income and standards of business accounting and the generally accepted structure of an income tax".

Any deviations from generally accepted practices or standards are tax expenditures in the U.S. Examples of significant differences are the exclusion from U.S. tax expenditures of imputed income on equity in owner-occupied housing and items where the case for their inclusion in the income base stands on relatively technical or theoretical tax arguments. Also the U.S. excludes items which are not quantifiable while Canada includes such items. The U.S. approach set forth above would seem more realistic.

The purpose of the November Budget measures to reduce or eliminate certain tax expenditures was to offset the lost revenue which would result from the reduction in marginal rates and to reduce the federal deficit. In "Analysis of Federal Tax Expenditures for Individuals", a paper tabled with the Budget Papers on November 12, 1981, it was indicated that tax expenditures relating to personal income tax alone that could be quantified reduced the amount of income actually received by individuals subject to tax by over $47 billion in 1979, or roughly 45% of the total income received in that year. The fiscal revenue effect for the federal government was a reduction of $13.8 billion. The Analysis stated at page 2:

> "If all of these tax expenditures had been eliminated, and the tax base thereby broadened, a general cut of 45 per cent in tax rates could have been provided and federal revenues would have remained unchanged. Both the proliferation of tax expenditures and the high marginal tax rates that are therefore required to raise a given total of government revenues can have a variety of adverse effects."

Taken in isolation, this statement is an implied threat that further tax expenditures will be reduced or eliminated.

It was made clear in "Government of Canada Tax Expenditure Account" referred to above, that tax expenditures were not necessarily undesirable.

> At the outset, it is important to emphasize that an accounting of tax expenditures is not an evaluation of government tax policy. The accounting does not question the desirability of the goals of the tax provisions nor their effectiveness in achieving the goals. It is not a list of tax loopholes or areas for tax reform. Its purpose is no more than to provide the basic information on which such evaluations can be based.

The Committee agrees with the general objectives of improving equity in the tax system by reducing tax rates and offsetting the loss of revenue by reducing or eliminating undesirable tax preferences. The Committee is in agreement with the proposal that lost federal revenue may be offset by the elimination or reduction of certain tax preferences provided, however, the elimination or reduction is in respect of abuses or does not cause taxpayers undue distress.

Fortunately, most of the measures introduced on November 12, 1981 to reduce or eliminate tax expenditures and which the Committee found offensive have since been eliminated. Further reference is made later in this Report with respect to expenditures which have been reduced or eliminated.

RETROSPECTIVE LEGISLATION

Unfortunately, the November Budget introduced important measures of an adverse nature to certain taxpayers which were either retrospective* or did not contain adequate transitional provisions. Examples included the application of the restricted interest expense rules to sums borrowed prior to November 12, 1981, and the inclusion of work in progress in computing income for fiscal periods ending after 1981 from a professional business without any transitional measures. The restricted interest rules have been eliminated and the application of the work in progress rules has been greatly reduced.

The Committee has consistently and strongly objected to adverse retrospective amendments to the Income Tax Act. A great number of such amendments were proposed on November 12, 1981 and the Committee is most concerned with the increasing proliferation of such amendments. The Government must recognize that such amendments may unfairly change the application of the tax rules to arrangements made before the Budget on the basis of the existing legislation as enacted by Parliament. In particular cases substantial hardship may result. The prosperity and viability of the Canadian economy depends on activities planned and carried out in reliance on the integrity of the legislation by which decisions will be governed. This principle should be safeguarded by providing "grandfathering" rules to accompany adverse tax changes. For example, the amendments proposed respecting restricted interest expenses should not have been applicable in any way to loans incurred prior to November 13, 1981.

The Committee urges that all income tax changes should be based on the principle of not adversely affecting those who have made commitments in reliance on existing laws except in instances where real abuses are being addressed.

Most of the retrospective legislation announced on November 12, 1981 has since been eliminated. The number of amendments since announced is confirmation of the unsatisfactory nature of many of the amendments proposed on November 12, 1981. If the retrospective aspects of the November Budget had been eliminated, the Budget would not have been subject to such heavy criticism.

THE CONSULTATIVE PROCESS

The November 12, 1981 Budget measures introduced important changes to the entire Canadian income tax structure without prior public discussion of the impact of the changes. This is in contrast with the major tax reform which was proposed in 1949. Similarly, tax reform discussions of the 1960's culminated in the 1969 White Paper "Proposals For Tax Reform". This followed an extended period of study of the Carter Commission which culminated in the 1971 reforms.

As is evident by the large number of modifications made thereto, many of the changes introduced on November 12, 1981 were proposed without adequate knowledge or appreciation of their consequences.

The need for budget secrecy is highlighted in the paper entitled "The Budget Process" published in April, 1982. It noted that the concept of budget secrecy evolved to the point of shrouding in secrecy all matters that were to be included in the budget. The paper notes that the tradition of budget secrecy should be redefined. It states at page 3:

* The distinction between a retroactive statute, if such a distinction exists, is unclear. Elmer A. Dreidger in a study entitled "Statutes: Retroactive Retrospective Reflections" (1978), C.B.R. 264 defines a retroactive statute at page 268 as "one that operates as of a time prior to its enactment". On the other hand, he defines a retrospective statute as "one that operates forward, but it looks backwards in that it attaches new consequences for the future to an event that took place before the statute was enacted". This distinction is adopted for purposes of this report. None of the November Budget proposals was of an adverse retroactive nature; many were of an adverse retrospective nature.

> A redefinition of budget secrecy thus is necessary to ensure that broader consultation and a more meaningful response to pre-budget submissions from the public is possible. Clearly, the tradition of budget secrecy frustrates both the government and the public. The government is not saddled with a similar tradition in formulating other initiatives—the introduction outside of the budget context of new social and economic programs or changes in existing programs—in which the opportunity for private gain from prior knowledge often exists.

There is recognition in this statement of the need for a consultative procedure. The Committee supports this position. While budget secrecy is necessary in respect of certain measures, prior discussion or consultation could have eliminated certain of the undesirable elements of the November 12, 1981 Budget.

The present Minister of Finance affirmed his commitment to the consultative process in an address given to the Canadian Tax Foundation on November 23, 1982. It is appreciated that not only has the Minister sought advice, he has accepted it. In particular, he has accepted the advice of the Ministerial Advisory Committee on Inflation and the Taxation of Personal Investment Income (the "Lortie Committee") and the Consultative Committee on restricted interest expense.

CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCES (CCA)

The November 12, 1981 budget papers identify the current system of accelerated capital cost allowance as one of the largest items in the tax expenditure account of the government of Canada for the business sector. This results from a level of Capital Cost Allowance (CCA) rates for depreciable assets generally in excess of normal depreciation rates related to the useful life of the asset. The budget papers recognize that in many cases the rates are deliberately set in excess of rates related to wear and tear in order to encourage certain types of investments in particular sectors of the economy while in other cases higher rates serve to recognize the effect of inflation on the replacement cost of an asset.

However, the November Budget intends to rectify what are considered to be certain anomalies in the existing system. As an example of such an anomaly the budget papers mention that depreciable property acquired at any time during a taxation year, qualifies for the full rate of CCA provided that the taxation year of the business is a full 12-month period. In fact certain manufacturing machinery and equipment (Class 29) may be depreciated for tax purposes in two taxation years although the taxpayer may have owned the asset for only 13 months.

To correct this situation the November 12, 1981 Budget proposed to limit the CCA for all depreciable assets to ½ the ordinary rate in the year of acquisition.

In judging whether this situation is anomalous it is helpful to review the conditions under which these measures were introduced. The present system for claiming CCA was introduced in 1949. Schedule 2 of the Income Tax Regulations comprises 37 separate classes of depreciable property, some of which may clearly be identified as incentive oriented; for example:

Class 24 – 50% straight line anti-pollution equipment (water)
Class 27 – 50% straight line anti-pollution equipment (air)
Class 29 – 50% first year, balance in any subsequent year—machinery and equipment used in manufacturing and processing

Other rates are more directly related to the useful life of the asset.

Where the fiscal year of the business is less than 12 months, the CCA claim for the short taxation year is reduced in proportion to the length of the period. However, such a proration is not required in respect of depreciation classes which are amortized on a straight-line basis, e.g. 24, 27, 29. (The May 31, 1982 draft regulations remove this exception.)

Class 29 was introduced in 1972 as a specific measure to increase substantially the cash flow of manufacturers and processors. The then Minister of Finance, The Honourable John Turner, stated in his budget speech:

> A taxpayer will be entitled to claim as depreciation up to 50% of the cost of the asset in the year in which it is acquired and the unclaimed balance in any subsequent year."
> "The tax treatment of companies engaged in manufacturing and processing will now compare very favourably with that in other nations, particularly the U.S. and the enlarged Common Market countries.

In the view of the Committee the example cited in the November 1981 Budget papers is not an anomaly but was a specific measure to place Canadian manufacturing and processing industries in a competitive position with other countries and particularly the U.S. where a very favourable tax treatment was accorded during those years to exporting companies. It is also worthy of note that in 1981 the U.S. introduced an accelerated cost recovery system as an incentive to the manufacturing sector.

The Committee questions the decision to reduce the incentive to the manufacturing sector at this particular time as it will lead to further curtailment of investment activity and additional pressure on corporate cash flows. Furthermore, the measure was retrospective in that it gave no recognition to the fact that major capital expenditures require considerable advance planning and financial commitments which in turn are in many instances dependent on available cash.

The Minister recognized the need for interim measures and on December 18, 1981 announced certain transitional provisions for property acquired after November 12, 1981 but for which arrangements to acquire had been made prior to November 13, 1981 provided there was written evidence thereof. The draft regulations issued May 31, 1982 reflect these transitional rules.

The present system of CCA was the subject of an in-depth study by the government in 1976 involving extensive consultation with taxpayers in all business sectors in order to evaluate the fairness and effectiveness of the current system. In his report on this study and analysis the Minister of Finance reported as follows: (Budget Papers May 25, 1976, Section C, p. 18, 19).

> In sum, the government's view is that the present system of capital cost allowances is basically sound in generally providing a legislative system of allowances, with a relatively small number of classes, and the diminishing balance method of calculation.
> After this assessment of the capital cost allowance rates in relation to actual business experience, and after consideration of national economic objectives, it is concluded that the basic rates for most types of assets need not be changed.

The Committee agrees with the conclusion that the rates for CCA on a diminishing balance basis, which are classes other than those incentive oriented referred to above, are not excessive in relation to the economic life of the particular asset. In this respect the Committee has heard representation from the Federation of Automobile Dealer Associations of Canada (FADA) who testified that the 30% rate applicable to automobiles was representative of the wear and tear and depreciation in value of such an asset. Such depreciation would occur in the year of acquisition and irrespective of the timing of the purchase during the year.

This statement seems to be in line with the conclusion reached in the 1976 study (p. 21) referred to above which contains the following statement:

> This category includes substantial variations in type of asset ranging from automobiles to buses, trucks and trailers. Despite the diversity the present rate of 30% covers the bulk of experience. The only rate change proposed is for taxi cabs.

Also Mr. Jenkins, Assistant Deputy Minister, Tax Policy and Legislation Branch, in his testimony before the Committee concurred that—for example—in the case of automobiles the 30% CCA rate was reasonably related to the deterioration of the asset and decrease in value during the year of acquisition.

The former Minister announced on May 31, 1982 an increase in the CCA rate from 30% to 40% for passenger automobiles used in a daily car rental business. The 40% rate was considered to reflect more closely the economic depreciation of the automobile.

The FADA witnesses appearing before the Committee indicated that the proposed measures which would reduce the CCA in the year of acquisition to 1/2 the normal rate would have serious repercussions on their members and on the automotive industry which was already in considerable financial difficulty.

The witnesses provided examples of the effect of the reduction in the capital cost allowance during the year of acquisition on a typical automobile dealer leasing business. The example was based on a representative fleet of 400 cars. The revised CCA measures would have the following negative cash flow effect over a five-year period:

	Virtually no increase in units	10% growth in units	10% decrease in units
Deferred Undepreciated Capital Cost (UCC) as a result of CCA restrictions in year of acquisition	499	896	252
Additional tax thereon at 50% over the 5-year period	249.5	448	126

The cash requirement would further increase due to the effect of interest on additional borrowing.

It is recognized that over the life of a business the total CCA claimed will be identical under both systems. However, in an ongoing and viable business the above tax payments require an immediate and permanent infusion of additional capital or borrowings into the business. Furthermore, the additional capital requirement will grow annually due to the effect of inflation on the replacement cost of automobiles. In other words, as old cars are replaced the higher cost of the new cars will add to the deferment of capital cost which may not be claimed in the year of acquisition and thus increases the current tax liability. The same result will occur if the business is expanding.

FADA has testified that the automotive industry is not able to provide the additional capital infusion or borrowing at this time and that this measure would lead many dealers into serious financial difficulties and in some cases would put them out of business.

This measure has a particularly damaging effect on the cash flow of any industry where CCA represents a high percentage of total expenses, e.g. the leasing business of cars, trucks, farm machinery, forestry equipment, construction and road building equipment. For the manufacturing industry in general it will in the short run result in reduced sales as investment decisions are altered.

The Committee heard testimony from the Tax Executives Institute on this subject. This organization represents the larger Canadian corporations in all sectors of the economy. The witnesses testified that this measure "would be one more reason not to make a previously planned investment". They made specific reference to the automobile, truck and farm machinery sectors which have already lost sales because of changes in investment decisions following the restrictive CCA measures and at a time when these industries are entwined in a struggle to survive.

The Committee submits that the conclusions reached in the Government's CCA study of 1976 continue to apply today, i.e. (Budget Papers May 25, 1976, p. 19):

> —the basic rates will remain somewhat in the taxpayer's favour in the interest of an acceptable system and one which all taxpayers (including small corporations) can readily apply.
> ...this result is quite consistent with the attainment of the government's national economic objectives. Aside from the need for a viable tax system, there continues to be a general compelling need for capital investment in this country; a general incentive in the form of a slightly generous sytem of basic rates is to be desired. Futhermore, if Canada is to attract investment and remain internationally competitive, international comparisons demonstrate not only the need for reasonably generous basic rates, but specific incentives as well. Finally, so long as inflation continues, even at a diminished rate, the somewhat faster tax write-offs provide funds needed to offset the adverse effect of inflation on the real level of business investment.

Consequently the Committee recommends that the measure to reduce CCA to ½ the normal rate in the year of acquisition be given further consideration and be modified.

Amendments to the proposed rules might provide:

—that the restrictive rules apply only to classes of assets with a CCA rate of 50% or more (24, 27, 29); or —that the CCA rate for all passenger automobiles be increased to 40%, and not only for the daily car rental business as announced on May 31, 1982; or —that taxpayers are provided with the option of following the restricted CCA rule in the year of acquisition or a system which allows for full CCA on assets acquired during the first 6 months of the year; or —any combination of one or more of the foregoing.

RESTRICTED INTEREST EXPENSE

The November 12, 1981 Budget proposed to limit the deduction for interest on loans used for investment purposes to the total investment income.

Such measure would have reduced the availability of funds for investment purposes from individual and ultimately from corporate investors causing an overall reduction in the amount of capital which is directed into small businesses, new real estate and other ventures and general equity financing in Canada.

In the budget of 1977 the Government identified tax uncertainty as a serious impediment to venture capital investment. It has been widely suggested that the proposals, which were introduced without consideration for appropriate transitional measures, would have produced a dramatic economic effect.

The Committee shared this concern and welcomed the amendments to the original proposal introduced on December 18, 1981.

Under the revised measures recognition was given to the need for Canadian venture capital and general equity financing. This is demonstrated by the exclusion of interest on loans in connection with significant shareholdings in most private corporations from the restriction. In the case of other Canadian equity investments, up to $10,000 of loan interest would be deducted against any other source of income. Also the two-year phase-in period of the revised proposals provided taxpayers with reasonable time to adjust to the new policy.

The revised rules did not, however, remove the overall concern about the restrictions which were being imposed on individual investors during a time of high interest rates and a rapidly shrinking equity base and reduced venture investment.

While the original impact had been modified considerably, a set of complex rules was required to achieve the desired results. This would have further contributed to uncertainty and the development of new investment schemes to prevent the application of interest restriction rules.

It was the view of the Committee that in order to encourage investment in Canada and to retain the flexibility and simplicity of the system the restriction for the deductibility of interest be withdrawn.

The Committee therefore welcomed the decision by the former Minister of Finance announced in the Budget of June 28, 1982, to review the subject of restricted interest and defer application of any measure to 1983 and the announcement by the present Minister of Finance, in his Statement on the economic outlook and the financial position of the government of Canada on October 27, 1982 not to proceed with the proposed restrictions on the deductibility of interest expense.

INCORPORATED SMALL BUSINESSES

The Budget of November 12, 1981 contained several significant measures affecting small businesses:

—the annual business limit was increased from $150,000 to $200,000 and the total business limit was increased from $750,000 to $1,000,000;

—a 12.5% tax was imposed on dividends paid out of income which benefited from the small business deduction;

—commencing in 1982, dividends paid by a Canadian controlled private corporation would no longer reduce the "cumulative deduction account".

SMALL BUSINESS DEDUCTION

A dual tax rate system for corporations was introduced in Canada in 1949. Every corporation benefited from a lower tax rate on its first dollars of taxable income.

In 1971 the two-tier rate was restricted to small Canadian controlled private corporations earning active business income. The thrust of the small business deduction rules was to encourage the development of small and medium size business in order to strengthen the base of the economy.

In the Summary of the 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, The Honourable E. J. Benson, then Minister of Finance, stated that the proposed changes would:

> limit the incentive to smaller private Canadian controlled corporations, that require, and in fact use, the tax savings to invest in their businesses or to pay dividends to shareholders.

These measures were in line with recommendations of this Committee in its report of September 1970 which suggested that:

—the two-tier corporate tax be retained;

—the two-tier system be confined to small business corporations only;

—the low rate be applicable to business income and not investment income;

—the measure of a small business should make reference to the annual profits of the business.

The "annual business limit", i.e. the amount subject to the lower tax rate and the "total business limit", i.e. the cumulative income amount a corporation may earn and still qualify for the small business deduction, evolved as follows:

Annual Business Limit	Total Business Limit
1972—$ 50,000	$ 400,000
1974—$100,000	$ 500,000
1977—$150,000	$ 750,000
1982—$200,000 (proposed)	$1,000,000 (proposed)

The Committee welcomes the increase in the annual business limit and in the total business limit. However, it questions the other measures taken which have a negative effect on the small business sector.

These measures are:

—the removal of the incentive to small business to maintain its cumulative deduction account through payment of dividends;

—the imposition of a 12.5% tax on the distribution of income which was taxed in the corporation at the small business rate.

In the view of the Minister, such measures are necessary to correct certain significant anomalies in the existing system.

Examples of such anomalies cited in the budget papers are:

—the existing dividend gross-up and tax credit system does not result in tax integration in the case of small corporate business income;

—the ability of corporate small businesses to reduce the total business limit by paying out dividends and loaning the funds back to the company or by using the funds for private purposes.

A review of these concepts is helpful in judging the reasons for their existence.

When the small business deduction was introduced in 1971, measures were also adopted to achieve integration of the taxation of incorporated small businesses and the taxation of individuals. The gross-up and dividend tax credit mechanism ensured that the total tax paid by the small business corporation and by its shareholders was the same as the tax that would be payable if the income had been earned directly by the individual.

In 1978, the dividend gross-up was increased from ⅓ to ½ of the dividend and the dividend tax credit to 37.5% of the amount of the dividend received by the shareholder. This meant a substantial reduction in the effective tax rate on dividends from Canadian corporations. The purpose of this measure was to assist the financing of business investment by increasing the equity base of Canadian corporations. To this effect the Minister of Finance said in his 1977 budget speech:

> One of my particular concerns is the financing of investment through new equity issues. The market for such issues has not been very receptive in recent years. Moreover, the equity base of many corporations has been reduced to a level which does not permit the further borrowing needed for business expansion.

The Minister fully recognized the intended impact of this measure when he stated:

> Substantial benefits will flow to small business from proposals for the extension and increase of the investment tax credit, the increase in the dividend tax credit..."

Thus, the reduction in the tax rate on dividends was a specific incentive-oriented measure rather than an anomaly. By imposing a 12.5% distribution tax the former incentive is now being removed and the integration concept re-established.

On June 28, 1982, the former Minister of Finance announced that the application of the 12½% tax would be deferred to 1983. The measure as originally proposed was unduly complex and retrospective in its application in that it imposed a tax on prior years' earnings when distributed in the future. By comparison, corporations which distributed such earnings prior to the application of the special tax were able to avoid the tax. The Committee was of the view that such retrospective effect should be removed and that the complexity regarding the taxation of small business should not be increased through such measures.

The present Minister of Finance announced removal of the retrospective effect and simplification of the new measure in his Statement in the House of Commons on October 27, 1982.

The special tax will apply only to dividends paid out of business income for taxation years commencing after 1982 and only to the extent that such income benefited from the small business tax deduction.

CUMULATIVE DEDUCTION ACCOUNT

The taxation of the small business corporation is based on tax neutrality, i.e. an individual receiving income through the corporation in the form of dividends will pay the same amount of tax as if he received it directly in the form of business income. The mechanics of this principle were introduced in 1971 with the objective of providing a mechanism to the small business corporation to perpetuate the small business tax deduction. This was achieved through distribution of income which would be taxed in the hands of the shareholders in the form of dividends. The cumulative deduction account (CDA), was reduced by 4/3 of the amount of the dividend thereby re-establishing the CDA to its original position and completing the process of integration. The November 1981 Budget proposed to remove this basic concept by denying the small business deduction to any corporation that had reached the $1 million cumulative income mark, thereby placing the Canadian controlled private corporation on the same level as any public corporation.

The Committee does not share this view and sees the amendment conflicting with the integration principle applicable to the Canadian controlled private corporation. There seems to be no justification in placing such restrictions on a Canadian controlled private corporation in addition to the application of the 12½% tax which is designed to re-establish the integration concept.

The budget paper indicated that only a small revenue gain was expected from this measure. However, for many private Canadian controlled corporations this meant a substantial reduction in annual cash flow and earnings and increases the element of risk. This measure is detrimental to small business at a time when government policy seeks to strengthen this sector which accounts for a significant portion of employment in Canada.

The Committee recommends that the payment of taxable dividends continue to reduce the cumulative deduction account of Canadian controlled private corporations.

EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

Several measures were included in the November 12, 1981 Budget to end the tax exemptions for certain benefits provided to employees. The benefits which were to become taxable included:

1) free travel passes or discount rates for employees who received transportation passes by virtue of their office and used them for personal travel;

2) the full value of subsidized board and lodging and other personal expenses provided by employers; and

3) employer contributions to provide health service plans and dental plans on behalf of employees. The taxable benefit was to be counted as part of the employee's medical expenses and would have been deductible to the extent they exceeded 3% of the employee's income.

Increased taxable benefits were announced with respect to automobile standby charges and interest-free or low interest loans. On January 22, 1982 the Hon. William Rompkey, Minister of National Revenue, announced that airline passes available to airline employees would become taxable only if the employee travelled on a space-confirmed basis and paid less than 50% of the regular economy fare. Employees of bus and rail companies would not be taxed on the use of passes.

The Minister of National Revenue also announced on the same date that employees who were able to purchase meals at cafeterias or dining rooms provided by their employers at low prices would not be considered to be receiving a benefit unless the price charged failed to cover the cost of food preparation and service.

On October 27, 1982 the present Minister of Finance announced that he would not proceed with the proposal to tax the health and dental plan benefits of employees. While the Minister recognized that the proposal would have improved the fairness of our tax system, he felt that now was not the time to introduce it.

With respect to automobiles made available to employees by their employer, the November 12, 1981 Budget proposed to increase the minimum standby charge subject to tax in an employee's hands from 1% per month to 2 ½% per month and from ⅓ of the leasing costs to ⅝ of the leasing costs. This standby charge was to apply in all cases where personal use was made of a company car. On June 28, 1982 the former Minister of Finance announced that the standby charge for company-owned automobiles would be reduced to 2% and the portion of the leasing costs to be included in an employee's income be reduced to ⅔.

There may be justification in relating a taxable benefit for the use of an automobile to the automobile's capital cost or leasing cost in the year an automobile is acquired. However, the benefit subject to tax in later years will bear no relationship to the value of the automobile at that time. Indeed, if an automobile is held long enough, the annual taxable benefit added to an individual's income will be greater than the value of the automobile and the cumulative taxable benefit may exceed the original purchase price of the automobile. It would be more realistic to compute the benefit by relating it to the automobile's value each year. The Committee is of the view that the amount of the benefit should be reduced each year by reference to an automobile's undepreciated capital cost, assuming maximum capital cost allowance was taken or by some other reasonable formula.

The November 12, 1981 Budget introduced measures to include a benefit in respect of all low interest bearing loans to employees in the income of such employees. Under the present system employers were able to make loans of up to $50,000 available to employees under certain conditions for the purchase of a dwelling for their own use when they were being relocated. No benefit was included in the income of the employee in respect of interest rates below market rates provided the amount of the loan did not exceed $50,000. Furthermore, low interest loans could be made without limit to employees for the purchase of company shares without the imposition of a taxable benefit.

On December 18, 1981 the former Minister of Finance announced transitional provisions for existing housing loans. No benefit would be computed in respect of the first $40,000 of housing loans in 1982 and the first $20,000 of housing loans in 1983.

The November 12, 1981 Budget provided that on home purchase loans the taxable benefit for a year would be calculated by reference to the lesser of the prescribed rate of interest applicable when the loan was made and the prescribed rate of interest for the year. Under the present system the taxable benefit for a year is calculated by reference to a prescribed rate of interest for the year only.

Subsection 43(1) of the detailed June 28, 1982 Notice of Ways and Means Motions reflects the revised measures respecting home purchase loans and is applicable after 1981. Thus, for years prior to 1982 the taxable benefit in respect of low interest housing loans would not be limited by reference to the prescribed rate at the time the loan was made.

The 1980 Employers' and Trustees Guide for filing T4-T4A and T4F returns (page 1 Part A) issued by the Department of National Revenue indicates that the taxable benefit respecting low interest housing loans will be determined by reference to the prescribed rate for the year in which the loan was made.

The Committee suggests that subsection 80.4(4) be amended to reflect the Department of National Revenue's administrative practice as set out in the aforesaid Guide. Otherwise, taxpayers who filed their income tax returns for years prior to 1982 in reliance on the Guide may be subject to tax on a benefit that was not anticipated.

WORK IN PROGRESS

The November 12, 1981 Budget introduced amendments designed to treat professional firms as any other business in respect of work in progress inventory. At the time of tax reform in 1971, this subject received considerable attention and after much debate it was concluded that professionals should be allowed to elect to exclude work in progress from inventory. At the time it was recognized that professionals were generally not allowed to incorporate and benefit from a lower tax rate and that the accounting for work in progress would put an undue burden on such professional firms.

The November 12, 1981 Budget proposed to remove this election without any interim provisions. Such measure would have placed a considerable burden on many professional business firms and their members.

On December 18, 1981 the former Minister of Finance announced amendments to the Budget proposals which had the effect of deferring the inclusion of work in progress in inventory of professionals for one year and thereafter spreading the tax burden resulting therefrom over two years.

The Committee is of the view that a professional business is not the same as that of a manufacturer and should not be treated the same way.

It therefore welcomes the announcement by the present Minister of Finance on October 27, 1982, that the work in progress rules will not apply to professionals who are ineligible for the small business deduction or would be ineligible if they were incorporated. This includes doctors, dentists, accountants, lawyers, veterinarians and chiropractors.

The Committee has not had the opportunity to consider the effect on other professional businesses such as architects and engineers who will still be affected by the new measures.

REORGANIZATIONS

As a general rule, dispositions of property by taxpayers are events with income tax implications. Depending on the nature of the gain or loss, they may be fully or partially taxable or fully or partially deductible for tax purposes.

The Act contains a number of provisions whereby taxpayers may defer tax consequences of dispositions if they consist of transfers of property to corporations or if a disposition arises in the course of a corporate reorganization. Such rollover provisions of the Income Tax Act have been amended from time to time since 1972, usually with a view to allowing more opportunity for taxpayers to defer tax consequences.

It was proposed that, effective November 12, 1981, all transfers of property to corporations and all corporate share transfers, exchanges, amalgamations and other corporate reorganizations be treated as currently taxable dispositions except in those cases where the transferor controlled the corporation to whom the property was transferred or where the reorganization did not result in any change in control of the corporation. There were also proposed exceptions for transfers of property by an individual to a small business corporation. The specific provisions of the November 1981 Ways and Means Motions relating to these transactions are found in paragraphs 33, 56, 58, 60, 64 and 70.

On November 18, 1981, it was announced that implementing legislation would provide authority to "grandfather" transactions made pursuant to arrangements that were essentially concluded before the November 1981 Budget date.

On December 18, 1981, it was announced that the effective date for such changes would be postponed to January 1, 1983 to allow a reasonable period of transition for those reorganizations that were in progress and to provide additional time to consider modification to the rules proposed in this area.

The former Minister of Finance announced on June 28, 1982 that he intended to refer the area of corporate reorganizations to a group of outside consultants for review and that changes in this area would not be proceeded with before their studies had been concluded and a discussion document had been made public.

The present Minister of Finance confirmed on October 27, 1982 that the pre-November Budget rules would continue to apply after 1982, with the exception of those changes contained in the June Budget dealing with certain rollover provisions in a partnership reorganization. Furthermore, any new proposals arising from on-going studies and consultations would not apply to reorganizations that would be substantially advanced on the date the new proposals announced.

Mr. Morris of the Department of Finance indicated to the Committee on May 19, 1982 that the purpose of the amendments proposed on November 12, 1981 was to tax arm's length sales at the time that such sales occur. Arm's length sales for cash are taxable. Many arm's length sales were structured in order to enable the vendor to receive securities that were almost the equivalent of cash. That is to say, the securities received were easily convertible to cash. It was argued by Mr. Morris that such transactions should therefore be immediately taxable.

With respect to the amendments proposed in the November Budget, the Committee notes as follows:

1) In many transactions that would have been affected by the proposed amendments, shareholders would not have had cash available with which to meet their tax liability. They would exchange one security for another without, in many cases, any change in their economic situation. This would amount to paying tax on a deemed but unrealized capital gain.

2) The new rules would have given an added incentive to cash-rich companies to engage in takeovers and mergers. Shareholders in companies being taken over would prefer not to accept an offer unless it included sufficient cash for them to meet the resultant tax liability. Other companies would be hindered or blocked from expanding because of the adverse tax consequences.

3) The proposals would unduly restrict Canadian business combinations which might permit economies of scale or permit access to new markets. Furthermore, they would hinder Canadian companies from acquiring shares of other Canadian companies owned by non-residents. This was in contradiction of the Government's objective of increasing Canadian ownership.

4) The proposals were inequitable because shareholders controlling a corporation prior to a reorganization and who did not lose control as a result of the reorganization would not be subject to tax as a result of the reorganization. On the other hand, shareholders who would lose control would be subject to tax. As a result, the larger (and usually the more wealthy) shareholders would not be taxed; the smaller (and usually the less wealthy) shareholders would pay.

It has been generally accepted that in the past few years the reorganization provisions of the Income Tax Act were, for the most part, well designed and reasonable. Taxpayers have gradually become familiar with the rollover provisions of the Act. The introduction of important changes in this area would reintroduce uncertainty and possible inequity.

CHARITIES

The November Budget proposed changes designed to increase the tax incentive for charitable giving for individuals making large gifts and for those corporations who did not have taxable income in a year against which to claim a current deduction. Prior to the November 1981 Budget, charitable donations could be deducted in a year to the extent of 20% of income. Any excess donation could be carried forward for one year. The November Budget proposed to extend the one-year carry forward to five years. Furthermore, donations that exceeded the 20% limit in the year of death would be permitted to be carried back to reduce tax in the previous year.

Several other changes were introduced to prevent abuses respecting the existing requirements for disbursement by charitable foundations of their receipts and incomes. Such changes included the requirement that private foundations disburse at least 10% rather than 5% minimum of the value of their non-qualified investments in the year and the requirement that all charitable foundations include the full amount of realized capital gains in their income subject to the disbursement rules. The Budget further proposed to introduce a tax on charities on any deficiency on the amount of their disbursements. Such tax would be refundable over the following three years to the extent the charity made up the deficiency.

These provisions were strongly criticized, the principal criticism being that they would erode the asset base of existing foundations. There followed extensive consultations between the former Minister of Finance and representatives of charitable foundations and on April 12, 1982, it was announced that foundations would be required to make annual disbursements of at least 4.5% of the fair market value of all their investment assets. As a result, disbursements by foundations will no longer depend on either the form or the amount of investment income (including capital gains) realized.

The present Minister of Finance announced on October 27, 1982 that he was examining the possibility of applying the same disbursement rules to both charitable foundations and charitable organizations.

The proposal to change the disbursement rules for charitable foundations has been well received by charitable foundations and is welcomed by the Committee.

LIFE INSURANCE

The November 12, 1981 Budget proposed that individual policyholders would be required to report accrued investment income every three years on life insurance policies issued, or annuities acquired, after November 12, 1981. It also proposed that remaining investment income be taxed on the eventual termination of the policy or annuity. Corporations would be required to accrue such income annually. Under the law as it existed prior to November 12, 1981, the investment income on the savings element of a policy was free from tax if received on death of the policyholder.

Furthermore, the November 12, 1981 Budget included a provision that would adjust the cost of life insurance policies to exclude any portion of premiums relating to the insurance element of the policy. As a result, individuals disposing of life insurance policies would be taxable on the amount by which the cash surrender value exceeded the investment portion of premiums. Under the law, as it existed prior to November 12, 1981, the full amount of premiums was treated as a cost, thus providing a tax deduction for their insurance costs for individuals who disposed of a policy.

The Committee examined the question of taxing policyholders at death in the review of Bill C-56 in 1977. In its report dated December 8, 1977, it stated as follows:

> Bill C-56 had proposed to extend to maturities arising on death the existing tax on the surrender of policies. It was proposed that with respect to deaths occurring after March 31, 1978 there be taxed the excess of the cash surrender value over the net cost of the policy less a $10,000 exemption.
> The Minister of Finance announced on October 20, 1977 that the government, pending further study, has decided to withdraw this proposal to tax certain life insurance policies realized on death.

No results of any study have been published since that time.

Your Committee attempted to question officials of the Department of Finance in regard to these proposed amendments on May 12 and were asked by Mr. Jenkins to defer discussion pending "negotiations" with the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association and the Life Underwriters Association of Canada.

The former Minister of Finance announced on June 28, 1982 revised rules relating to the taxation of life insurance.

Firstly, life insurance policies purchased before June 29, 1982 would not be affected by any budget amendments and would be treated under the rules which existed prior to November 13, 1981.

Secondly, policies issued after June 28, 1982 would be exempt from tax on accrued income if they provided significant amounts of insurance protection relative to the income built up and tax deferral they offered. More particularly, amounts accumulated by insurers for such policies would have to be below the amount that would be accumulated in a standard policy that provided the same death benefit and was paid for by premiums over 20 years. There would be no limitation on the amount of insurance coverage under policies qualifying for exemption. Most regular whole life policies purchased for protection and paid for by premiums over 20 years or more would be exempt under the new rule.

Non-exempt policies would oblige policyholders to report and pay tax on accrued income every three years. However, policyholders would have the option of making a one-time election to report accrued income annually in order to take full advantage of the annual $1,000 deduction for investment income.

Policies owned by corporations would be eligible for the exemption and corporations would continue to receive life insurance death benefits free from tax. However, for policies purchased after June 28, 1982, such amounts would no longer be paid out free from tax to shareholders through the use of the capital dividend account. Further comment in this respect is set forth later in this report.

Exempt life insurance policies would continue to be taxable if surrendered before death. The amount that would be taxed on surrender would be the accumulated income, measured as a cash surrender value received, less the cost of the policy for tax purposes. On June 28, 1982, it was announced that the mortality cost, determined by a formula, would be excluded from the cost of the policy for tax purposes for policy years commencing on or after June 1, 1985.

It was also announced on June 28, 1982 that where a policyholder received cash from an exempt policy by taking out a loan against the cash value, or by surrendering part of the policy, he would be taxed on the portion of the accumulated income in the policy attributable to the loan or a partial surrender.

The former Minister announced that the foregoing had met with the approval of the life insurance companies. The Committee withholds any further comment until it has heard the reaction, if any, from the Life Underwriters Association of Canada.

CAPITAL DIVIDEND ACCOUNT

Private corporations are able to distribute dividends to their shareholders free from tax if the dividends are paid out of the corporation's capital dividend account (subsection 83(2) of the Income Tax Act). A capital dividend account is defined to include, inter alia, the excess of proceeds of any life insurance policy received by the corporation in consequence of the death of a person whose life was insured under the policy over the adjusted cost basis of the policy to the corporation.

On June 28, 1982, the former Minister announced that for policies issued thereafter, life insurance benefits would no longer be paid out tax-free to shareholders through the use of the capital dividend account. This would:

> restrict the undue tax advantage now available through corporate-owned life insurance.

As a result of the former Minister's proposal, corporations acquiring life insurance policies after June 28, 1982 would continue to be entitled to receive proceeds free from tax. However, such proceeds could not be distributed to the corporation's shareholders without such shareholders incurring tax liability.

It is common for a private corporation to own and be the beneficiary of a life insurance policy on its principal shareholders. The corporation may use the proceeds of the policy to purchase the shares held by the deceased shareholder. Where a deemed dividend arises on the repurchase of the shares, a corporation may make the appropriate election to have the dividend paid out of the capital dividend account of the corporation.

Written submissions have been received by the Committee from the Life Underwriters Association of Canada to the effect that the amendments proposed by the former Minister of Finance would violate the concept of integration which exists in the Income Tax Act. Ideally, they argue, an individual should realize the same income tax consequences regardless of whether he earns his income through a private corporation or a partnership or as a proprietor. That is to say, a shareholder should bear no more tax by conducting his affairs through a private corporation than he would have had he conducted those affairs personally. Provided a policy is exempt pursuant to the June 28, 1982 rules, its maturity at death will enable an individual to receive proceeds free from tax. Such will not be the case if the individual has to pay tax on a dividend distributing the insurance proceeds from a private corporation.

Furthermore, it is argued by the Life Underwriters Association of Canada that life insurance proceeds were included in the private corporation's capital dividend account because the Department of Finance assumed that where a shareholder of a private corporation died and the corporation owned insurance on his life, the proceeds of insurance received by the corporation as a consequence of the death of the insured shareholder would be included in computing the value of the shares of the deceased shareholder for purposes of computing the capital gain which he would realize immediately before death as a result of the provisions of subsection 70(5) of the Income Tax Act. Consequently, the Department concluded that there would have been double taxation had such proceeds been distributed as a taxable dividend. The Federal Court of Appeal in The Queen v. The Estate of Umberto Mastronardi, 77 DTC, 5217, held that no amount of proceeds of life insurance was to be included in computing the value of shares of the deceased for purposes of subsection 70(5). As a result, the Department felt that the ability of the estate of a shareholder to receive proceeds of insurance free of tax through the use of the capital dividend account constituted an undue tax advantage.

It has been pointed out that the result of the Mastronardi case would not have universal application. In that case, the majority shareholder of a private corporation died quite unexpectedly from a heart attack. Revenue Canada, Taxation has issued an Interpretation Bulletin IT-416R in which it implicitly acknowledges that the Mastronardi case may not have application in cases where death was anticipated:

> For example, the value of an insurance policy could approach its face value if it was known that the insured had a terminal illness or was critically injured and not expected to recover as a result of an accident. Conversely, it would have little added value if a person in apparently excellent health were to die unexpectedly as a result of an accident or heart attack. For valuation purposes the state of health of the insured prior to death would override the effect of an unexpected death due to a cause not related to any known health problem. Therefore, if a person with terminal cancer died from an unexpected heart attack the actual cause of death would not be relevant in the valuation, but the fact that he had terminal cancer would.

Thus, in cases where death may be anticipated, it is argued that double taxation may result as a result of not being able to use the capital dividend account.

The Committee has not had the opportunity of obtaining any justification for this measure from the Minister of Finance or his officials and therefore makes no recommendations in this regard.

AFTER TAX FINANCING

The Committee has had occasion to comment on legislation introducing or affecting the concept of "term preferred shares" (See Committee Reports dated March 8, 1979 and December 5, 1979).

Several amendments have been introduced to the definition of a "term preferred share" including in particular the removal of the 10-year exemption for shares issued after November 12, 1981.

Corporations have been able to finance their operations on an after-tax basis by issuing preferred shares with short terms to other corporations who are not specified financial institutions.

It is proposed that subsection 112(2.3) be added to the Act which would deny any deduction for dividends paid to any corporation in respect of any share where the issuing corporation is or may be required to redeem, acquire or cancel the share or reduce its paid-up capital at any time within 5 years of the date of its issue.

In order to protect corporation reorganizations and estate freezing situations, an exception from this rule is provided for. Where the recipient corporation controls the issuing corporation, the dividends would be deductible. The Committee believes this exception is not broad enough. For example, it would not protect a situation where two individuals held equal interests in an operating corporation through holding corporations. If the holding corporation received retractable preferred shares from the operating corporation as part of an estate freeze, dividends paid to the holding corporations on the preferred shares would be subject to tax as neither holding corporation would control the operating corporation.

Furthermore, paragraph (j) of subsection 112(2.3), as presently drafted, in the detailed June 28, 1982 Ways and Means Motions, denies a deduction to a corporation receiving a dividend in respect of a share:

> where the terms and conditions of a share are modified or established after June 28, 1982 and as a consequence thereof the issuing corporation may reasonably be expected, at any time within 5 years from the date of issue, to redeem, acquire or cancel in whole or in part the share or reduce its paid-up capital—

It is not certain what the expression "and as a consequence thereof" modifies. If it modifies "are modified or established", it will affect all situations where shares are created or modified in order that they may be redeemed or retracted in the near future. This will affect many situations which should not be offensive from a tax policy point of view. For example, in some non-arm's length situations it is necessary to create preferred shares with a low paid-up capital and a high redemption value which are redeemed shortly after their creation. The result is the creation, but for this paragraph, of a tax-free dividend rather than a capital gain.

The Committee recommends that paragraph (j) of subsection 112(2.3) be deleted or amended to be of more limited application.

CONCLUSION

The purposes of the November 12, 1981 Budget included the reduction of marginal rates for taxpayers in higher taxable income brackets and the elimination of certain tax expenditures to compensate in part for the loss of revenue.

Unfortunately, many of the measures introduced to eliminate tax expenditures were ill-conceived or retrospective or both. This has resulted in the postponement of certain proposals pending further study and the introduction of amendments which eliminated most of the proposals the Committee found ill-advised. The Committee feels that other proposals should be deleted or amended or require further study and these have been commented on in this report.

The Committee withholds further comment until it has had the opportunity of reviewing the relevant legislation expected to be tabled shortly.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE J. McILRAITH
Acting Chairman

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 14, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1982-83

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-140, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1983.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before Question Period is called, I should like to give details of plans for Senate sittings until the Christmas adjournment, scheduled for December 22, so that you may make your travel arrangements.

We plan to sit tomorrow at 2 o'clock, as usual; on Thursday at 2 o'clock; on Friday at either 11 o'clock or 2 o'clock; on Monday at 2 o'clock; on Tuesday at 2 o'clock; and next Wednesday, December 22, at 2 o'clock. Then, on December 22 we hope to adjourn until January 17, subject to the usual possibility of earlier recall by His Honour, according to the rules.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I suppose that what the deputy leader has communicated to us is a final decision, and that it is useless to make any observations.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Go ahead.

Senator Flynn: In any event, should we not receive any legislation from the other place tomorrow or Thursday, I do not see why we should sit on Friday. I can very well understand that we may have to sit on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of next week, but considering the way things are going in the other place, I do not see any reason why we should decide tonight that the Senate shall sit on Friday. Of course, it is all very well if you want to sit merely for the formality of sitting. We have seen that happen before, but I do not see that it is absolutely necessary.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I understood that the plan had been discussed last week.

Senator Flynn: Not with me.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn is quite right, that when it was discussed last week it was on the assumption that there would be some reason for our sitting on Friday. Include that in my remarks. Certainly, it was not meant to be a magistral announcement. I did not mean to make any change to what had been discussed last week—namely, that we are prepared to sit on Friday if there is enough business to justify it. It is my understanding that the Leader of the Government in the Senate anticipates that there will be enough business. If there is not, there is no doubt we will not sit for the sheer formality of it.

Senator Roblin: I wonder if I could ask a question of the Leader of the Government or the Deputy Leader of the Government. What pieces of legislation does the government expect to be forthcoming from the other place in the next day or two?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): The possible pieces of legislation are: Bill C-85, Canagrex; Bill C-95, sports pools—

Senator Flynn: But we don't know that.

Senator Frith: We do not know for sure, but we want to be ready in any case.

Senator Olson: —Bill C-98, to amend the Agricultural Products Standards Act; C-110, to amend the Export Development Act; Bill C-130, the international financial institutions bill; Bill C-131, Old Age Security; Bill C-132, Family Allowances; Bill C-133, Supplementary Retirement Benefits; and Bill C-136, Small Business Investment Grants.

Senator Flynn: What about the bankruptcy legislation?

Senator Olson: I am not aware of any bankruptcy legislation.

Senator Flynn: It is on the order paper in the other place.

Senator Olson: The question was as to what we expect to get from the other place between—

Senator Flynn: But if you are going to be a realist, you might as well cut short your list.

Senator Olson: Of course, there is also Bill C-139, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Hon. C. William Doody: You will need a horse to haul them over.

Senator Olson: There is also Bill C-140, Appropriation Bill No. 3, which was introduced for both first and second reading reading this evening.

The Leader of the Opposition said that we should not meet on Friday unless we know we have something to deal with.

• (2010)

We expect to receive a number of those bills for consideration later this week. Usually on Thursdays we adjourn at some time between 4 and 5 o'clock, while the other place continues to sit until 10 p.m. Consequently, they may pass some of these bills and send them to the Senate on Thursday evening. Were that to happen, it would be useful for the Senate to meet on Friday in order to give those bills first reading and perhaps, in the case of some of them, with the usual co-operation of the opposition, even second reading so that they could be sent to committee. Any committees involved could meet on Monday before the sitting of the Senate. In that way, as much of the legislation as possible could be dealt with properly and could be given Royal Assent shortly before 6 o'clock on Wednesday of next week. At least, that is my assumption at the moment.

Senator Roblin: Now that the honourable gentleman has given us his shopping list, can we get down to brass tacks? For example, he has suggested that we will receive Bill C-85, the Canagrex bill. Surely that has to be an optimistic assessment, because that bill is subject to closure debate at the present time, and the prospect of seeing it go through even the other house, according to a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture the other day, let alone getting it here in sufficient time to deal with it on Friday, is surely optimistic.

Consider then Bill C-139, a tax bill of some 295 pages. Can there be the slightest expectation that that bill will reach us before Christmas? Surely not.

Were the minister realistic, he would surely pare his list of bills down to three or four, at the most—those dealing with the 6 and 5 per cent restraint that are before the other place right now.

While I readily admit that at this moment it would be inadvisable to try to make a final list of legislation, nevertheless I believe that on Thursday we will have a clear indication that the list the minister has just presented is not realistic and that we will have before us at that time only three or four bills at the most.

I therefore ask my honourable friend to withhold any decision concerning sitting on Friday until we are closer to the day. I am sure I speak for this side of the house when I say that we will be willing to meet on Friday if there is business to attend to. However, it seems that at the present time that is a long shot.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have to accept that statement as Senator Roblin's opinion, based on his interpretation of the circumstances. I have to admit that I was being somewhat optimistic in giving my entire list. I have no hesitation in saying that. In responding to Senator Roblin's question I simply gave the list as a repetition of those pieces of legislation I had enumerated as long as two weeks ago. If progress on some of those pieces of legislation has not been as rapid in the other place as we had expected, nevertheless we have to remain hopeful. Moreover, history teaches us that in the last hours before a predictable adjournment there is often an avalanche of bills, and that may well happen on this occasion.

Let me say again that I do not believe we should meet on Friday if nothing is added to the order paper, or at least unless there is a high possibility of something being added to the order paper, between now and 2 o'clock on Friday. However, as I see it, there are two possibilities. One is that between the time the Senate adjourns on Thursday and 10 p.m. on Thursday it is quite likely, from an optimistic point of view, that the Senate will receive some of the bills I have listed—and I will check that out and try to make a determination one way or the other. The other possibility is that, because the other place meets earlier than 2 o'clock on Friday, it might agree to a final vote on some, or at least one, of those bills before that time. Consequently, there is a strong possibility that there will be some legislation that the Senate could deal with in those hours when we would not normally be here. However, I am not saying that we should decide this evening to sit on Friday.

The Deputy Leader of the Government quite properly cautioned honourable senators that it might be possible to get through all of this business by December 22.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, may I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government for clarification of one point? If I heard him correctly, he indicated that we should expect to resume sitting on January 17.

With the uncertainty as to the amount of legislation we will have before us, if any, when we rise for the Christmas recess, I wonder if it would not be better to set a later date for resuming, subject to the provisions for recall by the Chair. It seems to me that that might save us from an embarrassing situation during the first week of sittings after Christmas.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I tried to make it clear that I was simply announcing a plan. It is to reconvene on January 17, subject to recall, or even postponement to a later date.

We shall certainly take into consideration the observations made by Senator McIlraith and other honourable senators when we get closer to the date of adjournment.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, relative to the possibility of our sitting on Friday of this week, however obscure that might be, I wish to inform the Senate that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs is holding a joint meeting with its counterpart committee of the House of Commons on Friday at 3.45 p.m. That meeting will be attended by President Zia of Pakistan. Friday afternoon will be one of those rare occasions when a head of state appears before a parliamentary committee.

I sent notice of this meeting to all members of the committee, and to all other members of the Senate, and I urge them to attend if they happen to be in the city on Friday.

I hope I am correct in assuming that that meeting—which will not really be, in the exact sense, a meeting of a Senate committee—will not be objected to if the Senate happens to be sitting on Friday afternoon at that time. It is quite late in the afternoon—3.45.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government has mentioned that on Friday he would like to have first and, in some cases, second reading given to bills we might receive. He knows very well that at this stage of the session legislation now before the other place has been the subject of debate for quite some time. We will agree to giving leave to proceed with second reading, as we did this evening with regard to the appropriation bill, and that applies specifically to Bill C-131, Bill C-132 and Bill C-133. If that is the only concern of the Leader of the Government, he need not worry any further.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I appreciate Senator Flynn's comments with respect to the three bills he mentioned. I am not sure whether the Leader of the Opposition would like to give us the same undertaking with respect to Bill C-85.

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PENSIONS

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMITTEE

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has tabled a document entitled: "Better Pensions for Canadians." At page 11 of the speaker's kit the following appears:

> The government will ask the House of Commons to establish a committee comprised of members of all parties to hold hearings throughout Canada. The committee will obtain the views of the public at large and all interested parties on the proposals for pension reform.

I presume because this issue is of great importance, that the government will want the use of the best brains in Parliament, and they are not all in the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Croll: I wonder why provision is not made for the establishment of a joint committee. In the study on pension reform which took place in 1952 we came up with the principle of universality. That study was by a joint committee. That was the beginning.

● (2020)

The next study took place in 1968. That study concerned the Canada Pension Plan and, again, it was by a joint committee.

This chamber is particularly blessed with many honourable senators who know something about pensions. They studied the subject for two years, and followed that study with a report. As a matter of fact, the report was entitled: Retirement Without Tears. At a price of $5.75, 5,400 copies were sold of the English version and 1,500 copies were sold of the French version. Thirty-two thousand copies of the abbreviated version of the report were given to those who asked for it.

What troubles me is why they should change the form of approaching the Canadian people at this time on such an important matter as pensions, and exclude the Senate from participation.

An Hon. Senator: That is a good question.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate hearing Senator Croll's recollections of the good work a number of honourable senators have done in participating in committees on this same subject in the past, and I will certainly carry his representations to the house leader and others in the other place. However, I believe that to some extent we are talking about recommendations concerning a House of Commons committee. In any event, whether it is confined to that or not, I give an undertaking to ensure that the house leader is informed of the work that has been done in the past.

KIRBY TASK FORCE REPORT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what has happened to the Kirby task force report on the east coast fisheries? I have been told that it has been in the hands of cabinet for some time, but not released to the public. Obviously, there is a tremendous amount of concern and interest in the part of Canada that I come from because the state of the fishing industry, which is so vital to the people and the economy, is indescribably bad. Could the minister tell us when the people who are directly affected will know what the contents of the Kirby task force report are?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I can tell Senator Doody that the recommendations of that report are under active consideration now. I believe it is common practice for these reports to be studied for some time by the government, especially one as large, as involved and as important to so many people as this, so that they have sufficient time to consider the recommendations and to give a positive response to some of them. I am sorry that I cannot give the date on which that consideration will be completed but, of course, at that time the report will be made public along with the government's response to both the report and to the recommendations contained in it.

Senator Doody: I thank the minister for that answer, but could he indicate a time parameter? I recognize that he cannot tell me what hour of what day, but will it be released within the next week, the next month or the next six months? Is there some message that I can relay to the people back home who are asking about that report and the implications it will have on their livelihood?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I really cannot do that with any precision but it would be within a time substantially shorter than the longest term he offered.

Senator Doody: In other words, what I can pass on to the people who are clinging to straws down there is that it will be more than one day but less than six months.

THE ECONOMY

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government clarify for my benefit and the benefit of others some of the comments made by the current Minister of Finance in the House of Commons recently?

● (2025)

Mr. Lalonde told the House of Commons on Monday, December 13, that he plans to use all the resources of the provincial and federal governments to stimulate the economy over the next year. I could not get any details—and I gather that others could not either—as to what he meant by "stimulate."

Would the minister tell us if, indeed, the Government of Canada now intends to stimulate the economy—to pour more money into the economy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance has been very forthright and consistent. I am not aware whether he did, in fact, make a further statement yesterday, because I did not arrive here until late in the evening. However, he has been consistent. He intends to utilize the resources that we have and to call upon the provinces and the municipalities to utilize their resources in order to ameliorate the difficult economic situation in which we find ourselves, particularly as it relates to the intolerably or undesirably high level of unemployment at the present time.

Senator Doody: That is certainly interesting but not completely consistent with comments that had been made by the predecessors of the present Minister of Finance.

My understanding was that the major problem was not unemployment. I was told in this chamber—and others were elsewhere—that the major problem was inflation, and that it was necessary to try to keep down the deficit.

To what degree of magnitude do the minister and his colleagues intend to stimulate the economy? How much farther down the deficit path do they intend to go? How large an amount of money do the minister and his colleagues intend to pour into the economy in order to stimulate it at this time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, very recently the Minister of Finance announced the projected level of the deficit. He also made it very clear that he intended to ask his colleagues to do some re-allocation of funds for the purposes we have just been discussing—that is, to ease the unemployment situation without adding new funding which would significantly increase the projected deficit indicated some time ago.

Senator Doody: I gather the minister is telling us that he and his colleagues intend to stimulate the economy and to combat unemployment without using any more money than they have already allocated in the present budget and without increasing the present deficit; would that be correct?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a comment and one way that my honourable friend may put it. However, if he would like me to interpret what he gathers, I could put it another way, and that is that we are trying to make more efficient utilization of funds that we have at all three levels of government.

Senator Doody: I appreciate the confession of the minister that he and his colleagues are not using the resources of government efficiently.

Putting that to one side for the moment, I am trying to determine how the minister is going to stimulate the economy and create employment without increasing the deficit or applying any more funding. That is not a comment; that is a question, and I would very much like to have an answer.

I am sure that those people in Canada who are on the unemployment rolls and those who are worried about the deficit and the inflation rate would also like an answer to that question.

Senator Olson: Senator Doody can get into a debate about this; he is really questioning opinions.

Hon. Martial Asselin: And is doing well.

Senator Olson: He probably is, from the honourable senator's perspective, but I do not think Question Period is a time for debate, even for a mini-debate.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

KIRBY TASK FORCE REPORT

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question supplemental to that asked by Senator Doody, and it concerns the Kirby task force report.

The recommendations are now in the hands of the government. Why can the government not release the recommendations and table them in Parliament now? Why must Parliament and the Canadian people wait until the government has formulated its position before receiving a copy of those recommendations?

With great respect, I dispute the assertion of the minister that the practice is for the government to consider its position before making a report public. If he takes the example of the Kent royal commission report, which was released some months ago, most of the substantive comments from the government on that commission's report have come some considerable time after the report was made public. My question is: Why can the government not now table the Kirby task force report, which is of such great interest and importance to people concerned about the fisheries in this country?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be the first to agree with Senator Murray when he says that reports from task forces can be handled in either of the ways he has described. I think that when the report is released, made public, tabled, or whatever the right term may be, the government will be asked immediately what it is going to do about these recommendations. That question will come as no surprise to anyone. It seems to me that it will therefore be advisable and desirable for the government to be in a position to respond to those recommendations in a comprehensive way, so that the people who are vitally affected will not be left wondering.

Quite obviously, to anyone who understands the complexity of the difficulty that that industry is in, there is no simple solution. There are, no doubt, a number of solutions that would require some funding and that may be related to a complex set of proposals. For that reason, I think it is extremely important that the government be in a position to respond positively when the recommendations are known.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary which I direct to the same minister. I gather from his reply to Senator Murray that, when the task force report is released, the government will have in place an action plan. I gather that, as a result of the ongoing study the government is now doing, it will be able to release both the report and governmental plans for dealing with it and with the industry's problems at the same time. Is that the reason why the report is being delayed? Is the government formulating a plan of attack on the problems of the fisheries in the east?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Touché.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think that responding to that question will only be repeating what I said a minute ago.

Senator Doody: With respect to the minister, I believe that it would be giving some valuable information, which is not what happened a minute ago.

Senator Olson: I think if Senator Doody reads what I said just before he asked his last question, he will be able to take from that the answer to the question he put.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the information seems to be so classified, I wonder how the Minister of Veterans Affairs was able to state publicly that the recommendations of the Kirby report would cost the federal government $100 million? Was this a factual statement? Was he guessing? What was the basis upon which he could make that statement?

Senator Murray: Let us see the report so that we can judge for ourselves.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I expect it would depend on how many of the recommendations were acted upon and the funding that was applied to each of them. It may be that if you added up the funding required for certain recommendations the total would come to $100 million, whereas if you took another set of recommendations the total might be $150 million. I have heard some figures that are even larger than that.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Why will my honourable friend not give us the report? It is going to be a public document; it is going to form the basis of public policy. It affects the lives of thousands of people. Why are we not allowed to look at it?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is not a matter of not being allowed to look at it. However, I can see that Senators Roblin, Murray, Doody and several others will be on their feet the next day saying, "What is the government going to do about this recommendation and that recommendation?"

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Why not?

Senator Asselin: Do you have something to hide?

Senator Olson: That is a normal reaction. I think that, in fairness to those honourable senators, the government ought to have a reasonable length of time in which to consider its response and the amount of funding that will be required. In that way, when honourable senators ask those questions, we can give them immediate, precise, accurate answers, as we are accustomed to doing.

Senator Flynn: That will never be the case. That's a big joke!

Senator Roblin: Let us assume that my honourable friend is correct in saying that as soon as the report comes down we will be expecting answers. What does my honourable friend think would happen? The whole public wants answers to these questions. I think that the whole public is entitled to see the report before the government comes down with its ironclad proposals as to what is to be done. I think my honourable friend would be greatly benefitted if he releases this report now and had the advantage of the views of the members of this house and of the members of the general public who are concerned.

Senator Olson: If the Honourable Senator Roblin could give me the assurance that all of his competent and curious—and I use the word "curious" in its best sense—colleagues from the maritime provinces who are so vitally affected by this report would give the government a few days in which to formulate its policies in response to it, that would indeed be welcome. I doubt, however, that he could give that assurance.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am not going to speak for my colleagues because they are capable of speaking for themselves. I think, however, that it is the government's responsibility to make these important documents public. What my honourable friend is telling me is that it suits the government's convenience to keep this document secret until it has decided what it is going to do about it. I really do not think that that is a tolerable policy. I think my honourable friend has a duty to submit this document for public consideration. If he finds it a little inconvenient to do so, so much the worse for him. But so much the better for the members of the public if they have the chance to make up their minds on this subject.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we do not intend to keep this document public—

Senator Murray: He does not intend to keep the document public!

Senator Olson: —or, rather, private. The government has already given an indication that the document will be made public. If honourable senators accept that, then I suppose my honourable friend's entire argument crumbles.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend will produce the document, I will stop talking about it. I doubt, however, that he will.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary? I gather from the comments of the minister that, when the government has finished perusing, studying and examining the recommendations contained in the report, it will be coming forward with a solid plan of attack on the problems of the fisheries. Does that mean that the solutions to those problems will be set in concrete, cast forever, or will there be consultation with the provinces before these new plans for the fisheries are put into effect?

Obviously, in the length of time that is at the disposal of this government, there will be a concrete set of plans coming forward as remedies for the problems of the fisheries. Will there be time given to the provinces in which to discuss the matter with the Government of Canada, or will all of these new action plans come into effect automatically upon the release of the document?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this government is extremely concerned about the financial condition of the east coast fisheries in all its aspects—in terms of the fishermen, the processing plants and so forth. There is no doubt that the government needs some time in which to assess what can be done, along with a level of funding, for the benefit of those people involved.

I may also say, in reply to the latter part of the question, that over the years, this government has demonstrated that it is open to good suggestions any time.

Senator Roblin: Particularly from Newfoundland!

SPORT

VOLUNTEER SECTOR—PROPOSED STUDY BY PARLIAMENTARY TASK FORCE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Will he take this opportunity to support the statement of his colleague, the Secretary of State, concerning the establishment of a parliamentary task force on the voluntary sector?

I ask the question in view of the importance, in these straitened economic times, of early action on a number of recommendations concerning the voluntary sector; in particular, the recommendations concerning the so-called "give-and-take" tax measures which would extend to humanitarian, cultural and sporting volunteer groups benefits similar to those enjoyed by political parties.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, I find a great deal of merit in the proposal advanced by the Secretary of State, which is supported by Senator Murray. Canada would not have its present high level of performance in certain areas of sport were it not for the outstanding voluntary effort which is to be found in all Canadian provinces. I am in accord with the sentiments expressed by Senator Murray.

Senator Murray: Is the minister in accord with the proposal to set up a parliamentary task force on the voluntary sector? Further, does the minister support the recommendations concerning the so-called "give-and-take" tax proposals?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would certainly study most sympathetically any proposal to establish a parliamentary task force. The tax implications of an extension of exemptions for contributions for sport purposes would have to be studied before I would offer an opinion on that subject. In principle, however, the idea has a great deal of merit.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

ANNUAL SEAL HUNT—RESOLUTION OF EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT—POSSIBILITY OF RETALIATORY MEASURES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Marshall on November 16, 1982, concerning the annual seal hunt and the possibility of developing secondary industry and alternative markets. Since the answer is long, I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

> I would like to point out that Carino Ltd., of St. John's, the major buyer of the seal pelts landed in Newfoundland, established a pelt tanning operation at their plant in Dildo for the first time during the 1982 season. The company tanned a substantial number of the pelts purchased in Newfoundland in 1982 and has recently indicated that it plans to continue, and possibly expand this operation, in 1983. Such added processing activity and employment opportunity in the Atlantic region is particularly encouraging since, prior to this year, all Canadian seal pelts had been tanned by European firms.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is aware of the potentially difficult marketing situation facing the Newfoundland sealing industry. Officials of the department have had several meetings with their counterparts in both the Newfoundland Department of Fisheries and the processing industry during the past several months on this matter. These contacts have been made with a view to establishing cooperative programs to develop a broader-based secondary industry in Canada and to attempt to expand domestic and alternative foreign markets for seal products. Among the initiatives being explored at this time are:

(a) programs to promote increased use of seal pelts in the Canadian garment and footwear industries;

(b) the development of souvenir and handicraft industry;

(c) the encouragement of domestic leather production utilizing seal pelts.

As an example of industry-government cooperation, I would also like to mention that a number of initiatives have been taken in the past to support the development of the seal meat processing industry. These include programs launched by the federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans, and Industry, Trade and Commerce, to develop new products and expand markets for Canadian seal meat. The Newfoundland Department of Fisheries has also assisted in the development of the seal meat industry.

ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Marshall on December 1, 1982, concerning assistance to fishermen. Again, I would ask that the answer be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

It is well known that the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada is beset with numerous problems including depressed levels of income for some fishermen in some areas. It is also well known that there are no magic or overnight solutions to these problems and that is why the government appointed the Kirby task force to conduct a detailed examination of the industry. The government is presently examining the recommendations of the task force, many of which will have an effect on the incomes of fishermen and fish plant workers who are often members of the same family. One of the factors contributing to low incomes is the seasonality of the work for both fishermen and plant workers. The government will take steps beginning in 1983 to extend the operating season of fish plants particularly on the north east coast of Newfoundland through the identification of supplies of fish for these "resource short plants". This will involve deliveries by trawlers of 27,000 tonnes of groundfish in 1983 to plants dependent on supplies from the inshore sector. With plants operating longer, the incomes of plant workers are expected to increase.

Because many of the problems addressed by the task force are interrelated, we will have to refrain from instituting piecemeal solutions to particular problems and further measures will have to wait until sometime early in the new year when all of the Kirby recommendations have been examined in detail.

OIL SPILL CLEAN-UPS—CO-ORDINATING AGENCIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Thompson on December 2, concerning the responsibility of federal departments in the event of oil spills in the Arctic. The reply involves a full page of typing, and I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The responsibility for dealing with oil spills rests with the industry whose operations result in spills. Consequently, industry is required to develop suitable contingency plans. If an adequate spill response proves beyond the capability of the industry, the federal government involvement may escalate beyond a monitoring role. The government may, on a cost-recovery basis, provide support to the industry operations; or assume management of the response; or even co-ordinate an international response if the spill threatens to cross international boundaries.

If the government becomes involved in the Arctic, the Canadian Coast Guard of the Department of Transport is the lead federal department for oil spills from vessels, and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development assumes a similar role for non-ship spills. The responsibilities of the various other federal departments are defined in these cases by "The Arctic Marine Emergency Plan" and "The Arctic Seas Contingency Plan", respectively. These general plans which were developed in consultation with Environment Canada, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Ministry of Transport and industry, serve also to co-ordinate the various contingency planning documents of individual departments, the Territories, industry, and neighbouring nations like the United States and Norway (for Greenland).

LOTTERIES

GOVERNMENT POLICY—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF DELAY IN ANSWERING

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. It concerns a question I asked the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport on November 24 about the lottery held by the Hamilton naval veterans' association, and the fact that they were charged by the police on Remembrance Day. The minister promised to bring my observations to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. That was on November 24, three weeks ago.

On December 10 in the other place, the member for Burlington asked a similar question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and received a reply. The reply stated that the particular issue was brought to the attention of the minister a few days after the incident occurred. He stated that it was unfortunate that the police chose Remembrance Day to visit the Hamilton naval veterans' association and prosecute them for running a 25-cent lottery. The minister confirmed that the matter involved the Criminal Code and federal-provincial jurisdiction; that they were looking into the matter, and hopefully it could be resolved shortly.

I am wondering why we ask questions in the Senate if we cannot get the answers. By following the debates in the other place I can get the answers before the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport can provide them. Perhaps the minister could look into this matter and find out why I cannot obtain an answer while the member for Burlington in the other place can obtain one immediately, three weeks after I asked a similar question in the Senate.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, as a matter of practice, we always endeavour to bring information to this chamber as soon as or before information is provided in the other place. I cannot explain the anomaly in this particular circumstance, but I agree with the sentiments expressed by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, in that it is reprehensible that on Remembrance Day an action of that kind should be taken. I shall endeavour to ascertain the reason for the delay in answering. The matter may have been inadvertently overlooked. I hope that on the next occasion we can provide the information more quickly.

Senator Marshall: I hope the minister means what he says, because something similar has happened several times before, and he knows it. I can only repeat my question: Why do we ask questions in the Senate if we are not going to get answers within a reasonable period of time? I write to various departments and I receive confirmation that I wrote the letter, and that the minister has seen it, approximately three weeks later, and there may not be any action for six months. We should find out why we are being treated as second class parliamentarians.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I reject the view that members of this chamber are regarded as second class parliamentarians. The fact of the matter is that a great body of information is brought to the attention of honourable senators, information which often is not made immediately available to those in the other place. That is a matter of record. It may be that the media reject some of that information as being legitimate news, but the fact is that that information is provided in this chamber on a fairly reliable and well researched basis. This incident, I believe, is an exception to the rule.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SOUTH AFRICA—CRITERIA FOR ISSUANCE OF EXPORT PERMITS—CORRECTION OF ANSWER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a comment on a delayed answer that perhaps teaches us the lesson that we should be careful when using acronyms. I refer to a delayed answer that I gave to Senator Lang and Senator Nurgitz on December 7, 1982, concerning the export of armaments from Canada. Senator Lang, in his question, and I, in my reply, referred to COMECON as being part of NATO. That, of course, is incorrect. It is COCOM. COMECON is an organization of the Soviet bloc.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I had not corrected my blues containing that question. I was referring specifically to exports of armaments not to South Africa but to Russia. I was really asking what the ground rules were in terms of our exports to Russia, and how they were affected by that organization, whether it be COCOM, COMECON or whatever we wish to call it.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

PURCHASE OF FROZEN SQUID—PURPOSE

Question No. 83 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

For what purpose did the Department of Fisheries and Oceans purchase frozen squid from Cape Broyle Sea Products Ltd., P.O. Box 29, Cape Broyle, Newfoundland, under Supply and Services contract NEW-82-00380/1?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans:

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans, through the Newfoundland Bait Service, purchased frozen squid from Cape Broyle Sea Products Ltd., P.O. Box 29, Cape Broyle, Newfoundland, for subsequent sales to Newfoundland fishermen for use in their fishing operations. Under Terms of the Union when Newfoundland entered Confederation in 1949, the federal government is responsible for the continuation of the government operated bait service.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REVENUE DERIVED FROM SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Question No. 89 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

For the years 1972 to 1982, what revenue has been derived by the government per year from the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials?

Reply by the Minister of National Revenue:

The sales tax on construction materials and the sales tax on other goods were not recorded separately prior to fiscal year 1976-77.

The rate of tax on construction materials was reduced to 5 per cent in the November 18, 1974 budget.

Revenues from 5 per cent sales tax on construction materials are:

Year	Importation	Domestic	Total
1976/77	$ 18,829,801.71	$ 337,364,605.28	$ 356,194,406.99
1977/78	14,852,745.06	376,937,439.07	391,790,184.13

THIRD READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the third reading of Bill C-134, respecting rebates of interest on farm loans made under the Farm Credit Act.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the sponsor of the bill.

The minister was not present at the committee hearing, but we heard from officials of the Farm Credit Corporation, who gave us certain information. They said that the funds provided under the legislation would be insufficient for the purpose, and secondly, that there was a surplus in the general loan fund, as farmers did not wish to borrow at the high interest rates. On Friday, December 10, the Farm Credit Corporation announced that it was lowering rates charged to farmers under the special assistance program and for general loans.

I would ask the sponsor of the bill why it was necessary to maintain those interest rates at so high a level for a period of one year. There has been no change in the Farm Credit Corporation legislation to allow the interest rates to be lowered, and indeed the announcement said it was an interim measure until changes could be made. If that procedure could be followed on December 10, 1982, why could not the same procedure have been followed on December 10, 1981, before the farmers were forced into these long-term loans, some of them at 16.5 per cent? I would like an explanation of the reason for maintaining interest rates so high for a period of one year.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, in reply to Senator Phillips, it is my understanding that the Farm Credit Corporation has no choice in this matter, that its lending rate has to be, I believe, one-half point above the rate at which the government is borrowing at that time. My understanding is that it fluctuates with the cost of money to the government. As the cost of money in the past year increased substantially, the rates on FCC loans also went up.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, the Farm Credit Corporation has been in the habit of setting interest rates twice a year, on April 1 and October 1. I would remind the honourable senator that the interest rate was established on October 1, and there has been very little decline in interest rates since October 1. Therefore, I do not believe his explanation holds water. Perhaps he would do a little better if he contacted the corporation, and then advised us.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I am sure I can get a more detailed reply by following the course proposed by the honourable senator. However, we are now at the third reading stage of the bill. It was my understanding that we had an agreement regarding third reading. Would the honourable senator agree to the bill's being read a third time, and accept my undertaking to bring him the information later, or does he wish to delay third reading?

Senator Phillips: I think I can trust the honourable senator, and I shall be happy to do so, considering the season.

● (2050)

Senator Molgat: I thank Senator Phillips. In that case, we can proceed with third reading, and I will undertake to obtain full information as to the rate structure.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1982-83

SECOND READING

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc moved that Bill C-140, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1983, be read the second time.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Explain, please.

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1982-83, also known as Bill C-140, which was passed by the other place on December 9, 1982, covers all votes of Supplementary Estimates (B). As you will recall, these Estimates were tabled in the Senate on November 8, 1982. In Hansard, at page 4951, we read that the motion to authorize the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to examine these Estimates was agreed to.

The members of the committee met on Thursday, November 18 and examined the Estimates in detail. Representatives of the Treasury Board were present as witnesses to answer questions by committee members.

Supplementary Estimates (B), totalling $5.326 billion are the first "regular" supplementary estimates for the 1982-83 fiscal year. Out of this total supplementary amount of $5.326 billion, $3.411 billion represent the net adjustment of statutory items. These payments are not discretionary. The remaining $1.915 billion represent new spending authorizations that Parliament is being asked to approve.

The principal change in the statutory items is the following: $1.8 billion will be paid to the oil industry in the form of incentives, retroactive to January 1, 1981 and until the end of the current fiscal year, with a view to encouraging oil and gas exploration and operations, in accordance with the National Energy Program.

The main items on which Parliament will be asked to vote are the following: The transfer of $225 million to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation under the Canadian Home Ownership Stimulation Plan which provides grants of $3,000 for purchasers of new houses and for those purchasing a house for the first time, and under the Canada Home Renovation Plan, which provides up to $3,000 for individuals who are eligible for assistance in paying the cost of home renovation; in addition, the transfer of $200 million to both the Canadair and de Havilland Corporations to broaden their capital base, as announced recently by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

The supplementary estimates include six one dollar votes. All these votes are financial in nature; three have to do with a transfer of funds from one vote to another and the other three are related to the payment of grants for which funds are already allocated in the programs. The committee received a list of these votes and has reported on them.

All the details of the proceedings of our Standing Committee on National Finance are recorded in Issue No. 63 dated November 18, 1982.

On Thursday, November 25, 1982, I had the privilege, on behalf of Senator Everett, to table the report of this committee which was printed in appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of that day so that it would form part of the permanent record of the Senate.

On Tuesday, November 30, 1982, as shown on page 5074 of Hansard, the Senate began consideration of the report of the committee with contributions by the chairman of the committee, Senator Everett, and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, Senator Roblin, who is also a member of the committee.

The next day, Wednesday, December 1, 1982, the Senate resumed the debate, as shown on page 5086 of Hansard, with Senators Doody and Everett participating; as no other senator indicated to the Speaker that he wished to make a contribution, the matter was considered as having been debated.

To complete the file on this matter, I have here two tables, the first of which is entitled "Supply to date for 1982-83". The second table is entitled "Estimates tabled to date for 1982-83".

If honourable senators so wish, these tables could be printed in Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(Tables follow:)

TABLE I

SUPPLY TO DATE FOR 1982-83

Two Appropriation Acts have been approved in respect of Estimates for 1982-83:

Senator Leblanc: Of course, I am willing as much as I can to answer any questions honourable senators may have.

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to take a moment of your time to comment on this Appropriation Bill. As Senator Leblanc has indicated, we are dealing with Supplementary Estimates (B), which were referred to the National Finance Committee, which, in turn, reported back to the house last week. At that time, I had occasion to say a few words, which were not entirely complimentary, on some of the items in the bill and I hesitate to repeat them again this evening.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Go ahead.

Senator Doody: I must say, though, that at the mention of Canadair and de Havilland a few moments ago, a few hackles were raised on the back of my neck, and I felt that I should perhaps bring to the attention of the Senate the government's handling of the financing of these two firms, particularly the financing of Canadair which leaves a great deal to be desired. The $1.35 billion in debt in which the firm has now placed itself is costing it, I believe, something like $15 million per month in interest charges. I understand that the firm is now in a position where it feels it cannot really support any more debt, and that hardly surprises me in view of the interest rates that it now has to carry.

The government has struck on a new way of keeping this monster going. It has voted Canadair $200 million in equity in this particular set of supplementary estimates. This equity is struck in a strange way. The government refuses to list it in the assets of their balance sheet because I suppose they do not really feel they will ever get it back. On the other hand, they do not want to call it a gift because it may set some sort of unfortunate precedent for all those other struggling Canadian firms out there which are anxiously awaiting someone to come up with a couple of hundred million dollars for them.

So we now come to the various forms of government financing, all of which, at one time or another, have been applied to Canadair. There are the letters of comfort, which we have talked about on several occasions, through which several hundreds of millions of dollars of financing were passed on to this company with no parliamentary approval at all. It is just done on a letter signed by the minister, saying that the bank and the minister undertake to obtain parliamentary approval some time later. As a result hundreds of millions of dollars of financing were arranged for Canadair through comfort letters. In addition to that there were the guaranteed loans derived through the normal channels, either the Loans Act or the Appropriations Acts, and now we come to still another system of what are, in effect, outrights gifts, and de Havilland and Canadair have each benefited to the tune of $200 million from this Christmas package of the Government of Canada.

These two corporations, which, incidentally, might well be called crown corporations since the Crown holds all of the shares, have now been placed under the tender direction of Senator Austin's CDIC. I fully expect, therefore, that considerable accountability will now take place before Parliament—at least before this particular section of Parliament, and we will henceforth be able to obtain the kind of information and knowledge not available to the other place under the former arrangement.

Honourable senators, I prepared a number of questions having to do with the structure governing the policy and directions of Canadair and de Havilland, and several other of these monsters that are growing up and feeding off the taxpayers' dollars, and sent them to Treasury Board in the hope that I would receive some answers. If I do not, I will ask the questions in this chamber. They concern the kind of directives given to the board of directors in terms of fulfilling their obligations. Obviously the board of directors is appointed by the Crown to look after the interests of taxpayers, but I have been told that the government does not insist that the company, in its operations, be directed by the board of directors, in that sense that, although the members are expected to act in a businesslike manner, their first requirement is to put into effect the policies and directives of the company as opposed to looking after the interests of taxpayers, who, in this case, are the shareholders.

I believe we need those matters clarified and I have asked the Treasury Board to do just that. I have also asked for further information on the current letters of comfort, because at our last meeting the officials informed us that they had no intention of changing their policy with respect to comfort letters, but rather that they would continue to issue them because they felt it would be impossible for them to carry on the affairs of the country without having recourse to those instruments.

I have also asked for clarification of that matter because I do not believe that those particular letters of comfort are legal instruments. The law says that before any money is distributed to anyone, the distribution must be approved by Parliament, but with these letters of comfort Parliament, in my opinion, is being circumvented. When Parliament is sitting, a bill can be introduced respecting financing of whatever sort; when Parliament is not sitting, financing can be provided through Governor General's warrants. In my opinion, not only are these letters of comfort unnecessary; they are illegal. I have, therefore, asked for an opinion on this matter, and when I receive an answer I will make the information immediately available to my colleagues.

Honourable senators, as I mentioned earlier, I touched on a number of other items in the supplementary estimates when I was commenting on the report of the committee a few days ago, and so, despite the urgings of my colleague, Senator Marshall, I will not go over them now. I thank you for your patience and forbearance. I commend the estimates to your tender mercy. If you can find it in your heart to vote for them, then it is on your conscience and not mine.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I am not a lawyer, but I understand that a director has certain responsibilities he must fulfil. If he does not, the shareholders can sue him. Does the same relationship exist between the shareholders and directors of these companies?

Senator Doody: Like Senator Thompson, I am without degree or pedigree so I can hardly answer that question from a professional point of view. However, that is precisely the sort of question I have put to the officials, and, as I have indicated to the chamber, when I receive the answers to my questions I will be more than happy to share the information.

For the moment I can only repeat that I do not know under what directives the directors of these companies operate. I do not even know their terms of reference or how often they are expected to report to the minister, or whether they are people with experience in various business fields or civil servants, or anything else. I have asked for that information and when it comes to me I will be most happy to share it with the chamber.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Honorable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if Senator Leblanc speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, Senator Doody was very active during the deliberations of the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance on Thursday, November 18, where he did ask many questions. Even in this house when Senator Everett spoke to the committee report, Senator Doody again asked some questions, particularly about de Havilland and Canadair. I think that his questions deserve to be answered and I hope that within the not too distant future we will be in a position to provide Senator Doody with the appropriate answers. Perhaps Senator Doody will not be satisfied with them, but what really matters is to give answers to the senators who ask questions that are as intelligent, as relevant, and as important as those asked by Senator Doody.

I hope that the Treasury Board or the department concerned will provide appropriate answers as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

THE SENATE

DISTRIBUTION OF B.C. APPLES IN CHAMBER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, before an honourable senator opposite accuses the government of apple polishing to expedite business before Christmas, may I say that the apples on your desks this afternoon are from—where else?—British Columbia. They are full of vitamin C and other health-giving vitamins and minerals—a sure recipe for fitness and a nourishing way to end 1982 and to begin the new year.

While my office has distributed them in this chamber, they were made available through a member of the loyal opposition in the other place—Fred King, from Okanagan-Similkameen, where the apples were grown, and from B.C. Tree Fruits. It is hoped that honourable senators enjoy them.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, although it has been agreed that we should have as short a Question Period as possible, I do not think it should be as short as it was one day last week.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: So, to get the ball rolling, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, concerning a statement by the Honourable Pierre De Bané, Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who used to be vigorous in his defence of Quebec's veto on constitutional amendments; he even signed a dissenting report in 1972, and, until he entered Cabinet, was very combative, although he has been very meek since. Others, and I shall not mention any names, have done the same. I do not know whether it is because he has been haunted by guilt feelings since the passage of the constitutional resolution which eliminated Quebec's veto, and fiscal compensation as well with respect to amendments to the Constitution, and which would transfer to the federal government powers now belonging to the provinces; but, the ineffable minister has suggested that we could perhaps substitute for Quebec's veto a new formula that would require a double majority for all constitutional amendments, that is, a majority of the members from Quebec and also a majority of the other members. Simple arithmetic tells us that the suggestion is downright silly. From our experience with the constitutional resolution, when Liberal members from Quebec voted as one man with the government, thereby eliminating Quebec's veto and any other compensation, it was clear that they had no idea how to act together, at a time when they had a unique chance to do so. In any case, although the suggestion is silly, perhaps since Mr. De Bané claims that the government is examining this possibility, the Leader of the Government would inform us whether this statement is to be taken seriously.

• (1405)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure whether a question has been put. I understood the last sentence to be in the form of a question, but the interpretation and editorializing of what was in the press by the Leader of the Opposition leading up to that last sentence makes it a little difficult to respond.

Senator Flynn: You do not have to comment; answer the question, that is all.

Senator Olson: If the preamble does not add much value to the question, then I am sure the Leader of the Opposition appreciates that he should not have included it.

Senator Flynn: If you want to comment on my preamble, go ahead.

Senator Olson: Perhaps I should get a detailed or, at least, an orderly response from the minister whom the Leader of the Opposition quoted in his reference to an article in a newspaper. When I have that information I will respond to the question.

I must tell my honourable friend that this government takes matters respecting the Constitution seriously. Indeed, for several weeks—in fact, months—we took the Constitution so seriously that we spent a great deal of time in order to bring it to a position which I think is substantially better than that in which it was before that investment of time and effort.

Senator Flynn: When the Leader of the Government says that the situation is much better now than it was before, does he mean that from the viewpoint of the Quebec veto, or whatever Mr. De Bané is talking about when he says he is trying to replace the lost veto with a double majority?

Senator Olson: What I am talking about is the fact that we have the Constitution domiciled in our own country.

Senator Flynn: That was easy.

Senator Olson: That was not easy.

Senator Flynn: Oh yes, it was easy.

Senator Olson: It was not easy. We had to fight the opposition every step of the way.

Senator Flynn: Certainly not!

Senator Olson: Now all Canadians—including, I am sure, all Canadians in Quebec—feel even more pride in their country as a result of having full maturity.

Senator Flynn: When the Leader of the Government says it was not easy, I must disagree with him. It would have been easy had the government followed its proposal simply to patriate the Constitution with an amending formula. What made it difficult was the way it was done—imposing something on the Province of Quebec. Indeed, at the beginning, it was an imposition on eight of the ten provinces.

Hon. R. James Balfour: The Supreme Court told you that you were wrong.

Senator Olson: I am sure that my friend would agree, however, that, though he so often accuses this government of taking the wrong procedure—

Hon. David Walker: With good reason!

Senator Olson: —he always agrees that the result is good for Canada. I am not surprised, therefore, that he makes that comment yet again.

I was really commenting on all of the time and effort involved to persuade my honourable friend that the government takes very seriously constitutional matters, which include Phase II and other things which will be considered again when the first ministers meet in the spring.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. The fact of the matter is, as far as we can ascertain from reports that were made, that Mr. de Bané referred to a so-called double majority formula. At the time he also mentioned that the formula was being studied from the governmental point of view. Does that mean that the study is being carried out by a non-governmental body, and is this question actually being studied at the present time? That is all I want to know.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take this question together with that posed by the Leader of the Opposition. I have already said that I would alert the minister and ask him for any comments he may wish to make.

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION—SALE OF EVAPORATED MILK TO LIBYA

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government able to give me the information I asked for on December 2 concerning Canadian policy regarding the anti-Israeli boycott? Some shipments of condensed milk were allegedly shipped to a third party in defiance of the government's stated policy, and the minister was going to obtain some information on that.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I recall giving the honourable senator that undertaking. However, I seem to recall that I replied to that question, although I do not have the reply with me today. I will endeavour to identify the reply, to see if it was indeed given. If it has not been given, I will make a renewed effort to get it.

Senator Doody: If the reply has been given, then I apologize, in anticipation of receiving it.

SUNNYBROOK HOSPITAL, TORONTO—SUPERANNUATION OF EMPLOYEES

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: By way of preamble to my question, honourable senators will be glad to know that there is at least one person who reads Debates of the Senate. He is a member of the Divisional Court in Ontario. He has written me asking whether I have had a reply to a question I asked on November 16 dealing with the hardships being imposed on ex-federal government employees, now retired from the staff of Sunnybrook Hospital, by reason of the federal government's failure to live up to the commitment it made at the time the hospital was taken over by the provincial government. I might say that the inquiry is from a man who I believe is well known to honourable senators, since he is chairman of the Dominion Constitution and Laws Committee of the Royal Canadian Legion. I refer to Mr. Justice Blair.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should point out that Mr. Justice Blair is a member of the Court of Appeal and not of the Divisional Court.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in reply to Senator Lang, I will endeavour to obtain a reply to his question. I do not recall providing a delayed answer to it.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION—SALE OF EVAPORATED MILK TO LIBYA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to Senator Doody and the question he raised about the Israeli boycott. I recall that we had replied to it, but I guess it was only a partial reply. I am advised that we did not give the honourable senator as complete an answer as he is entitled to. Therefore, there will be—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What else is new?

Senator Olson: —a further reply. It is new if the Leader of the Opposition agrees that we strive constantly for full and complete answers.

Hon. C. William Doody: There is lots of room for improvement.

Senator Olson: We have had discussions with more than one department, including External Affairs and Agriculture, and we are still looking into the situation in order to clarify certain aspects of it, especially as they relate to the allegations that have been made.

In any case, as I have already said, we have not replied as completely as we had expected to, and I wanted to convey that information to Senator Doody.

THE ECONOMY

NEWFOUNDLAND—CORNER BROOK—ANNOUNCED CLOSURE OF BOWATER PULP AND PAPER MILL

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I have a delayed answer to questions asked by Senator Marshall on December 2, 1982, concerning the announced layoffs by Bowater Corporation in Newfoundland. The answer is fairly long. If it is agreed, perhaps the answer could be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The present state of the worldwide pulp and paper industry is seriously depressed. Nationally, mills are operating at reduced capacity and experiencing varying periods of down time. United Kingdom and European markets are particularly soft for Canadian producers especially in light of the devaluation of the Swedish krona. In Newfoundland, the outcome of this international marketing situation was a public announcement on December 1, 1982, that the Bowater newsprint mill in Corner Brook, Newfoundland, was eliminating 746 jobs in the mill and in the woodlands operations.

As reported to departmental officials, the international Bowater organization decided to remove 150,000 tonnes of its annual production capacity for newsprint from the market and obtain cost savings in the process. Following analysis, the board of the parent corporation in London, England, decided to close down the No. 7 paper machine at Bowater Newfoundland Limited in Corner Brook, Newfoundland. No. 7 paper machine was determined to be the least economically efficient unit in Bowater's North American operation. The BNL mill is also the one operation, most of whose output was destined to non-North American markets. The decision is stated by Bowater officials to be fixed until the BNL markets recover in three years or more.

The company claims that, although 750 jobs will be lost, 1,750 jobs will be made more secure by the corporate actions. Without cost cutting, the entire mill operation might have to be terminated. BNL officials indicated that following the necessary reorganization, the company's intention is to complete a modernization program including the conversion to thermomechanical pulping as markets and capital expenditure budgets allow.

The existing incentive agreement was developed in consultation with BNL in the 1981-82 fiscal year and ratified in July 1982. The company acknowledges that the contract is now invalid. The company does not now expect to receive incentive grants towards the modernization program originally identified in the agreement as the planned program and commitments have been cancelled.

Although the decision to discontinue the program is disappointing, the department is prepared to consider ways to assist the company in future modernization programs designed to improve viability.

An assistance program for Bowater Mersey mill at Liverpool, Nova Scotia, is proceeding as planned. Since the Mersey plant, through joint ownership with a United States publisher, enjoys an assured market for about one-third of its output, continuation of the assistance is consistent with the aims of the national pulp and paper program.

Employment and Immigration Canada has held discussions with management and the unions in Corner Brook. A joint consultative committee of labour and management is expected to be set up under the Manpower Consultative Services program of EIC. The company has agreed to cooperate in the operation of the committee and EIC officials are presently working out the details in Corner Brook.

A committee of municipal, labour and business interests is being established in Corner Brook to consider the impact of the Bowater problem and to seek alternative development-employment opportunities. When organized, the committee is to contact departmental officials in Newfoundland for discussions. Departmental officials have already met with the mayor and the chairman of the Economic Development Committee of the municipal council. The first priority being pursued by council, external to the Bowater shutdown, is likely to be a study of the development potential associated with a new marine transportation container service between Corner Brook, Halifax, Montreal and Labrador. The department will be participating in the study and other development opportunities identified by the council or through its own initiatives.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR, VETERANS, SPOUSES OF DECEASED VETERANS—COMPENSATION

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on November 4 concerning the rates of compensation under the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, the amount of allowable exemptions for casual earnings for the purpose of War Veterans Allowance and the rate of widows' pensions payable under the Pension Act.

I have an answer of some 10 or 11 paragraphs which I would be prepared to have appear in Hansard as read, if that is agreeable.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

As you know, the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act became law on April 1, 1976. Compensation is paid to veterans who were prisoners of war of other powers, for example, Germany, Italy, Korea for three months or more but less than 18 months, at the 10 per cent rate; for 18 months or more but less than 30 months, at the 15 per cent rate; and for 30 months or more, at the 20 per cent rate. These percentage amounts relate to the amounts paid for pensionable disabilities under the Pension Act, which carry similar assessment.

The present legislation was enacted by Parliament in an attempt to compensate former prisoners of war to some degree for the indignities, maltreatment, malnutrition, and permanent scars which resulted from their imprisonment, and in particular on the basis that there could be some residual disability that might not be recognized in such a way as to be pensionable under the terms of the Pension Act.

It is a well-known fact that conditions in prisoner-of-war camps varied greatly. In some camps conditions were much worse than in others. In arriving at a formula for compensation, however, Parliament was only able to provide an overall benefit based on length of incarceration. It did not consider that individuals or groups, such as Dieppe veterans, could be singled out for special benefits. The only exceptions are those incarcerated by the Japanese. It has been accepted that those imprisoned by the Japanese suffered far more permanent and damaging effects during captivity than did those incarcerated by other powers. For this reason Parliament legislated different rates for that group. It is felt that the rates for the time periods stated above are fair and equitable, and there are no plans to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act at this time.

The amounts of allowable exemptions for casual earnings for War Veterans Allowance purposes, last adjusted in 1980, are set out in the War Veterans Allowance Regulations. It is the responsibility of the War Veterans Allowance Board to advise the minister respecting these regulations. The chairman of this board is currently reviewing the provisions for exemptions of casual earnings, and the board will provide me with their recommendations shortly.

Finally, I would like to respond to the question concerning the amount of pension payable to the spouse of a deceased disability pensioner. As the legislation now stands, a full widow's pension is awarded to the surviving spouse of a veteran whose death was attributable to service, or if he was or should have been in receipt of a disability pension at the rate of 48 per cent or more at the time of his death. The full widow's pension rate is 75 per cent of the pension paid to a 100 per cent unmarried disability pensioner, or $682.85 per month. The 100 per cent disability pension rate for an unmarried pensioner is $910.46 per month.

The pension legislation was not designed to provide greater benefits to the survivor than to the pensioner who actually served in the Armed Forces. Notwithstanding this, some surviving spouses actually do receive more pension than was paid during the pensioner's lifetime. These are the widows of veterans who were in receipt of disability pension at the rate of 50 and 55 per cent. The 50 per cent married rate is $596.04 per month and the 55 per cent married rate is $625.94 per month.

There are no plans at the present time to amend the Pension Act with regard to the formula used to compute the rates of survivors' pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS

SUSPENSION OF RULES 44, 45 AND 78—NOTICE OF MOTION

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, December 16, 1982, I will move that until adjournment on December 22, 1982, rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended insofar as they relate to public bills received from the House of Commons.

The motion itself will be debated tomorrow. However, I am prepared to give an explanation of why I am giving notice of that motion, so honourable senators may give it some thought before the item is called under "Motions" tomorrow.

Yesterday I told honourable senators of the plan for the Senate to sit today at 2 p.m., tomorrow, Thursday, at 2 p.m., and perhaps on Friday at either 11 a.m. or 2 p.m. The Senate would then sit again on Monday either at 2 p.m. or 8 p.m., and also on Tuesday and Wednesday of next week at 2 p.m. The Senate is then scheduled to adjourn on December 22.

Senator Flynn and Senator Roblin raised doubts about whether there would be sufficient business to justify the Senate's sitting on Friday of this week. Following discussion in the chamber between them and the Leader of the Government, it was agreed that we would wait for more precise information about legislation that might be received in the intervening period. On the basis of business now being dealt with in the other place, it seems at the moment that we are unlikely to receive sufficient legislation to justify our sitting on Friday. As a corollary to that, however, we might very well receive at least three bills next week and there are also two Senate bills on the order paper, Bill S-30 and Bill S-31.

● (1415)

Senator Flynn: Not Bill S-31, but it is coming.

Senator Frith: That is quite right. Bill S-31 has a rather unusual status on the order paper because debate on second reading is suspended while we are awaiting the committee's report.

After discussions with the Leader of the Opposition and his deputy, we decided to ask the Senate, if it does not sit on Friday, to agree to sit on Monday at 2 o'clock, on Tuesday at 2 o'clock and on Wednesday at 2 o'clock, and to suspend the application of certain rules respecting notice for second and third reading of public bills so that their passage may be accelerated.

Honourable senators will notice that the motion refers to bills received from the other place. Bill S-30 and Bill S-31 do not fall within that category. We hope to deal with both of those bills also next week.

I should also advise honourable senators that one other item we may want to deal with before we adjourn is a motion for the establishment of a joint Senate and House of Commons committee. You will hear more about that tomorrow, leaving you plenty of time to think about it over the weekend.

In summary, we are looking at three bills, and perhaps more, from the other place, Bill S-30 and Bill S-31, and the motion to which I have just referred. In any event, this motion of which I am giving notice applies only to legislation received between now and next Wednesday, and tomorrow I will also move that when the Senate adjourns it will stand adjourned until next Monday at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SETTLEMENT OF GRAIN HANDLERS' STRIKE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition will be delighted to know that I am going to ask a question of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Hon. Lowell Murray: We knew.

Senator Buckwold: It is about time since I have not done so for a little while.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Is it a planted question?

Senator Buckwold: In any case, I would like the Senate brought up to date on what has happened as a result of the settlement of the grain handlers' strike.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. I regret to inform Senator Buckwold that Question Period has ended.

Senator Buckwold: I thought we were still on Question Period.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We had agreed that we would have a short Question Period, but if the Leader of the Government is willing to give you leave, that is fine as far as we are concerned.

Senator Buckwold: It is not too late for the planting season and I will be glad to wait until we have a longer Question Period.

Senator Flynn: Give it time to grow.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It is unfair to the minister because he has brought his music and is ready to go.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION BILL

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the subject matter of Bill S-31, to limit shareholding in certain corporations. I ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

REFORM OF THE SENATE

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Monday next, December 20, 1982, I will move:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon ways by which the Senate of Canada could be reformed in order to strengthen its role in representing people from all regions of Canada and to enhance the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country;

That the Committee include in its final report recommendations concerning the method of selection, powers, length of term for Senators, distribution of seats and other matters that the Committee considers relevant to the reform of the Senate;

That 8 Senators, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as it may deem advisable or necessary;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the quorum of the Committee be 10 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Committee be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever 5 members are present, so long as both Houses are represented;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee present its final report no later than December 1, 1983; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose and to select, if the House of Commons deems advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Could the Leader of the Government tell us if any consideration has been given to appointing a joint committee on the reform of the House of Commons?

Senator Olson: The formal answer is that the government has not given any consideration to that. However, I have heard up and down these corridors and in several rooms that some consideration should be given to that.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Is there a time limit for the return of the report?

Senator Olson: Yes, December 1, 1983.

Hon. Jack Marshall: As a supplementary to Senator Macdonald's question: When the other place established a committee to study the reform of the House of Commons, members of the Senate were not asked to sit on that committee. When Senator Frith says that any changes to the Senate should be instituted in the Senate, why are we asking members of the House of Commons to consider Senate reform? We are the ones who should debate Senate reform, not the members of the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on the aspect of Senator Marshall's question referring to my intervention on Senate reform, I stated that members of the Senate should be the leaders in Senate reform, but I made it quite clear that any reform requiring constitutional amendments would need, in accordance with the amending formula, a resolution of the Senate, of the House of Commons, and of the provincial legislatures.

That is why I am so pleased to support this motion. We are the ones who have introduced the motion. We are going to ask the members of the House of Commons to concur in that motion rather than the other way around.

Senator Olson: As it appears that several senators wish to ask questions on this topic, I would be more than pleased to answer all inquiries on Monday of next week. To this point the questions seem to be matters of opinion and submissions of argument. At any rate, I will be more than pleased to answer all inquiries on this subject on Monday.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, if I heard the leader's reading of the proposed motion correctly, he referred to the hiring of staff for "clerical and stenographic purposes." If the committee is to do its work properly, it is obvious that it will require highly competent professional staff in addition to clerical and stenographic staff. If this is not already provided for in the motion, would the leader consider it before the motion is dealt with by the Senate?

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, authority is sought to hire competent clerical and stenographic staff, but the motion does not identify individuals. If the staff of the Senate cannot supply those needs, perhaps we should consider hiring additional staff.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question by way of clarification. By the use of the words "joint committee" is it intended that an equal number of members of both houses be named to this committee? We are aware that there have been joint committees where that has not been the case. If the role of the Senate is the subject being studied, the committee should not have a predominant number of members from the House of Commons; the membership should be at least equal.

Senator Olson: The number of eight members from this house is mentioned in the motion. I am not sure that it is the practice to put in the motion the number of members from the House of Commons. However, there are approximately three times as many members of the House of Commons as there are members of this house.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: What has that to do with it?

• (1410)

Senator Olson: It has quite a lot to do with it insofar as traditional practice, to which Senator Manning referred, is concerned. I also understand that part of his question where it is dealing with the Senate more specifically and, therefore, perhaps some change from the traditional balance between the numbers on the committee. Of course, that is a matter for the House of Commons to decide, and if it is a number that is disproportionate in our view, then we would discuss that with them. At the moment, we are thinking perhaps in terms of about ten from the House of Commons.

Senator Marshall: Is the Leader of the Government going to consider placing on the committee independent members of the Senate?

Hon. Martial Asselin: We are all independent.

Senator Olson: I believe that the distribution will be done in the long-tested and traditional manner. In other words, there will be a number from the government side and a number from the opposition side.

Senator Marshall: I have a final question. Does the introduction of this motion mean that all references to an elected Senate, or anything having to do with that matter, will be removed from the order paper until this committee meets?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we are getting into a debate that ought to take place on Monday afternoon when the motion is moved. On Monday this motion will be moved when "Motions" is called. I shall be asking honourable senators to agree to having it brought forward and moved as the first item on Monday afternoon, after we have gone through the other routine proceedings before the Orders of the Day are called.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, it is a well-known practice that in any deliberative chamber you endeavour to point out improprieties as soon as possible. I am wondering if those who are responsible for this suggestion have recalled that in all bicameral legislatures most of us can think of, each house is the master—I suppose I should now say "is the mistress" as well—of its own proceedings. This is a fundamental knockdown of that idea respecting which the honourable leader has just said, "Oh, yes, we will have so many from the other house because they have more members, and there are to be fewer from here because we are fewer." That is an entirely facetious, improper, irregular and dangerous argument. I wonder whether this has been considered. He will not find in the records of this Parliament any such procedure whereby you invoke the aid of someone else to help in the joint destruction of your own chamber.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I accept that as Senator Macquarrie's opinion. I will be prepared to deal with it completely and, I am convinced, adequately to his satisfaction on Monday afternoon during the debate.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, does the leader require leave for his motion?

Senator Olson: No, I am just giving notice.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, I do not want to belabour the point, but from what the government leader said I understand he will be discussing this proposal with the other place. It seems to me that it would avoid some complications later on if the government in this house could agree to the concept of equal representation, and invite the other place to name an equal number to serve with members of this house on the committee. What I am concerned about is that if we leave this open to the other place to decide, they may very properly, in the light of past experience and for the reasons stated by the honourable leader—that is, the very much larger number of members in the other place—readily conclude that they should name more than the number proposed by this chamber.

• (1415)

I would not like to see this chamber put in the position where it then has to go back to the other place and say, "No, that is not acceptable," assuming that were the judgment of this chamber. It would be so much simpler if there could be a general agreement now that, in light of the subject matter of the inquiry, it would be appropriate for this chamber to invite the other house to name at least an equal number of representatives to sit on the committee rather than having them name more and then getting into a long, drawn-out argument as to whether there should be more or less. I am merely trying to avoid problems which may arise down the road.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I appreciate what the honourable senator has said and, of course, his remarks are recorded and will be available to those in the other place before they move a motion specifying the number. However, as I said a few moments ago, I would prefer not to get into a debate because a very significant argument can be put, which would be acceptable to most honourable senators, that there should be slightly more members from the House of Commons than from the Senate. I want to make that argument on Monday afternoon.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Can my honourable friend tell us when notice will be given of this motion in the other place? Is it being given there this afternoon, or when will it be done?

Senator Olson: I cannot say categorically that notice will not be in the House of Commons today. What I think will happen is that the motion, having been initiated here, will be debated in this chamber and, when we have concluded the debate or passed the motion, the traditional message will be sent to the other place inviting them to join with us. That will form the notice they will receive, but they probably know by now that we have already initiated it here and have included a paragraph inviting them to join with us.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think it is rather important that we should have a clear assurance from the honourable gentleman that the motion will not be proceeded with in the other place until we have debated it. It seems to me that the debate on Monday will be significant in developing important points such as those raised by Senator Manning. The point raised by Senator Macquarrie will also have to be considered. It seems to me that, before any invitations to the House of Commons are issued in respect of this matter, there should be a full debate and a decision made in this chamber.

I ask my honourable friend if he can give an assurance that we will have an opportunity to debate this matter and make up our own minds about it before any invitation is extended to, or action is taken by, the other place.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that argument is recorded, but I cannot give an assurance that the House of Commons will not introduce a motion; they are in charge of their own affairs. I suppose they could introduce it today or at any time when it is appropriate to give notice of motion. However, I can give my friend an assurance on the third part of his question, and that is that the House of Commons will not be invited to unite with us in this committee study until the motion is adopted in this chamber, although the House of Commons has notice of it as of now.

Senator Roblin: I regret that my honourable friend cannot be more precise, because this resolution, of which he has given notice today, is a most important one. It affects the future of this chamber. It seems reasonable to me that we should have full opportunity to express our own views and come to our own conclusions before the matter is handed over to the other place for consideration.

I would suggest to my honourable friend that he would make many of us feel much easier about this motion if we were assured that we were going to be able to have our say, discuss proposals for changes in the motion, and make our decision, whatever it might be, before it gets out of our control and into the other place. Would my honourable friend be kind enough to assure us that we are going to be able to come to our own conclusions in this matter before it is dealt with elsewhere?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what Senator Roblin has said I think is what is going to happen, but that is not the question he has asked me. That is my unfortunate problem. That formed part of the first and third questions.

The second question was: Could I assure him that it would not be introduced in the House of Commons before it is passed here? I think it is quite obvious that I cannot give him that assurance. As to the scenario that he has just outlined, I firmly believe that is the way it is going to be.

● (1420)

Senator Roblin: I see my honourable friend's point. He cannot commit the other house any more than they can commit this one, and I agree with that. I say to him, however, that we rely on him to use his influence, status and counsel in protecting the interests of this house with respect to the matter. He has not yet told me that he is going to go to bat for us. That is what I am asking him to do. Will he go to bat for us so that we can see our way clear in this matter and come to our own conclusions before it is placed before the other chamber?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I thought—I suppose innocently—that it was well known in every corner of this house that I do go to bat for every senator any time that needs to be done. However, if Senator Roblin does not feel confident in this regard, I will again reassure him.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, in light of the fact that from time immemorial one of the parties in the other place is known to have had a policy in favour of abolishing the Senate, I ask the Leader of the Government: Where is the need or the justification for involving members of the other place in this matter? It would seem that, by doing so, we are at a disadvantage right off the bat. Why don't you think a little bit before making decisions?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we have long argued that the Senate is part of the Parliament of Canada. By the same token, the House of Commons is part of the Parliament of Canada. Therefore, if action is to be taken on this matter, it must involve both houses. That is why we believe it would be wise to have a joint committee.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, through the questioning of my colleagues it appears clear, as I suspected, that the initiative lies with this house rather than with the House of Commons. I wonder if it has occurred to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that it might have been thoughtful, proper and courteous to allow this house to dispose of items 2 and 3 on the order paper, which clearly deal with the format and structure of this place?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, items 2 and 3 have appeared on the order paper for a number of months, providing an opportunity for any honourable senator who has a view on the subject matters contained in those items to make his views known. It seems to me that it is logical, sensible and completely in accord with some of the views that have been expressed while those items have been under consideration to follow with a substantive motion, which is what I gave notice of earlier today.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, regardless of the antiquity of items 2 and 3, I should nevertheless like to ask the government leader whether it would not have been more proper and courteous to allow the Senate to exhaust its views on these matters? What is the hurry?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think substantive action by way of this motion, in view of the enlightening and intelligent debates that have taken place, is the most pragmatic and useful way to proceed.

Senator Macquarrie: The honourable senator has no idea what glorious enlightenment may still be before him on those items. He and I have yet to deliver our views.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, Order No. 3 stands in my name. The reason I have not yet spoken to it is that I have been waiting for the third chapter of the wisdom of Senator Frith, which will probably be delivered today.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there is no third chapter.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: What you've seen and what you've read is what you get, on those items.

I wonder if we can assume that the debate on the notice of motion is concluded. If so, I will introduce another notice of motion.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, may I be permitted a question? Since we are nearing the end of this session, what is the urgency of setting up this committee?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we believe that it is useful to pass this motion in this chamber early next week, and to give the House of Commons a chance to pass it as well, so that a great deal of useful work can be done immediately following that to get the committee under way. We know that there could be a prorogation, but it is easy to reconstitute everything.

● (1425)

Senator Marshall: You will never get unanimous consent.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, this has been one of the fullest debates on a notice of motion that I have heard. However, it was appropriate, because it has given us an opportunity to get at least the first reaction of many of our colleagues to this motion. I am sure it will stimulate interesting debate when the motion is moved on Monday.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: It is a matter of life and death.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEES AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the hope that everything goes as planned and that we adjourn on December 22, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

The reason for the motion is that I believe all other committees have authority to sit during adjournments of the Senate. However, the two committees I have mentioned do not. In case those committees wish to sit during the period from December 22 to January 17, or the date when we return, I am suggesting that we give them the same authority as the other committees have to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS
LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEES AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a):

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at three-fifteen o'clock, and the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at four-forty-five o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday next, 21st December, 1982, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to explain the reason for this motion. First, I apologize to His Honour because the piece of paper with the motion on it includes some scribbling of mine which I have done in the last two or three minutes as a result of conversations with the Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Allan MacEachen, has for some time had an appointment to appear next Tuesday afternoon before the Foreign Affairs Committee in our study of Canada's relations with the Middle East. As honourable senators are no doubt aware, it is difficult to make arrangements for a busy minister to appear before a committee, particularly on such a difficult and complicated subject. At this point in our study the minister's appearance would be most appropriate.

I fully appreciate that when the Senate is sitting committees dealing with legislation must have priority. The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, under the chairmanship of Senator Neiman, had planned to meet next Tuesday afternoon at 4.30 p.m., which would also require the concurrence of the Senate if the Senate was then sitting. I spoke with her and we agreed that, if honourable senators concurred, I would move the time of my meeting forward by 15 minutes, to 3.15 p.m., and she would move the time of her meeting back by 15 minutes, to 4.45 p.m. We also agreed that I would give an undertaking to honourable senators that the Foreign Affairs Committee would not sit for more than an hour and a half, so that it would adjourn before her committee meeting began. Consequently, the two committee meetings would not overlap and be sitting at the same time as the Senate.

With that explanation, I am moving a revised motion which contains part of my original motion together with some handwritten additions, which I will explain to His Honour afterwards so that they can be properly interpreted in the record.

In any event, the adoption of this motion would result in our committee's not having to put off the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs on Tuesday afternoon and would enable the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to deal with the bill now before it. As I say, the two committees would not be sitting at the same time and while the Senate might be sitting.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a companion motion to the motion you have just heard. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs also wants to meet at 4 o'clock on Monday afternoon. So I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a):

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon on Monday, 20th December, 1982, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC BILLS

SUSPENSION OF RULES 44, 45, 78(4) AND 78(5)

Leave having been given to proceed to Motion No. 2:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Wednesday, December 15, 1982, moved:

> That until the Senate adjourns on December 22, 1982, Rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended insofar as they relate to public bills received from the House of Commons.

He said: This motion simply asks honourable senators to suspend rules 44, 45 and 78 which deal with the amount of notice necessary between the second and third reading of public bills received from the House of Commons between now and the adjournment of the Senate on December 22, 1982.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my honourable friend was good enough to let us know what he had in mind here. We have no objection in principle to giving up the notice procedure on these bills. However, I would draw to his attention a minor point in connection with rule 78. That rule deals with more than merely the question of notice. Subsections (4) and (5) deal with notice, whereas subsections (2) and (3), for instance, do not. Subsection (2) provides that a report presented to the Senate shall be received without debate. Abrogating that particular subsection could technically make it possible for some of these bills to be debated at that stage. I wonder if my honourable friend has anything in particular in mind in stipulating that the entire rule 78 be suspended, instead of merely referring to subsections (4) and (5), which deal with the question of notice?

Senator Frith: That is a very good point. The reason that rule 78 was included was that we might very well send a bill to committee. However, as Senator Roblin has pointed out, we would want rule 78(1), (2)—

Senator Roblin: —and subsection (3).

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): And subsection (4).

Senator Frith: I suppose if we sent any of these bills to committee we would want those three subsections as well as subsection (4).

Senator Roblin: I suggest to my honourable friend that all he need do in order to get what he wants is suspend subsections (4) and (5) of rule 78. They are the two subsections dealing with notice. The rest of that rule does not deal with notice at all. If, for example, subsection (2) were suspended, I might feel like debating the report, which is forbidden under rule 78; and I advise the honourable senator not to tempt me.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I, like Satan, will get behind Senator Roblin and be behind him on his suggestion, which is absolutely correct. It seems to me that the only subsections of rule 78 that we need suspend are those dealing with notice, and they are subsections (4) and (5).

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: Since my honourable friend cannot amend his own motion, I will oblige him by moving an amendment for him.

Accordingly, honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Marshall:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the number "78" and by substituting therefor "78(4) and (5)".

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

[Senator Frith.]

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g):

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, 20th December, 1982, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Perhaps it is too early to say, but can the Leader of the Government tell us if it is proposed to proceed with Bill S-31 on Monday?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if we deal with it, it will not be the first item of business. It may be that we will reach it later in the afternoon or, if we decide to adjourn for the dinner hour and resume on Monday evening, perhaps some time after 8 p.m.

Senator Deschatelets: To be more precise, is it the intention of the Leader of the Government to take this bill to third reading before the adjournment?

Senator Olson: No, it is not. The government does not intend to proceed with Bill S-31 past second reading in this session.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if we do not receive any other bills on Monday, the first orders will be Bill S-30 and Bill S-31, but, as Senator Olson has indicated, if we decide to debate those, it is likely that it will be some time later in the day rather than early. In the event that we wish to put them off until the evening, we will ask for the agreement of the Senate.

Just to mention one other item of business, honourable senators, I should point out that Royal Assent is planned for this evening at 5.45 p.m.

Senator Deschatelets: If I may return to the previous matter for a moment, assuming that both sides of the chamber co-operated and there was sufficient time, would it be your intention to give third reading to Bill S-31?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as the Honourable André Ouellet stated in committee, and as I have expressed here on several occasions, it is not our intention to take the bill past the stage where we can receive amendments to it. In other words, we want to give it second reading and refer it to committee, because we are prepared to accept a number of amendments to the bill, but we do not want to go beyond that stage until some time after January 17.

As you know, there is some legal question involved here, and not everyone is in agreement on the principle of the matter. Consequently, it is our intention to maintain between sessions the status of the November 3 date with respect to which voting rights can be purchased through equity by provinces or provincial agencies.

Senator Deschatelets: May we assume, then, that the government intends to let this bill die on the order paper? Yes or no?

Senator Olson: The answer is yes, but it is rather involved, because it depends on how long it is before we have prorogation. If the session goes on for a few weeks, that is one thing; but if we have prorogation and a new session begins within one or two weeks after January 17, it is our intention to let the bill die on the order paper.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State in charge of the Wheat Board. A couple of days ago I unsuccessfully addressed a question to him about the Crow. I pointed out that he had been advertised as being the author of a compromise solution with respect to the various interests debating the Crow in western Canada, and I asked him if he would "fess up"—if he would confess his authorship and let us know exactly what he said.

At that time Senator Argue did not give me any information, but I now draw to his attention that the Alberta Wheat Pool has issued a press release in which it deals with the very question. It passed the following resolution:

> That the Argue proposal is worthy of further consideration by Alberta Wheat Pool as an alternative to the related Gilson proposals.

My question to the minister is: What is the Argue proposal?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): The honourable senator questioned me about this some time ago and I replied that I had not taken any detailed proposal to anybody when I was out west some weeks ago speaking to those various conventions. So there was no detailed proposal given. I did suggest that, if they wanted to depart from the Gilson proposal, they should decide whether they were prepared to pay additional freight rates, and, if so, on what basis; and, if they were prepared to do so, whether they would accept the end result of the Gilson proposal, that being a division by 1990-91 of the costs equally between the grain producers and the government. There was no detailed proposal at all. I talked in general terms, and whatever I said was made in public. The press were there at all times.

● (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Perhaps they did not print it.

Senator Argue: I don't know whether they did, but they certainly printed the remarks I made in Regina, and I made virtually the same speech to each of the three pools. If they want to take something that is rather precise from the remarks I made, I suppose that is up to them. As I said, I made no detailed proposals to them.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, that is a completely unsatisfactory answer. Must I write to the Alberta Wheat Pool to determine what the minister told them? Surely not. The Alberta Wheat Pool, in a press release, deals with the five principles which it says were incorporated in the minister's address. The Alberta Wheat Pool was in favour of those principles, so my honourable friend need not be modest or diffident. I might be in favour of them if I only knew what the proposals were. Must I write to the Alberta Wheat Pool that Senator Argue would not tell me what his proposals were when I asked him in the Senate? Must I ask the Alberta Wheat Pool what it is Senator Argue said that they are in favour of?

The minister has a duty to tell us what his proposals were, and if they are as good as the Alberta Wheat Pool thinks they are, I would be prepared to look upon them favourably.

Senator Argue: Would the honourable senator send me the publication he is talking about? It would assist me in knowing what the Alberta Wheat Pool said I said.

Senator Roblin: I would be pleased to do so, but I would like the minister to come clean. What did he say to the Alberta Wheat Pool that is so good? I go to the source for information; I do not want to go to the Alberta or Saskatchewan wheat pools to know what the minister said. I want the minister to tell us what he told them that was so good.

Senator Argue: I don't know what I said to them that was so good. I don't know that anything I said to them was that good, but I am pleased to note that they took it as being that good.

The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool sent me a partial transcript of my remarks, and I agree with the transcript. They told me that the transcript was made from a tape of my remarks. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool transcript says, "Senator Argue, you were in favour of the Crow in the past and that there should never be any negotiations." I told them that the words "non negotiable" were not my words, but I went on to say that I thought the debate had arrived at the stage where it was not a question of whether there was going to be an additional contribution from the producers, or whether there was not going to be a contribution. I told them that they should decide among themselves whether or not they would be prepared to pay more, and, if so, under what conditions. I then posed to them a number of questions,—what could be called suggestions—to see what their response would be. They did not respond definitively to those suggestions because they had not considered them. I asked them how much they were prepared to pay and whether they were prepared to pay earlier. I also asked them whether they would be prepared to accept the 50-50 sharing arrangement by 1990-91 that Gilson suggested as a final conclusion; that is, whether they were prepared to pay half the compensatory rate in the future. I asked whether they wanted a cap on it related to wheat prices or whether it should be related to any alternative proposal.

As I said, I did not take any papers with me to those meetings and I made no definitive proposals. I spoke off the cuff then, as I am doing now.

Senator Roblin: The minister is a remarkable man. He does not know what he told them; he cannot remember what he told them; he has no record of what he told them.

Senator Argue: The record is there.

Senator Roblin: Where is it? If you have received a transcript, I would appreciate seeing it.

Senator Argue: It is a one-page transcript, but I do not have it with me today. I make many speeches. When Senator Roblin speaks off the cuff in the Senate he does not have a copy of his remarks, yet a record is being made. That is the difference. I might have been asked 10 or 15 questions at each of those meetings, but I did not carry a transcript of each answer with me, and even if I did, I would not have read it.

Senator Roblin: I will not pursue this much longer. I will take my honourable friend off the hook. Even though he is a minister of the Crown, even though he is expected to announce government policy when speaking on such matters, or, if not announcing government policy, at least floating trial balloons which reflect government thinking, and even if he cannot remember what he has said and does not have any record of what he has said that he is willing to stand by, somehow or other 70 delegates of the Alberta Wheat Pool, meeting on December 2 last, debated the issue and resolved that the "Argue proposals are worthy of further consideration."

The minister cannot remember what those proposals were, or will not tell me what they were. I will not ask him any further questions on this but will write to the President of the Alberta Wheat Pool, Mr. A. J. Macpherson, and tell him that, "although I am an appointed representative of the people of my province dealing with ministers of the Crown, I am unable to obtain answers from such ministers, so please tell me what the Argue proposals were."

Hon. C. William Doody: Will you then let the minister know what he said?

Senator Roblin: Only if he asks nicely.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LAW OF THE SEA TREATY—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that the Law of the Sea Treaty was signed by over 100 countries on December 6 in Jamaica, is it the intention of the leader to table that treaty so that members of the Senate could be made aware of its conditions?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thought I had certain information with me in anticipation of a question about this treaty, but I realize now that I do not. I shall take the question as notice.

Senator Marshall: If it was not the intention of the Leader of the Government to table that treaty in this chamber, could that be done so that senators could be made aware of its contents?

Senator Olson: I will make inquiries on that and be as helpful as I can.

GRAIN

AVAILABILITY OF FIRST GRADE WHEAT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Hon. Jack Marshall: We will get an answer now.

Senator Molgat: Due to an early frost in the west this year a substantial amount of grain was damaged and, therefore, the grade was substantially reduced. Could the minister tell us what the situation is with regard to the lower grade grain? Is it moving or clogging up the system? Will there be enough first grade wheat to meet our commitments?

• (1500)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, as Senator Molgat has just said, there was a severe frost in western Canada towards the end of August. Out of a crop of approximately 27 million tonnes of wheat, about 20 per cent, or 5 million tonnes, is likely to grade as Canada feed wheat. That is a tremendous quantity of feed wheat that the Canadian Wheat Board will endeavour to market.

Senator Molgat also asked whether or not we have enough high grade wheat on hand to meet our sales commitments for that grade. We have ample supplies of high grade wheat to meet all sales obligations undertaken.

The Canadian Wheat Board realizes that today feed grain is in large supply in the world, particularly because of the corn crop in the United States which is somewhere in the order of 8 billion bushels. Therefore, the merchandising of Canada feed barley and Canada feed wheat is a real challenge. We are very fortunate to have the Wheat Board system in operation, and I think it is doing an outstanding job—almost a miraculous job—in obtaining sales for Canadian grain in very large quantities.

The Canada feed grade into which the 20 per cent of the frosted wheat will go constitutes a tremendous challenge. The Wheat Board has found that it can segregate the higher quality parts of the Canada feed grain in order to get a substantial part of that feed wheat into a quality of wheat that is marginally below No. 3 grade, which is a milling grade. Therefore, by accepting a slightly lower milling standard, it can make flour and bread, or by mixing it with a higher quality wheat it can make a very satisfactory bread.

The Wheat Board says that it is difficult to market wheat for milling purposes called Canada feed. If we were selecting names for our grading system that would make it difficult for us to sell our wheat, we really could not have done a more outstanding job. Even the No. 1 CW, which is our very high grade, does not have quite so much appeal to the ear as American No. 1 Dark Red Spring, although our grade is superior to that American grade of wheat.

The Canadian Wheat Board is taking this higher quality of the Canada feed grade and is special binning it, and is calling it Special Bin. They say that when they market not Canada feed but this improved quality of Canada feed now called Special Bin they are experiencing a great deal of interest in that grade and they believe they will have very substantial sales. They have had teams out endeavouring to obtain markets in South East Asia. They have sent these particular samples to 30 different countries, and representatives will be merchandising this wheat in an energetic way in the new year.

They also say that over the years they could market successfully this kind of wheat but they cannot be assured of the supply. It is only once in five or ten years that they get such an early frost, and then they have the problem of marketing a very low quality wheat. By Special Binning, they feel confident that they can merchandise substantial quantities.

In the meantime, because Canada feed wheat is concentrated in certain areas, it provides marketing problems, but there are quotas now in effect, and the grain is moving well both east and west, so that producers who only have Canada feed, while they cannot be that optimistic about moving it all, can look forward to moving substantial quantities.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

NATURAL GAS EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government, and I appreciate that he may have to take it as notice. Has the government received any communication or representation from the Government of the United States with respect to the renegotiation of any existing gas export contracts?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will make inquiries in order to ascertain if a formal request has been made to renegotiate those prices. I do not know whether that has happened. I know that it has been the subject of some statements by a number of people in the United States, particularly by members of Congress, so I am sure that they are well aware of it.

Senator Hastings: As a supplementary, if there is any document available, would the government leader undertake, subject to the usual approval, to table it in the Senate?

Senator Olson: Yes, I will seek to have it tabled in the Senate.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. In view of the recent allegations that Canada is both a haven and a heaven for traitors and foreign spies, especially since the conviction of Hugh Hambleton in England, can the leader inform us why the government is not implementing recommendations of the McDonald Commission such as coming forth with a new act replacing the Official Secrets Act and the establishment of a joint parliamentary committee on national security?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Haidasz is asking why the government is not responding to these recommendations. I shall take that question as notice and try to get a report on the status of what has happened with respect to that, and perhaps even some indication of what the government intends to do with those recommendations in the future.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act.

An Act to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof.

An Act to amend the National Housing Act (No. 2).

An Act respecting rebates of interest on farm loans made under the Farm Credit Act.

The Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1983.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 20, 1982, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 5191)

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL S-31, "AN ACT TO LIMIT SHAREHOLDING IN CERTAIN CORPORATIONS"

Thursday, December 16, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which the subject-matter of Bill S-31, entitled "An Act to Limit Shareholding in Certain Corporations" was referred for consideration and report, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Monday, November 8, 1982, examined the said subject-matter and now reports as follows:

Your Committee solicited the views of the ten Provincial Premiers on the subject matter of Bill S-31. A number of them responded to your Committee's invitation to appear before it or to send in written comments. The governments of British Columbia and Alberta sent your Committee formal representations while the governments of Saskatchewan, Ontario and Newfoundland indicated they preferred to express their views on an intergovernmental basis.

Your Committee heard representations from the following: The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs of Canada, the Minister of Finance of the Province of Quebec, the President of the Montreal Stock Exchange, the Chairman of Canadian Pacific Limited, the President of the Quebec Deposit and Investment Fund, the President of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and the Vice-President and Director General of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce.

As a result of these representations and its own analysis, your Committee draws certain areas of concern to the attention of the Senate.

The intent of Bill S-31 was stated by the Minister to be to preserve federal jurisdiction by preventing provinces from exercising extra-territorial jurisdiction in the transportation field, either directly or indirectly.

Bill S-31 as presently drafted extends to any company, either federally or provincially incorporated, which is engaged in extra-provincial transportation, even in a minor way as compared to the total range of its activities. It can therefore be characterized as being in essence legislation in relation to company law. This raises a question as to its constitutionality in respect of provincially incorporated companies.

More generally, the impact of Bill S-31 extends beyond the field of extra-provincial transportation to include a company whose activities in transportation, carried on directly or through another company it in fact controls, form only a minor part of its operations. Your Committee questions whether the Government should extend the application of this Bill so far. It therefore recommends that the Government define more clearly those types of enterprises to which it wishes Bill S-31 to apply so as to minimize the necessity of frequent recourse to the exemption procedures provided for in Section 6.

By virtue of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act (1954), the Federal Government delegated its regulatory powers in the field of extra-provincial motor vehicle transportation to the provinces. However, the present Bill applies to companies engaged in such motor vehicle transportation. In addition, the Bill extends to companies engaged in transportation by air and water. Your Committee was divided as to whether present legislation in these latter fields is adequate to protect federal jurisdiction from any exercise of extra-territorial jurisdiction by the provinces.

Bill S-31 restricts or eliminates voting rights attached to shares acquired by a provincial government or any of its agencies, after November 2, 1982. Your Committee was divided as to whether restrictions on voting rights, to the extent provided in this Bill, are necessary to achieve the stated objectives of Bill S-31.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

Monday, December 20, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HON. GEORGE I. SMITH

TRIBUTES

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, last night I passed before this building and noticed that the flag was at half mast. I would never have guessed that it was because of the death of our colleague Senator George Isaac Smith—what a shock!

Of Ike Smith it can be said without trace of exaggeration that he served his country in an exemplary fashion. When the need was for men to soldier, for men to protect freedom from the scourge of despotism, for men to defend their brothers from extreme political philosophies, Ike Smith volunteered his services. His contribution was such that Colonel Smith returned from combat one of the more highly decorated of Canadian servicemen.

From 1949 to 1970, Ike Smith served his country as a member of the Nova Scotia legislature. At various points in that career, he was Minister of Highways, Minister in charge of the Nova Scotia Power Commission, Minister of Finance and Economics, and, finally, from 1967 to 1970, Premier of the Province of Nova Scotia.

Here also the quality of the man's service was remarkable. He took over the province from Bob Stanfield, who had been premier for 11 years, but he took it over at the point when economic disaster was about to strike.

In late 1967, Dominion Steel and Coal closed the Sydney steel mill, throwing 3,000 people out of work. Premier Smith came to the rescue. With the spirit of decision that was characteristic of the man, Ike Smith immediately formed the Sydney Steel Corporation, a provincial crown corporation, which took over the plant and survives to this day. His handling of that crisis gleaned Ike Smith praise from all quarters, as did his handling of many other potential problems during that era.

He was faced with important decisions concerning coal mine closings, expensive government investments in faltering manufacturing endeavours, such as the heavy water plant at Glace Bay, and the need for higher taxes. He handled those problems as he did a multitude of others, with level-headed logic, incredible fortitude and a profound compassion for the suffering of others.

The soldier and politician, however, was first and foremost a lawyer. As a fellow lawyer, I cannot but marvel at such a lengthy and outstanding career in our profession. From what I have been told, his degree of competence and dedication were, in this calling, no less than in the other professions he chose to exercise in his life. Law, however, was his first love. This is what he prepared for as a young man and where I believe his heart really was. Politics and soldiering were careers undertaken out of necessity and his sense of responsibility. Law was an expression of love—love of order and love of justice.

In 1975, he was summoned to the Senate. It is since that time that I have come to know Ike Smith, the man. I have heard him described as plain-talking and hardworking. That is a photograph, not a painting. It accurately reproduces what Ike Smith was all about, but it fails to highlight those facets of his character most worthy of mention and emulation.

Certainly, he was a tireless worker. Most assuredly did he speak his mind at all times and with great knowledge and clarity of expression. He assumed for our side the burden of chairing a Senate committee while, at the same time, serving on several others. Always was he prepared for his responsibilities. Always was his homework done. And never did he duck whenever a request was made for someone to handle speaking chores in the chamber.

From my standpoint as Leader of the Opposition, he was an ideal caucus member. He could always be relied upon to make a highly informed and useful contribution. He had a brilliant mind, a fine sense of what is possible and appropriate, and sufficient courage and stamina to see him through the worst travails.

However, I will not have captured the essence of the man unless I tell you that he was one of the warmest, friendliest and mildest individuals I have ever met. One usually thinks of men whose careers have placed them in positions of having to make hard decisions, of having to direct others, of having to give orders in trying circumstances, as being men of action preoccupied with efficiency, with getting things done, and never overly concerned with the feelings of others.

Certainly, if that be the case with most leaders, then Ike Smith was an outstanding exception. I have rarely met a more pleasant man, a finer example of the old school of gentlemanliness. His interest in, and concern for, others was genuine. He loved people and always had time for them. He was approachable and ever willing to listen and give advice if it were sought.

We on this side of the house lose a friend and fellow warrior. He was a patriot and a partisan. He took his role as senator and member of the opposition caucus seriously, and carried out his duties with conviction.

And though he may have appeared tough to the government side with his thorny and relentless questioning of ministers, and his scathing denunciations of the government's shortcomings and misbehaviour, we knew him as a concerned Canadian with a great love of people, and will always remember him as such.

To his wife, Sally, to his family, and, indeed, to the people of Nova Scotia, I extend, on behalf of the opposition, our most heartfelt condolences. Personally I have lost a most helpful colleague. The Parliament of Canada has lost a member whom it will be difficult to replace. We all have lost a friend whom it will be impossible to replace.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the members on the government side of the house, I wish to say that it was with the deepest personal regret that I learned yesterday of the death of our colleague, Senator George Isaac Smith.

Senator Smith served his country with distinction in his several official capacities, which have been appropriately described by the Leader of the Opposition. As it was pointed out, he distinguished himself as a member of the legal profession, as a long-time member of the Legislature of Nova Scotia, as premier of his beloved province, and as a member of the Senate of Canada. As Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications he fought tenaciously for what he believed in. He earned the respect of both political friends and adversaries while, at the same time, demonstrating that hard work, integrity, warmth and candour are daunting weapons.

We in the Senate are particularly conscious of the fact that we have lost a friend, a great Canadian who brought dignity and honour to the political process. Our heartfelt condolences go out to Mrs. Smith and her family.

Honourable senators, I suggest that tomorrow we sit at 8 o'clock in the evening in order to allow those who wish to attend the funeral of the late Senator Smith in Truro. A special flight is being arranged to leave Ottawa tomorrow morning, weather permitting, and to return at around 6 p.m.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, for those of us who know Ike Smith well, it is difficult to speak of him in the past tense. It is hard, indeed, to realize that he will no longer be among us. Yet his death is a fact—a hard fact—which must be faced and, while we deplore his sudden passing, we are consoled by another fact, the fact that he led a very busy and useful life. It is well known, of course, that he had three careers which overlapped and it is astonishing that he found the time and the energy to be successful in all three.

Ike Smith was a brilliant lawyer. A lifelong student of law, he had a love of the law which he never lost. As well, he was a distinguished legal practioner. He had a large practice and he was known within the legal profession of Nova Scotia as a conscientious, successful and honourable member of that profession. While working as a busy lawyer he found the time to take an active part in the activities and deliberations of the Nova Scotia Barristers' Society and, indeed, served as its president.

We know that G. I. Smith served his country as a soldier in both times of peace and times of war. Active in the North Nova Scotia Highlanders, he served in Canada, the United Kingdom and Northwest Europe. Indeed, in 1945 he served in a high position at Canadian Military Headquarters in London, for which service he was awarded to O.B.E. After the war he continued his interest in the North Nova Scotia Highlanders, then called the Nova Scotia Highlanders, and found time to act as commanding officer in 1946 and 1949, and to serve as honorary colonel from 1967 to 1972. I would add that he took a deep and abiding interest in the welfare of all war veterans.

Perhaps, honourable senators, G. I. Smith is best known as a man in public life. He first ran as a candidate for the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia in 1949, and was successful. He ran six other times and was elected each time. From 1956 to 1967 he was a minister of the Crown in Nova Scotia and from 1967 to 1970 he was Premier of Nova Scotia. As a member of the assembly, a minister of the Crown and as premier he earned for himself the respect, admiration and affection of all Nova Scotians. As one who belongs to Cape Breton, I assure you he will always be remembered there with a deep sense of gratitude, for it was G. I. Smith who, in the final analysis, made the hard decision to have the Province of Nova Scotia acquire the Sydney steel plant when it was abandoned by its former owners without a thought for the employees. By acquiring the plant, G. I. Smith saved the economy of Cape Breton. The people of Cape Breton will feel a special sense of sadness at his passing.

Honourable senators, I do not mention his work here as a senator, as it has been well described by the two previous speakers. While a person can be judged by his accomplishments, and a judgment formed as to the kind of person he is, it is by such standards that G. I. Smith will be remembered as a hard working person, a dedicated public servant and a man of ability, devotion and duty.

● (1415)

Yet, honourable senators, I remember him better as a friend for many years. I know the kind of man he was. I knew him as a man of fine character, as a man of great personal charm, and as one who made lasting frienships. I knew him to be a man who had strong political, partisan conviction—in the best sense of that term; yet in all the years I knew him I never heard him, even in private conversation, utter a harsh or unkind word about a political opponent.

Senator Smith, as we in this chamber know, was a strenuous fighter, but despite that he has left behind him neither resentment nor enemies but, rather, a gracious memory of a fine person, one of high character who served his country well.

Those of us who enjoyed Senator Smith's personal friendship over the years valued it highly. We feel a deep sense of sadness at his passing. While we sympathize with his wife and family, we hope that their knowledge of the many other persons who share their grief is of some consolation to them at this time.

G. I. Smith was a great Nova Scotian, and Nova Scotia is the poorer for his passing.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I first knew G. I. Smith when he entered the Nova Scotia legislature in 1949. I had served in the legislature for the previous four years, and I continued to serve in it, with him on the opposite side of the house, for the succeeding 11 years. I think that from the beginning we were spirited antagonists; but I can say that in the best professional political sense.

G. I. Smith, as others have said, was hard-hitting, but he was forthright and he was totally honest. You always knew where you stood with him. I can say that not only from our years of political combat in the Nova Scotia legislature but also from the years when, subsequently, I was the president of Dalhousie University and had to deal with him, as the premier of the province, on educational matters. You always knew where you stood with G. I. Smith. He did not keep you straddling the fence or waiting for him to make up his mind.

I did not know Senator Smith as a lawyer or as a soldier, for our military years, although contemporaneous, did not cross in other respects; but I am glad to have listened to, and I endorse, the account the Honourable Senator Macdonald has given of him both as a lawyer and as a soldier. I am sure that the remarks Senator Macdonald made are well deserved and are not in any way exaggerated.

Senator Smith was a good administrator. We all know that when he was appointed to the Senate he assumed, almost instantly, a leading role, particularly on behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party which he represented so vigorously and so well.

He loosed many an arrow from the seat just to the left of me where he sat in this chamber. In politics, as you know—and I think this ought to be even more common than it is—many make friendships outside their own party affiliations, and I think that if we, as professional politicians, in the best sense of the term, are to discharge our duties, we ought to recognize that fact. I am glad, therefore, to say that I counted the late Senator G. I. Smith as one of my friends in politics, and I am sure, based on a conversation he and I had only a little while ago, that he would have said the same of me. We understood our respective roles; we understood the importance of them; we understood the importance of the work that politicians render to their country and to their constituencies.

Finally, honourable senators, I have always been particularly impressed by and, I think it not wrong to say, even fond of his wife Sally. She is a fine person and was a splendid supporter of his. I extend personally, and on behalf of many other friends of the late G. I. Smith in the Liberal Party, my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Smith for the loss she has suffered—a great loss to her but also a loss to the Province of Nova Scotia and to Canada.

● (1420)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in commemorating the life and work of the late Senator Smith, we recognize in him one of the brightest and best of the sons of Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia is a forcing house of Canadian political and economic talent; a province which has contributed so many Canadian leaders across this country.

Ike Smith was one who remained close to his native heath, and he soon displayed the qualities with which he had been endowed by the Creator in his approach to the challenges of life, in the professional field, in service during times of war, and also in the political arena. So, we may qualify him as one of the great Nova Scotians and an outstanding Canadian leader.

He was a bonny political fighter; he had a good, clean political cutting edge. On one occasion, which comes to mind, during a meeting of our caucus, when we were wondering what to do, he stiffened our spines and told us to go into battle and do what we thought was right; not to give up, but to perform our duty as best we could. That will remain with me as a memory of the capacity of the late Senator Smith to see his duty and to do it.

He was a delightful comrade; he was a man well furnished with ability, and had every instinct of the true gentleman, as members of the Senate had many opportunities to note. No matter how rough the battle had become, when warfare was over Ike Smith was a friend to those with whom he had just been conducting such vigorous debate and disputation. As I say, he had the instincts of a true gentleman, and I think that that is one of the characteristics which we will remember as being particularly attributable to him.

I join with those who have paid tribute to the late Senator Smith. I will always remember his contribution to the political life of Canada and, in particular, to that of his native province as member, cabinet minister and premier. I am happy to have been associated with him in the Senate. I hope that the knowledge that so many condole in their great bereavement will prove to be of some comfort to the family he leaves behind.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, as has been said, the death of Senator Smith came as a great shock to all of his friends and colleagues. In particular, his passing is a great loss to our native province of Nova Scotia.

In my judgment, he was one of the modern-day political giants of Nova Scotia. Indeed, his long and productive record of public service would be difficult to match.

In many ways Ike Smith was a complete politician. As has been said, he was also a distinguished soldier, cabinet minister, premier, representative and, I think especially and most importantly, servant of the people.

He will be especially missed today in the Senate of Canada where his wisdom, his wide experience, his sharp tongue, his wit, his eloquent debating skills and uncompromising principles made him one of the most respected of all our colleagues.

The province of Nova Scotia and the welfare of its people were first, last and always his chief public concern.

I think it worthy of note that when he was Premier of Nova Scotia he treated all parts of his province with fairness and equality, as evidenced by his quick and deliberate action during some of the early and most difficult days at Sydney Steel.

In every sense of the word, Senator Smith was a great Canadian.

● (1425)

Ike was a good personal friend. To his wife Sally, with whom I spoke yesterday, and to his children, I extend my deepest sympathy.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would not presume to attempt to paint the lily of the moving eloquence which has preceded me. I should like to say that, although I did not know Senator Smith as long as did Senator Macdonald, I have known him for a long time. As the years of our acquaintance progressed, I regarded him all the more highly. I looked upon him as a splendid parliamentary debater.

As I understand it, part of Senator Smith's background was what in Nova Scotia they call "the pre-loyalist stock", and true traditional Yankee values. He was a man who, in his language, was spare, sparse, clean and direct. If you read his speeches, or listened to them, you found very few flourishes. Everything was pared down to the essential, but, by jove, that essential was powerful, meaningful and convincing.

Someone referred to his years as a lawyer, and I am sure he must have been magnificent in that craft. I think of him not only as a great leader in his province—and Nova Scotians have paid just tribute to him—and in his region—I knew him when I was chairman of the Atlantic caucus of my party for a number of years—but also as a statesman of dominion status and stature.

I remember the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference. I was the only federal politician inside the rail because Premier Campbell of Prince Edward Island asked me to go along with him as an adviser. Senator Robichaud and Senator Manning were there, and I recall so well that Ike Smith, the then Premier of Nova Scotia, opened his remarks by saying, in reference to the Constitution, "We in Nova Scotia have a very high regard for the British North America Act. We are satisfied with it as a fine document, but we do not regard it more importantly or more dearly than the welfare of the Dominion of Canada. If changes are necessary and advisable, we are here to discuss them." That struck me as indicative of his character.

Of course, he was a vigorous advocate for the needs and rights of Nova Scotians, and for the needs and rights of Atlantic Canada, far too often ignored, neglected and downplayed as they were, but he was also a Canadian—a great Canadian.

I had the opportunity of being abroad with him on a number of parliamentary delegations, and I was always proud when this representative of Canada took the floor. He spoke with the candour to which my colleagues have made reference, and with that perception which was a part of his nature.

I agree with Senator Graham and other honourable senators who said he was a sharp debater. One was impressed by his incisive skill, but, beyond that, one was impressed by his mastery of the subject. To put it in simplistic terms, he knew what he was talking about. As has been said, no matter how sharp the debate, how vigorous the thrust and parry, he always ended up, as Chesterfield would have said, a true gentleman. He was never mean nor little in his disputes. He was courteous; he was considerate; he was, as I say, a true gentleman.

In the one year of semi-surcease from politics that I have had in the last quarter century, when I was on the faculty of Mount Allison University, I wanted someone to talk to my students about the Constitution of Canada. I was proud to invite Ike Smith as the speaker. Of course, he said he would come, and he was there for two days, and on their third day—I am not being scriptural here—snow fell on that beautiful part of New Brunswick. Knowing that he had to go to Halifax, I suggested he leave first thing before the snow got worse. I said I or someone else would take the class, or he could stay overnight as we had lots of room. True to his instincts, which must have been Calvinistic, he said, "I am committed to go to your class and to deal with my case in Halifax; I will take on both." Thank God he did get through the bad weather, and he did a fine job in both places.

The late Honourable G. I. Smith was a man of duty; a man of diligence; a man of warmth; and a man of charm. I join with all my colleagues in expressing our loss and in tendering our deepest regards and sympathy to those whom he loved and who loved him.

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I know much has been said about our late colleague, Senator G. I. Smith. However, it seems to me, as one of his contemporaries—being a member of the Atlantic provinces premiers club, a member of the Candian premiers club, and participant in federal-provincial conferences with him for three years—I should add some brief remarks to those that have already so eloquently been made. From 1967 to 1970, as a member of those three clubs, I had the privilege of getting to know the Honourable G. I. Smith.

Prior to becoming Premier of Nova Scotia, Ike was Minister of Highways. At a convention in 1967, when I announced that he had been elected Leader of the Conservative Party in Nova Scotia, replacing the Honourable Robert Stanfield, the Minister of Highways in my province was genuinely pleased because, although they did not share the same political affiliations, they had become good friends.

Ike Smith was a good debater. At times he was biting—biting to the point where he would, occasionally, be annoying. This was the case not only at Atlantic premiers' conferences, at premiers' conferences and at federal-provincial conferences, but also here in the Senate. However, as was so ably said, when the debate was concluded, Senator Smith once again demonstrated his genuine friendship.

Other former premirs have already spoken, and I am sure that Sentor Manning, if he were here today, would express his deep regret at the passing of a man of Senator Smith's calibre.

Life plays tricks upon us. Just a few days ago Senator Smith was here, a very healthy man; today Canada, particularly Nova Scotia and his family, mourn his passing.

To his wife, Sally, his children, and to the people of Nova Scotia I offer my deepest condolences.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, it is not without emotion that I now join all who rose before to express their reaction to the news we received so unexpectedly. The news of this death has touched us very deeply, and I fully agree with what was said by previous speakers. I had an opportunity to meet Senator Smith when he succeeded Robert Stanfield as Premier of Nova Scotia. He decided to follow the same policy as Mr. Stanfield, that is, to be both Premier and Minister of Education. Ike Smith became Premier at a time when an institution that is rather unique in our federal system had reached a turning point in its existence. That institution is the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada. The Council had acquired considerable substance with men like John Robarts, who was Minister of Education at the time, and Jean Gérin-Lajoie, who was Minister of Youth in Quebec. The Council continued to develop under the leadership of Bill Davis when he succeeded Mr. Robarts as Minister of Education in 1965, 1966 and 1967. Despite past successes, we had reached a turning point in 1967 with an institution that was totally unique in our federal system, when Ike Smith became Premier of his province as well as Minister of Education.

I shall always remember his impressive leadership in conducting extremely delicate negotiations. In fact, I was able to follow this from a definite vantage point, since I accompanied my own Minister of Education to council meetings. I personally witnessed the dexterity with which he was able to implement ways of settling national problems on an interprovincial basis. His prestige as both Premier and Minister of Education—he was then the only one to hold both positions at the same time—enabled him to exercise his leadership among people with the necessary authority to settle problems that were national in scope.

Perhaps not enough emphasis has been put on this aspect of Ike Smith's life, but having seen him at work during that decisive period, I can safely state that the man I met later on when I arrived in the Senate, and who by that time was a senator, contributed very substantially to the development and organization of our federal system. As a Canadian, I want to thank him for having made this contribution. I am aware of the national dimension present in both interprovincial and federal-provincial negotiations, and Ike Smith was deeply aware of this twofold aspect. I think that in this respect, he has made an absolutely outstanding contribution to the future of our country. He is more than worthy of our praise. With this tribute, I wish to offer my sincere condolences to Mrs. Smith and the entire family.

[English]

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, after all the laudatory remarks that have been made about the late Honourable G. I. Smith, one might well ask, "What more can be said?" About a man of his qualities there is so much more that can be said. As has been pointed out by other honourable senators, he was a man who served his country both in times of war and peace. I did not have the opportunity to serve with him as a lawyer because I am not a lawyer. I did not have the opportunity to serve with him in the services because I was not in the services. I did, however, serve with him in the political field.

As many of us know, he was forthright, straightforward, honest, and threw a heavy punch when he had to. That is what this life and our democratic system are all about. Indeed, I knew the man for over 25 years. He campaigned with me. As many honourable senators know, in the political arena your enemy can at times be a member of your own party. Senator Smith would retreat for no one. He simply went straight ahead—straight forward in a decent, honest way. He debated with anyone in a proper manner, and in some cases had to put another in his place.

I remember those dark days of 1967 that have been mentioned by Senators Macdonald, Graham and Flynn. I remember the closing of the Sydney steel mill, when many of us sat at meetings both here in Ottawa and in Sydney. Those were serious, sad, grievous days. The Honourable Ike, of course, had his cabinet to advise him. Nevertheless, he and he alone had to make the final decision to set up a crown corporation and to go ahead from there. He did so against the advice of many financiers, steel experts and so on. That man put the people first. He considered the jobs of the steel workers and their families before anything else. Honourable senators, had it not been for him Cape Breton Island would now be a ghost island. Furthermore, the economic effects of that potential disaster would have spread to the mainland of Nova Scotia.

I can only say in conclusion, honourable senators, that I thank the good Lord that he caused to be among us a man of the calibre of the Honourable Ike Smith. He did fine and great work over the years.

There is so little that one can say to comfort another at a time like this, but I do want to express to his wife, Sally, my most sincere sympathy. I trust that God will give her the health and strength to come through these trying days. My sympathy also goes out to the other members of the family.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, out of respect for the memory of our colleague, the late Senator Smith, I move that the Senate do now adjourn, to resume at the call of the bell.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, for reasons I have already explained, in connection with the funeral of our colleague, Senator Smith, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g): That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, 21st December, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps I may ask Senator Frith whether the committees have scheduled sittings for tomorrow during the day, because we might have to make certain arrangements for representation on those committees. Perhaps Senator Lafond would have some information on that aspect.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I have had no notice of any change in schedule.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as far as the committee on Foreign Affairs is concerned, it seems that the scheduled meeting will probably not be held, because it is quite possible that Mr. MacEachen will be attending the funeral in person.

As far as the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is concerned, I have the impression that this sitting will be cancelled. In any case, I shall find out today, before the Senate adjourns.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LEGISLATION

BILL S-31—STATUS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which stems from an exchange that took place last Thursday between the minister and Senator Deschatelets in connection with Bill S-31.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): On what page of Hansard does the exchange appear?

Senator Flynn: It is page 5196. Senator Deschatelets asked:

> —is it the intention of the Leader of the Government to take this bill to third reading before the adjournment?

Senator Olson replied:

> No, it is not. The government does not intend to proceed with Bill S-31 past second reading in this session.

My question is: Why would the government insist on getting second reading before the adjournment? What would be the advantage, because later the Leader of the Government mentioned that there would be amendments proposed by the government. We know also that the federal minister, Mr. Ouellet, said that he was going to meet ministers representing the objecting provinces, other than Quebec, before we resume in January. I was wondering whether there was any advantage in forcing the Senate to take a stand on second reading of this bill when obviously there are going to be amendments, perhaps substantial ones, depending on the outcome of the meetings of the minister with representatives of those provinces which object to the bill.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that further down the page referred to I answered that question. I now enter this discussion with some trepidation, particularly with the Leader of the Opposition who is, of course, a former Minister of Justice. We have had some advice and there is some legal question involved here. Not everyone is in agreement with the principle of the matter. Of course, that is not unusual. Consequently, it is our intention to maintain between sessions the status of the November 3 date with respect to which voting rights can be purchased through equity by provinces or provincial agencies. I made that argument then, and it still remains. We do not intend to proceed to third reading or complete passage of this bill into law.

We think it important that the Senate take some assertive action on this second reading agreement in principle so that there is no question that, when the bill is re-introduced in the subsequent session, the date of November 3 can be maintained, thereby eliminating any distortion of the market situation between prorogation and the re-introduction of the bill.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government has made this argument with me privately.

Senator Olson: It is here in Hansard.

Senator Flynn: Yes, it is in Thursday's Hansard. However, I do not see why the bill cannot stand on the order paper as it now stands and as it would remain if we were to give second reading before adjourning. That is, if the date is preserved up to this time it will be preserved if we adjourn the debate or the consideration of the bill until we come back in January.

Senator Olson: I understand now, and that is a different question.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn: After all, if the date is preserved at this time, for instance, the Caisse de dépôt de placement du Québec cannot acquire more than 10 per cent, or, if it did, it could be nullified by the adoption of the bill. I suggest that giving second reading to it would not change the situation at all. If there are reasons other than the argument just put forward for the second reading of the bill, I would like to know what they are.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think I understand what the Leader of the Opposition is saying. He is suggesting that during the Christmas adjournment the bill should remain in the position it is in now. I shall take that view into account. At first, I thought the honourable senator was talking about what will happen from the date of prorogation to when the bill is re-introduced, and the argument I made would apply in that instance. But we shall take his viewpoint into account.

There is, of course, the matter of getting on with this legislation. After all, we were extremely accommodating to the Leader of the Opposition in his suggestion that the bill be referred to a committee prior to second reading, which is quite a departure from parliamentary practice, where you decide on the principle first and then study and debate the matter. However, we will take the senator's views into account.

Senator Flynn: I appreciate the Leader of the Government's good intentions in allowing the bill to go to committee because of the views of the opposition, but it seems to me that these views should also be considered in light of giving protection to the government and not forcing the Senate to take a stand on a bill that may never come back or may come back in another session in such a different form that we would look rather silly having approved it at second reading stage.

Senator Olson: Without repeating much of what the Leader of the Opposition has just said, I will simply repeat what I said that we will take the views of the Leader of the Opposition into account. However, there may be some good opportunities to establish the principle of this bill before December 22.

TRANSPORT

GROUNDING OF CN MARINE FERRY ABEGWEIT

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This morning I notified his office that I would be asking him to report on the grounding of the CN marine ferry Abegweit. I now ask him whether he has any information to give the chamber on that matter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information on the matter. As we understood the thrust of Senator Phillips' question from his notice, he wanted to know whether or not there would be an inquiry into the temporary grounding of this vessel. I am advised that the grounding occurred on the evening of December 19 at Borden, Prince Edward Island. Abegweit was grounded 300 feet off its berth due to an apparent propeller control failure.

A fishing vessel removed the 80 passengers and the tug boat Irving Birch floated Abegweit around midnight the same night, and removed the cargo. The vessel steamed back to Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick, where it is still undergoing inspection.

There is no apparent damage to the vessel and it will probably miss ten sailings. Because it was a straightforward incident where there does not seem to be any damage or great mystery involved, the view at the moment is that there will be no official investigation.

CANCELLATION OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been in touch with Senator Neiman and she tells me that she will cancel tomorrow's meeting of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I shall try to find out about the meeting of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

REFORM OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to proceed to Motion No. 2:

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Thursday, December 16, 1982, moved:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon ways by which the Senate of Canada could be reformed in order to strengthen its role in representing people from all regions of Canada and to enhance the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country;

That the Committee include in its final report recommendations concerning the method of selection, powers, length of term for Senators, distribution of seats and other matters that the Committee considers relevant to the reform of the Senate;

That 8 Senators, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as it may deem advisable or necessary;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the quorum of the Committee be 10 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Committee be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever 5 members are present, so long as both Houses are represented;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee present its final report no later than December 1, 1983; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose and to select, if the House of Commons deems advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

He said: Honourable senators, as has just been indicated, I have already given notice of the government's intention to move to establish a special joint committee on Senate reform. We are asking this committee to carry out an intensive study of possible changes to the Senate. In the process, we hope that it will consult widely with members of both houses and with Canadians from all regions. We expect the committee to make its final report to Parliament by December 1, 1983.

Before I comment further on the committee's purpose, I want to say that I feel this initiative complements the government's current emphasis on economic renewal and follows from other parts of its recent program. First, it seems clear that if we as Canadians are to overcome the present economic difficulties and prosper in the future, we must reaffirm our confidence in our own ability to contribute to the effort that must be made by all sectors of the economy and by our political institutions. The federal government's policies will help lead the way, but economic renewal will come sooner and last longer if we are confident that the institutions of government can respond to the needs of all Canadians and allow those needs to be reflected in policy making. If the Senate's effectiveness as a forum for the expression of regional viewpoints is improved—and I think that it needs to be—I am sure that confidence in our national institutions will be raised.

We have recently appointed what has become known as the Macdonald Commission to examine medium and longer term economic prospects and to consider changes to the institutions of the national government that will encourage the further development of the economic union. I hope it will recommend ways of strengthening the role of the federal government and Parliament in managing the national economy.

Senate reform is linked to both the short term and the longer term efforts to aid economic renewal, because the federal government must be better equipped to provide the necessary leadership for economic growth and development. Its capacity to give economic leadership will be enhanced if, along with Parliament, it possesses the necessary authority to speak and to act on behalf of all parts of Canada.

In the last two years or so we have participated in an important constitutional debate. Those efforts were necessary so that we might have an amending formula and a strengthened charter protecting our fundamental rights and freedoms. That has been achieved, and since April 17 this year we have been able to amend all parts of our Constitution in Canada.

We are a fully mature nation and must now begin some work that is long overdue. We must try to fulfil our commitment to renew our national institutions so that they will be effective and responsive to the wishes of all Canadians. Already we can see Parliament reforming itself to some extent. For example, in the new year the other place will experiment with new rules of procedure that it adopted a couple of weeks ago. I hope that we will also be able to see some changes in the Senate.

Of course, constitutional change will ultimately require the approval of a number of provincial governments—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Legislatures.

Senator Olson: Legislatures, all right, if you would rather have it that way.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Legislatures.

Senator Olson: In any event, all senators are aware of what the proposed amending formula is at the moment. However, I think the first step is for Parliament itself to look at the matter in consultation with Canadians and to come to some kind of consensus about the reforms it would like to propose. The proposed special joint committee on Senate reform is thus very much part of the government's present program. We have recently seen a strong interest in the question in western Canada. This interest is not confined to any one region. However, I feel that Canadians everywhere are interested in ensuring that all parts of the country are fully and effectively represented in the Parliament of Canada and will agree that the proposed parliamentary study of the Senate and its role in our federation is timely and important.

The proposed order of reference emphasizes the goal of improving regional representation at the national level through reform of the Senate.

The Speech from the Throne at the beginning of this Parliament—it seems almost unbelievable that nearly three years have passed since then—did refer to the need to examine the representativeness of parliamentary institutions and to strengthen the confidence that Canadians have in them. Many have already looked at the Senate. The Pepin-Robarts task force and the 1972 joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons proposed some reforms, as did the governments of British Columbia and Alberta. Those reports and others have presented various solutions to a problem that all of them recognize in one way or another—the need to ensure that the interests of Canadians from all regions can be expressed and possibly reconciled in a national forum.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about the Lamontagne report?

Senator Olson: I will refer to that report in a few minutes. It is of paramount importance because it was produced by the Senate itself. Well, since Senator Asselin is anticipating me, let me say to him directly, and to other honourable senators, that we have helped encourage public discussion of reform of this chamber in the last couple of years, and we did so even before that. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs produced a clear, well-informed report in 1980. Unfortunately, what was referred to then as the Goldenberg-Lamontagne report was rather lost in the hurly-burly of the patriation debate. In my view, it has not received sufficient attention. Senator Lamontagne started an inquiry on the report, and on several occasions other senators added their comments. I think we should give credit where credit is due and thank those honourable senators who, in presenting their views on several sorts of possible reform, helped to push forward this issue. Perhaps with the benefit of those various debates we can institute some internal reforms in the shorter term. Certainly, there are important things we can do even before any specific constitutional reform is agreed to under the strict terms of the amending formula.

Some of the recommendations in the Goldenberg-Lamontagne report, for example, could be implemented without constitutional amendments. I hope that in the coming months we will consider these and perhaps even experiment with some changes that could be made short of actually implementing constitutional amendments. By that I mean changes that could be put into effect even while this special joint committee is looking at the longer term aspects, particularly those requiring constitutional amendments.

Although the Order of Reference asks the committee to focus on regional representation in the Senate, the government is not in any way proposing that this chamber abandon any of the other functions that it now carries out so effectively. Most people acknowledge that we play a valuable role in reviewing legislation from the House of Commons and in examining regulations and statutory instruments. Our standing and special committees have contributed significantly to the consideration and development of national policies. Although those activities are not often given enough credit, the government hopes that they will continue to be done as well in a reformed Senate. But the government also feels that it is time to consider how the Senate's role in representing people from all regions of Canada can be strengthened. We do speak for our regions now, but we could do so more effectively. A reformed Senate could become the centre of public debate on regional differences, and could contribute significantly to their reconciliation. It might then become easier to define the true national interests on major questions. In the process, the authority of Parliament, as a whole, to act and to speak on behalf of all Canadians would, in my view, be enhanced.

Therefore, honourable senators, we ask the committee to consult widely and to tell us what changes to the Senate will help ensure that it will be clearly seen as a place where the views of Canadians from all regions may be effectively represented. So I urge the committee to be bold, to lead the way and to try to create a national consensus on Senate reform. I hope that many honourable senators will help the committee in its task. I wish its future members well and hope its work will ultimately help lead Canadians to the necessary constitutional amendments and to renewed confidence in our national political institutions.

There are one or two other things I should like to suggest. I think that we ought to deal with this motion as quickly as possible to enable the House of Commons to deal with it before it adjourns for the Christmas recess. I should like the Senate to send this message to the House of Commons inviting its members to join with members of the Senate in addressing the important matters I have just talked about.

I think the Senate should take—and it is doing so now—a leading role with respect to a number of important matters. First of all, I think that there is a lack of accurate understanding on the part of the public as to what the Senate does, and a lack of understanding of the important work it does when it reviews and amends legislation sent to it from the House of Commons. There is also a lack of accurate understanding of other functions the Senate performs.

Members of the Senate from time to time hear about the investigatory role the Senate and its committees play. Honourable senators have heard a great deal about investigation carried out by Senate committees, but have and do others? Few outside of this chamber follow the debates of the Senate with interest. Nevertheless, my impression is that in many regions of Canada—and here I include the other place—people believe much of the committee work the Senate does in terms of investigation and examination of bills is superior to the work done by committees of the other place. In fact, I have been told this is the case. Perhaps that is because of the manner in which our committees function, but, as I say, that is certainly the view of many people.

I think we should take this opportunity not only to describe the important work done in this place, but also to advise and inform the public of the work done by the Senate.

Honourable senators may ask what the hurry is, or why the government wants this motion passed later this day. The fact of the matter is that there have been such references on the Order Paper for months now. There have been two inquiries in which members could participate and, of course, a number of senators were deeply and actively involved in the two earlier committees, particularly the committee which reported in 1980.

I have read the Goldenberg-Lamontagne report rather carefully on more than one occasion. It is an excellent report. Most of the recommendations found in that report relate to reforms we can make without seeking constitutional amendment, but there are others which require constitutional amendment. They are all worthy of consideration by the proposed committee and ought to be considered by that committee.

As I said earlier, honourable senators, I should like the members of the House of Commons to have this motion and invitation before them prior to the Christmas recess so that they may have reasonable time to consider the motion. I say that because there will probably be a four- to five-week period during which a great deal of organization work could be done by the members of the committee. That organizational work could be undertaken between now and either January 17 or January 24. Honourable senators should also bear in mind that there is a requirement that some consideration be given to constitutional matters some time before April 17, 1983—perhaps a few days earlier, but that is the requirement.

So, honourable senators, I hope that you will all join with the government in taking the lead that has been initiated and is now under way in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, it is not our intention to delay the consideration of this motion too long, but at this point I should like to adjourn the debate. I shall inform the Senate tomorrow or later this evening as to where we stand on this motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if that is acceptable, in the meantime could we adjourn the debate until later this day, on the understanding that Senator Flynn may wish to ask for a further adjournment to consider the matter? That being the case, we could now proceed with a couple of bills. I ask that on the understanding that Senator Flynn will take advantage of the opportunity to consult with his colleagues, but may not have an answer for the Senate today, but hopefully will.

Senator Flynn: Later this day, then.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

CANADA AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS STANDARDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Daniel Riley moved the second reading of Bill C-98, to amend the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us today, Bill C-98, is essentially a bill to amend the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act. It is a significant piece of legislation for the fruit and vegetable industry in Canada—significant because it will tighten up the regulations governing the fruit and vegetable trade in this country.

At present, the Canadian horticultural industry is a $3-billion-a-year business, and the goods it is concerned with are highly perishable. To ensure that costly interruptions do not occur in the delivery of fresh fruits and vegetables from producer to consumer, tighter regulations are required for the industry.

Members of the industry, including growers, wholesalers and retailers of fresh fruits and vegetables, support the proposed amendments to the act, often known as the CAPS Act. Within the past month, the proposed legislation has received first, second and third readings in the House of Commons. It has also passed quickly through the Standing Committee on Agriculture of the House of Commons—where the Canadian Fruit Wholesalers Association and the Canadian Horticultural Council spoke in favour of the proposed amendments. It is now up to the Senate to consider the merits of the bill.

The amendments contained in Bill C-98 concern a board of arbitration, and the bonding and licensing of dealers of fresh produce. Probably the most significant of these is the amendment that would establish, under the CAPS Act, proper authority to operate a board of arbitration. Such a board would give dealers an avenue of recourse when disputes arise between buyers and sellers of fresh produce, such as when a buyer is unhappy with the arrival condition of a shipment of tomatoes. A board of arbitration would be able to hear complaints about quality, packaging, storage, preservation and transportation of fruits and vegetables on the basis of standards and regulations made pursuant to the amendment of the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act.

From 1934 until 1974, such a board did operate, first under the Fruit, Vegetable and Honey Act, and later under the CAPS Act. The board of arbitration has continued to operate on a voluntary basis, settling disputes since the previous legislation was declared invalid in 1974.

For the past eight years, however, the board has not had the legal power to enforce its decisions. Consequently, there have been cases in which parties have refused to pay the compensation deemed appropriate by the board.

● (1640)

This bill would clearly establish the board's legal authority, and would improve some aspects of its operations. Other amendments to the act, as set out in Bill C-98, would provide for the licensing and bonding of dealers. It would also provide for regulations governing dealer licences including the terms and conditions under which a licence may be issued, renewed, suspended or cancelled. These terms would also include rules of practice that must be followed, fees to be paid, the keeping of records and compliance with arbitration procedures.

I should point out that these regulations are currently being drawn up by a working committee consisting of members of the Canadian Fruit Wholesalers Association and the Canadian Horticultural Council, as well as officials of Agriculture Canada. The only people required to be licensed by Agriculture Canada would be those individuals or firms who ship fresh produce—other than produce they grow themselves—from one province to another, or import into or export from Canada. Individuals who grow and sell their own products, would not need dealer licences, nor would processors of fresh fruits and vegetables. I should also point out that shipments made within a province are subject to the laws of that province, and are not under federal jurisdiction.

All licencees must agree to obey a code of practice which incorporates normal trading procedures. If all dealers follow a code of ethics and have access to an abitration procedure, there will be a higher level of confidence among industry members shipping perishable goods long distances, and reduction in the element of risk.

The other amendment to the CAPS Act, which was approved by the Commons committee for inclusion in Bill C-98 and passed in third reading, would require that all firms and individuals post a bond in order to obtain a dealer licence. This bond would be used in the event that a licencee failed to pay an order or decision of the board of arbitration. A sum of $100,000 for the bond has been suggested, but not finalized. However, it should be noted that this amendment was prepared after discussions with officials of the fruit wholesalers and horticultural organizations whose members would be most affected by such legislation.

I should like to point out that the United States government has an arbitration system to handle complaints where Canadian shippers are involved. Members of Canada's horticultural industry believe that Canada should offer a similar service to settle disputes involving American fresh fruit and vegetable dealers. After all, the United States is this country's major trading partner in fresh fruits and vegetables.

Finally, I cannot emphasize enough the urgency that is involved in the handling of fresh produce. Whether it is grown in Canada or imported from the other side of the globe, it will perish quickly if not handled properly. The results can be costly for members of the industry involved in the transaction and disappointing for consumers who do not receive the high quality produce they expect.

With an increase in the demand for fresh produce in Canada, we are seeing more and more movement of perishable goods across the country. Thus, the need for a more tightly-regulated fruit and vegetable industry is greater than ever before.

Those necessary regulations would be provided by Bill C-98, a bill to amend the Canadian Agricultural Products Standards Act.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, Bill C-98, to amend the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act, is a good piece of legislation. When a good piece of legislation is put forward by the government it receives almost total support without question by the agricultural community and their representatives in both houses.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bielish: Perhaps I should temper this a little bit—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Now the bad news.

Senator Bielish: —with the fact that this legislation has been long overdue—at least since 1974. My only criticism would be the manner in which it was handled, namely, the third amendment. The matter of posting the $100,000 bond by the people who go into business had not been clearly put forward in order that the people concerned would have had the opportunity to examine it. We, on this side support this bill and would not want to delay its passage.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the sponsor of the bill a question? Of course, I am not an expert on this matter—by nature I am a skeptic—

Senator Frith: You are an expert on skepticism.

Senator Flynn: —because I have been facing the same government for approximately 20 years now.

My question is with respect to the proposed new section b of the act, which reads as follows:

> No dealer shall engage in the importation into or the exportation from Canada of, or in interprovincial trade in, any agricultural product prescribed by the Governor in Council pursuant to paragraph 6.7(1)(a) unless he holds a licence issued to him by the Minister for that purpose.

Could the sponsor tell me what the present provision is which is repealed and replaced by this one?

Senator Riley: The explanatory note which is found in the first reading print of Bill C-98 reads as follows:

> Section 6 of the said Act at present reads as follows:
> "6. (1) The Governor in Council may make regulations for the licensing of dealers to deal in any agricultural product shipped from or to a place outside the province in which such dealer carries on business, and for the issue, cancellation and suspension of licences including the prescribing of fees for the issue thereof.
> (2) No dealer, who is by the regulations made under subsection (1) required to be licensed to deal in an agricultural product in any manner, shall so deal in such product unless he is so licensed.
> (3) For the purposes of this section, "dealer" means a person who
> (a) is engaged in the business of selling a prescribed agricultural product,
> (b) negotiates consignments, sales or purchases of a prescribed agricultural product for or on behalf of a vendor or purchaser, or
> (c) receives or handles for purchase or sale a prescribed agricultural product on commission."

Senator Flynn: Is it likely that this bill will be referred to committee? Since we are to have Royal Assent on Wednesday afternoon, perhaps the committee could meet on Wednesday morning. I am not too clear on the difference between the present situation and what this bill is going to accomplish, and I know it may be difficult to have a committee meeting tomorrow morning.

Senator Frith: I asked whether provision should be made for the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture to consider this bill. Senator Sparrow commenced arrangements for the minister to appear before the committee at 6 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. However, we then heard about the funeral arrangements for the late Senator Smith.

I asked Senator Macdonald and Senator Bielish whether they felt this bill should go to committee because I wanted to know whether Senator Sparrow should return in time for the meeting. I have now sent word that a committee meeting will not be necessary.

Since we are not going to ask for third reading now, may I suggest that Senator Riley try to get that information before third reading? Perhaps by tomorrow evening he will have an answer which would be satisfactory to Senator Flynn. If the answer is not sufficient, then we will try to arrange a committee meeting with an official from the department who can furnish a satisfactory answer.

Senator Flynn: I suppose, if Senator Bielish and Senator Macdonald are satisfied, I should support their position.

Senator Frith: I do not want to misrepresent anything Senator Bielish and Senator Macdonald may have said to me. They certainly, at no point, said, "We do not think it is necessary that any question Senator Flynn asks be answered."

I am suggesting an interim way of answering the question without referring the bill to committee. Perhaps Senator Riley could get that information and have it available before third reading tomorrow evening.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, when I was explaining the bill, I pointed out that from 1934 until 1974, this board, which will now be re-constituted, first operated under the Fruit, Vegetable and Honey Act, and later under the CAPS Act.

The board has continued to arbitrate on a voluntary basis, settling disputes since the previous legislation was declared invalid in 1974. Does that answer the honourable senator's question?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): That is a perfectly clear answer.

Senator Flynn: It was clear, but are the decisions of the board valid?

Senator Riley: For the past eight years the board has not had the legal power to enforce its decisions.

Senator Flynn: Will they be valid under this legislation?

Senator Riley: Apparently they are satisfied it will have the power henceforth.

Senator Olson: Is that satisfactory?

Senator Flynn: I have operated on faith on previous occasions.

Senator Riley: I hope you will continue to have the utmost faith in us.

Senator Flynn: I will wait for third reading tomorrow evening.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Riley moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT

BILL C-647, TO CHANGE THE NAME OF THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF SAINT-MICHEL—SECOND READING

Hon. Azellus Denis moved the second reading of Bill C-647, to change the name of the electoral district of Saint-Michel.

He said: Honourable senators, I am sure you will be pleased to hear that I shall be very brief. In fact, it would be almost impossible to do otherwise, since the bill is so straightforward.

The purpose of the bill is, quite simply, to change the name of an electoral district, now called Saint-Michel, by adding the name Ahuntsic, an area that represents about half of the present electoral district. Ahuntsic was a separate district originally, but the commissions added Ahuntsic to Saint-Michel; they are two different areas but equal in size. Consequently, since the people of Ahuntsic feel so strongly that the name of their area should be included in the name of the riding, I move that the second reading of this bill be agreed to, and that the name of the electoral district read Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic instead of Saint-Michel alone.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, when this bill was introduced in the Senate on first reading, I looked at Hansard for the other House to find out whether any reasons had been given for the proposed name change. Names of ridings should not be changed on a whim of a Member of Parliament. This is a matter that should be left to the people who live in the district to decide.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I never said it was the Member who wanted the change. I even said that the people themselves wanted the name changed.

Senator Asselin: Well, if the people want to change, we in the Opposition ought to know how they made their wishes known.

Looking at Hansard of the other House, I noticed that only Mrs. Killens, the Member for Saint-Michel, rose and said: "I move that this bill be read the second time". She then rose again and said: "I move that the bill be referred to a committee of the whole". She then moved for third reading. Honourable senators, no reason was given in the other place for wanting to change the name. Why? I think that we should not give in to the whims of a Member of Parliament, and that before we change an Act, we should find out why people want to change it.

I would like to see a petition from the people of the riding, resolutions from municipal councils or mayors of municipalities asking their Member to have the name changed.

I, for one, am not prepared to approve this bill merely to satisfy the whims of a Member of Parliament or some of his constituents. I want to know whether the people are generally in favour of the change.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I may comment on what was said by Senator Asselin. In a different situation, I would be inclined to agree with Senator Asselin.

However, in the present case, I only want to say that I read the appropriate passages in Hansard for the other place. Apparently, no evidence was given in support of the bill being proposed, but it does not necessarily follow that the proposal itself is capricious. In other words, there may very well be other reasons.

In this particular instance, where a bill is concerned solely with the name of an electoral district for the other place, I wonder, with all due respect, whether in such cases we should not take the Member's word for it, because of the very limited impact of this bill. Therefore, it may be and at least to me, it is preferable not to conclude right off that this is merely a whim of a Member of Parliament. I think we should accept the opinion of the elected representative of the people of the riding.

For this reason, I shall support the bill. I am prepared to take Mrs. Thérèse Killens at her word, so that if she wants a change in the name of the riding, I am prepared to go along with that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Of course, the reasons given by Senator Frith, when the issue is one that almost exclusively affects the House of Commons, may be acceptable. However, we know perfectly well that in the other place, there is a kind of you-scratch-my-back-and-I-will-scratch-yours policy whenever a Member wants to change the name of his riding. Usually it is done for political reasons, and that I can understand. According to my information, in this particular case, the Electoral Boundary Commission's proposal, which the public now has a chance to consider, is to change the name from Saint-Michel to Ahuntsic so that the present member would have to be willing to run in a riding bearing only the name of Ahuntsic.

It has always been my view—and Senator Lafond has often expressed similar views—that the indiscriminate adding on of names and changing them after general legislation has been passed under which the riding is to bear such and such a name, should not be encouraged.

In any case, I do not think we shall be able to prevent passage of this bill. Otherwise, the House of Commons would tell us in no uncertain terms that we should keep our nose out of business that hardly concerns us. I think Senator Asselin is right in saying that we should at least let the people in the other place know that when they ask for such changes, they should prove that it is not just a caprice.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, by tomorrow, perhaps the sponsor of this bill will have been able to meet the Member in the other place and find out what the basic reasons were for requesting the change. He could let us know what these reasons were tomorrow and we could then reach a decision.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I do not think it will be necessary to take steps to find out what those reasons were. Of course the Member received requests—

Senator Asselin: Then she should give them to us.

Senator Denis: —from both sides. However, being from the Montreal area, I happen to know that Ahuntsic is a large town in the northern part of the Montreal area. Saint-Michel is entirely separate from Ahuntsic.

The population of Saint-Michel is now 54,000. Consequently, half of the riding is in Ahuntsic. Before the new boundaries, the riding existed as such and was called Ahuntsic. As the Honourable Leader of the Opposition said, independent commissions are assigned to look at population figures and adjust boundaries so as to have more or less the same number of people in each riding.

In ths case, however, Saint-Michel and Ahuntsic are two separate towns which are asking for reunification. I know the Honourable Leader of the Opposition does not like these compound names. I remember answering once that he was nevertheless fond of the compound name Progressive Conservative—

Senator Flynn: That is not one of your best arguments.

Senator Denis: It is the same thing, it is a compound name.

Senator Asselin: Well, I hope you realize this is going to make me vote against the bill.

Senator Denis: It is the same thing, it is a compound name, and it prevents the Progressive Conservative Party from being a very honourable institution.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, is Senator Asselin correct in believing that objections have been raised by people in the riding? Has anyone—

Senator Asselin: I do not have to prove this. It is up to the sponsor of the bill.

Senator Molgat: I wonder, since Senator Asselin raised the question, whether he had any feedback or whether people came to see him to make their objections known?

Senator Asselin: I have not divulged my sources to my colleague, Senator Molgat. If the senator wants to know, I shall just refer the Bill to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and he can get the information there.

Senator Flynn: I would like to ask the sponsor of the bill whether, considering the proposals made by the Electoral Commission, which seems to be in favour of giving the riding just the name Ahuntsic, we shall eventually have a bill to name the riding Ahuntsic—Saint-Michel?

Senator Denis: No. I understand that the present bill has no connection with the new boundaries. No connection at all. And in addition—

Senator Asselin: So what is the hurry?

Senator Denis: It has no connection with the new boundaries that were established recently.

Senator Flynn: Certainly not.

Senator Asselin: No.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be read the third time at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT

BILL C-620, TO CHANGE THE NAME OF THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF MISSISQUOI—SECOND READING

Hon. Azellus Denis moved the second reading of Bill C-620, to change the name of the electoral district of Missisquoi.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Some explanations, please.

Senator Denis: The purpose of the bill is to make a change similar to that proposed in the bill we have just considered. The bill proposes to change the name Missisquoi to read Brome-Missisquoi, since these are the two provincial counties which together form the present riding of Missisquoi.

I may add that Brome is an old county that is mainly English-speaking. In the present riding of Missisquoi, Brome tends to be the English-speaking area. It is at their request that we are asking to have the riding's name changed to Brome-Missisquoi.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, my comments are the same as for the previous bill. Could Senator Denis perhaps asks the bill's sponsor in the other place what the real reasons were for introducing this bill, whether there were resolutions by municipal councils or county councils or pressure groups in his riding. Once he has given us the real reasons, then we will decide.

Senator Denis: The name Brome-Missisquoi has existed from as far back as 1924, I believe. Until 1976, it was the name of the federal riding. Subsequently, for what reason I do not know, the commission changed the name, dropping the name Brome.

Senator Asselin: Why?

Senator Denis: Well, if you lived in the county of Brome, I think one way or another, you would approve this perfectly normal change.

Senator Asselin: The commission has been known to turn down lesser requests than that.

Senator Denis: We are talking about that part of the riding of Missisquoi which is mainly English-speaking.

Senator Asselin: I hope the honourable senator realizes that what we are doing here is readjusting the electoral map. What is the hurry? Why do they not wait until the commission holds its public hearings, and then if a change is necessary, that will be taken care of. Why hurry this through?

Senator Denis: If I understand correctly, the bill was originally introduced a couple of years ago, and then we had the elections, and because of one thing and another, the two bills died on the order paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: The last speech by Senator Denis closes the debate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be read the third time at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would suggest, that we now adjourn until 8 o'clock this evening, when Orders of the Day No. 1 and No. 2, Bills S-30 and S-31, will be called, and also Senator Olson's motion which was adjourned until later this day. I believe that all the other orders will stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I should state that I undertook to endeavour to find out whether the other of the two committee meetings scheduled for tomorrow would proceed. I have discussed the matter with Senator van Roggen, and I believe he now has an announcement to make.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have just arrived from the west. Immediately upon my arrival I consulted with the Deputy Leader of the Government and I wish to advise the house that out of respect for the late Senator Smith, and for the convenience of those honourable senators who wish to attend his funeral, I have advised the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we shall not be proceeding with the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs tomorrow afternoon.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

[Senator Denis.]

REFORM OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE AGREED TO

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon ways by which the Senate of Canada could be reformed in order to strengthen its role in representing people from all regions of Canada and to enhance the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country;

That the Committee include in its final report recommendations concerning the method of selection, powers, length of term for Senators, distribution of seats and other matters that the Committee considers relevant to the reform of the Senate;

That 8 Senators, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as it may deem advisable or necessary;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the quorum of the Committee be 10 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Committee be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever 5 members are present, so long as both Houses are represented;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee present its final report no later than December 1, 1983; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose and to select, if the House of Commons deems advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

—(Honourable Senator Flynn).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Macquarrie.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Flynn for his gracious and generous gesture, but I recall the story Abraham Lincoln once told about a certain American citizen who, being the recipient of the custom of the day, was being ridden out of town—it was a painful process, I understand, being ridden out of town on a rail—and said: "You know, if it were not for the honour of the thing, I could pass this up." I feel the same way; if it were not for the honour of the situation, I could forgo this opportunity to speak on this important measure.

I am a convivial man; I never thought there was much prospect of running counter to Santa Claus and using the rules of the Senate to try to anticipate Christmas by dealing with this in such haste. When one puts a ship under forced draft, as any sailor knows, one cannot be that sure of the direction, and how one encounters the prevailing winds. So, prenez garde!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We might spring a leak!

Senator Macquarrie: Senator Roblin says that we might spring a leak, and who knows what that would do to this institution. I have heard about leaks ever since I came into Parliament 25 years ago. No matter what the weather, there always seem to be leaks.

I was a little surprised on Thursday when the Leader of the Government in the Senate presented this motion. I was surprised because I thought it was somewhat superfluous. I was more than surprised and perhaps a little grieved as a member of the Senate—not personally, but as a member of the Senate—because it was supernumerary in that it presumed to pass over important efforts made by this body in dealing with much of its subject matter.

Of course, I am referring to items 3 and 4, as I was instructed to call them on Thursday, which indicate that the Senate itself, which has long been interested in the matter of Senate reform, was proceeding on the motion of Senator Roblin, and on the deliberations following the most excellent report of Senator Lamontagne, or as Senator Olson said this afternoon, the Goldenberg-Lamontagne committee report, which is an excellent report containing suggestions that are very much in line with much of what Senator Olson designated as being important this afternoon. It struck me on Thursday—and after a good Calvinist weekend I am more convinced than ever that I was right—that it would have been far wiser for this body to spend more time, give more thought and further debate, to the most excellent report of Senator Lamontagne. Many items in it have not yet been discussed fully let alone been experimented with as an exercise for the Senate to advance in the realm of self-improvement. Surely that is a motherhood word if ever there was one. No one will say that that is an unworthy motive.

There are other aspects of the motion which caused me not anguish—I am too old and too comfortable to have such an enormous response in my emotional structure as anguish—but a little concern. My wise, venerable whip, Senator Macdonald, saw it immediately when he stood up on Thursday and asked whether we would be invoked in any aspect of reform of the House of Commons. He then got into the element of the reciprocal. That caused me to wonder what had happened over the years that had caused Senator Olson and his advisers, or his colleagues, his associates, his motivaters—

Hon. Peter Bosa: His friends.

Senator Macquarrie: —his authorities, his friends, his what-have-you—

An Hon. Senator: His writers.

Senator Macquarrie: —to depart from what has been the custom, as far as I know, in this chamber and in other second chambers across the world. I mentioned it briefly on Thursday that one of the cardinal rules was that if you set up a chamber you put it in charge of its procedures, its forms and its structures. If someone has to be disciplined in the Senate of the United States, do they pass a resolution in the House of Representatives? Do they say we will make it a joint commission and then we will all get there and decide what to do with them? Imagine what the Senate of the United States would say if anyone suggested such a thing!

Senator Bosa: We have a different parliamentary system.

Senator Macquarrie: We are going to hear from Senator Bosa very shortly. We will be delighted to hear his views.

In this Parliament of Canada—this bicameral legislature—I do not have to instruct Senator Bosa or anyone else that in the lower house they have a document covering their procedures. It is called Standing Orders of the House of Commons. Senator Olson used to argue about these procedures quite well, as a matter of fact.

In the red chamber, we have something called Rules of The Senate of Canada. I like this one better because I think it is more realistic and more practical. But what would happen if a member of the House of Commons started producing our book and saying, "this is what we do"? I am sure that His Honour, who has served with distinction in both houses, would not accept from me any long-winded readings from the House of Commons document.

Honourable senators, we are masters of our own procedures. We are separate houses. We are distinct entities within the Parliament of Canada. That is why I wondered why this motion in this place should suggest that for the first time the structure, the inner workings, the goals, the procedures, the values, the representational competency of one chamber should all of sudden be examined by two.

We all know that a short while ago after very careful committee work, and if I may be permitted to say, very diligent committee work and very useful recommendations, the other place decided on important procedural changes. If I were in that house I would say they were very welcome ones. Did Senator Olson sit in on their committee? Did they ask him for his views? Did he get an opportunity for—I employ that ridiculous word that is so widely used—input? Did someone ask that a Senate committee study the matter with or without them in order to hear their views? I would like someone to produce for me the documentation to that effect.

● (2010)

Of course, it did not take place; nor should it have taken place because they are the masters of their own procedure, and so they should be. They are wise in cherishing that. But why, in this chamber, the senior house, should we surrender our competency, our leadership, our appreciation of our own values and our structure? I do not know what the reason for that would be.

Another situation I find hard to resolve is not only that it must be done, but that it must be done quickly. Indeed, Senator Olson suggested this afternoon that we should get it all finished long before Santa Claus comes so that the other place may be able to move, function and get ready for this.

Is there something ominous about our present structure? Is the state really in danger? Are there egregious problems stemming from the present form of this Senate which really, whatever else it has not done, has not injured the country all that much since 1867? What is there explicit or implicit that requires that we must charge through—forget about "Jingle Bells", forget about "Silent Night", but get this done? To what end; for what purpose? What great national goal is suspended? What is held up there? What manner of people are we when we must get ready for great alterations—not great expectations—and we must do so within hours?

That alone causes me concern. Whenever I run across someone who says, "I want your agreement, and I want it now," I wonder, particularly, about the "now." I do not think I am such an ornery Highland Scot that I automatically like to disagree, but I am a little cold when I am supposed to answer immediately, "Yes." It causes me to wonder why. Why not let us think it over? Why not consult? Why not mull it over? Why not look to see if there are some alternatives? Why not look to see if it is necessary at all?

I am not as old as Confederation, although some people think I look that old, and that is too bad for it is long since past the time when it matters. However, down through the years, I have noted that a favourite topic in Canada, intermittent though it be, has been reform of the Senate.

Way back in 1887, the premiers of the provinces met and, instead of confining themselves to the economic problems which were pretty bad then, as they are now, they decided to talk about other things. Whether it was because they wanted diversion, I do not know; whether they wanted to take a crack at Ottawa, I do not know; but they met and decided that senators should be elected. That is not a subject that is unknown to this chamber in 1982. However, they had a slightly different cast to their recommendation. They said, definitely, that they should be elected by the provincial legislatures. They saw nothing wrong in the way things were being done except that they felt the wrong people were doing the doing, if I may put it that way.

A little while later, in 1893—and I likely would not have been invited to that gathering even had I been around—there was held the first political convention ever to take place in Canada; a meeting of the Dominion Liberal Convention. That is what it was called in those days—The Dominion Liberal Convention. "Dominion", yes, Senator Muir, "dominion;" they used that word a great deal. At that convention suggestions were made to improve the country, which was then in a very bad way, as they saw it, because in 1893 the Conservatives were in and someone else wanted to get in.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It doesn't seem that long ago.

Senator Macquarrie: I would like Senator Frith to know that it probably seems much longer to some of us than it does to him.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: I was surprised it was that recent!

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, at the age of 63, having been under a Conservative government for the first year and a quarter of my life—which I cannot recall that well—the odd snatch of a month or two under the great Arthur Meighen, five years under Mr. Bennett when I was a teenager, six years under Mr. Diefenbaker, and another far-too-short time under Mr. Clark, I feel that I may have had the quota for my entire life, but I don't know. If Senator Frith feels it is a long time ago, he should just think of us.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Don't despair; don't despair.

Senator Macquarrie: No, I do not believe we could go on if we did not love our country enough to keep hoping, and I am in that category. I believe that the time will come.

All I wanted to say is that, in 1893, the question of Senate reform arose. A great old Liberal, Richard Cartwright, stood up and said:

> —the Senate, as it at present exists, is a blot upon popular government and free institutions. I think we all agree that it is the duty of the Liberal Party to do our utmost to preserve the rights of the several provinces and to see that in their sphere the provincial authorities shall have the same rights accorded to them as the Constitution grants the Dominion Legislature in its larger sphere.

Honourable senators, I mention dear old Sir Richard Cartwright because he enjoyed a good many years in this very place that he found was such a blot in 1893. The Liberal Party, in all of the time it has been in office, has made one change: when appointed, instead of being here to eternity, we are here only until we reach the age of 75. That is not a very profound alteration since 1867.

Therefore, as an eager, red Tory given to reformist motivations, I do not have to defer to the Liberal Party when it comes to reforming the basic institutions of this country. I think perhaps we could have produced more in all those years than that particular alteration.

Honourable senators, I know that I am in a difficult situation. Perhaps that is why I am the first Conservative speaker. If I stand up to make an impassioned speech against this particular motion, those people who look at, care about, and follow the utterances of this place will say, "Oh, yes, he is a reactionary; he doesn't want anything changed because he is in it." That is always the danger for any thoughtful Conservative in our modern, high-priced, consumerist society. The danger is that if any reform, however ill-conceived its foundation, is opposed by any rational, thoughtful, reasonable man, he will be said to be against progress for some vested interest—possibly for self-interest.

Honourable senators, I have no illusions of living forever, I have no illusions of being around here for a long time, but I do think it is my bounden duty, whether the initiative comes from the Liberal Party, from my own party, or from other less honourable parties in the country—and there are some—to try to present my best judgment when any idea comes up, whether it be half-baked, political, wise, reasonable, or just plain old hat.

• (2020)

Now I have struggled all weekend. I have consulted with some of the wise men in my party over one question in connection with this. This is a government initiative; this is a government move. What has the government in mind?

Senator Flynn: Ask Davey.

Senator Macquarrie: What is going on here? Is it solicitude for this chamber? Very few governments have been all that tender about the Senate. Some months ago I quoted the great Arthur Meighen who said that the treatment this place receives is that it gets legislation at the last minute, which has to be passed without amendment, without delay and without question. That has been going on for many years. So I cannot believe that there is, in the government of the day, some tender solicitude—"Well now, we would like to make that place better; we want them to be feeling more needed; we want them to think that they have a more meaningful role; that they are more a part of the nation; that they are more fully representational." If anyone believes that that is the motivation of the present government, they just might become a sort of second Lewis Carroll. They just might, because it would be very much a looking-glass world. That is not the motivation.

I read carefully the remarks of Senator Olson, and I am sorry that I was not present to hear them. I always like to hear everyone who takes part in the debate that I intrude upon. I did note that he mentioned that we had recently seen a strong interest in the question in western Canada. Is this suggested inquiry into the reform of the Senate a device to make it with the west? I cannot see any more cogent reason in the statement. I am not a westerner—

Senator Roblin: Almost.

Senator Macquarrie: Thank you, Senator Roblin. I had the privilege of living there for nine years, and I was smart enough to marry a girl from the west, so I am not totally incapable of making some judgments about that great part of the country. I believe they will not be fooled by this. They will not all of a sudden go back to the days of Premier Walter Scott and Jimmy Gardiner and say, "Because these people are promising to change the upper chamber, we are all for them. We will forget about the great contribution of John Diefenbaker; we will forget about all of the things that the Progessive Conservatives like Alvin Hamilton initiated." Revealing their sensitivity to the west, they will forget about great people like Peter Lougheed and Premier Devine. All of a sudden they will become patsy-patsy Grit lovers on the prairies.

Do we suppose that someone really believes that that is what is going to happen? I cannot believe that Senator Olson—whom I used to hear in the other place give some wise, learned and reasonable comments when he was a member of a party other than the one he is with now—would recommend this. Yet there are strange things done behind the closed doors of the hierarchy who run our country.

Perhaps someone suggested that is the way of doing it. I say that if that is what they are expecting, they will fail—they will fail miserably. I suppose if I were a mean, narrow-minded partisan I would say, "Go forward and let yourself get into that"; but I must transcend partisanship, and I must say that it is my job to give them warning that it will not work. I would like to talk for another hour or two—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: Perhaps I should do it to my own party for putting me in this position. As the saying goes, "That would learn 'em"; they would never do it again.

Senator Frith: We are waiting for the "but".

Senator Macquarrie: I suppose, being realistic, that the motion will pass. I have a feeling that a majority is a majority is a majority, whether it be in this chamber or in other chambers, so I see a certain inevitability. But, surely, since this great chamber is noted for its capacity to be reasonable, as among members and as between parties, some careful second thought can go into this matter.

One suggestion is that the minister and his colleagues, his executive colleagues, abandon the idea of steamrollering this thing through in the next couple of days. It is an outrage. These next two days are broken days. We are thinking about our late colleague, Senator Smith; we have very limited hours; and on the final day we are looking forward to our last sitting before Christmas and, possibly, Royal Assent. At least, it would not be irrational and unreasonable for the Honourable Senator Olson to stand up and say, "There have been some observations made. People want to think this thing over, to discuss it and to look into precedents, so the idea of steamrollering it through should be abandoned."

There is one more very important point, which was alluded to by my colleagues on Thursday. They were all very sharp, I thought, in catching on to the possibilities of this motion very quickly. It is bad enough to have our procedures, structure, form and function made the object of review by another chamber, but you are piling Pelion on Ossa in not only making it a joint committee but giving the other chamber more members on the joint committee than we have. That is an insufferable situation.

In the first place, this matter is not the kind of thing that should go before a joint committee. Everybody knows that in this Parliament we have joint committees, but what are they on? Some of us are members of these illustrious committees. One is on the Restaurant of Parliament. We all eat so that is a logical thing for a joint committee. We also have a joint committee on the Library of Parliament. Most of us read so that is very good.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: It never meets.

Senator Macquarrie: We have one on the Printing of Parliament. God knows, we are all deluged with paper.

Senator Godfrey: That one never meets either.

Senator Macquarrie: But do we even find it possible to have a joint committee on agriculture? Of course, we do not. We have a Foreign Affairs Committee and an External Affairs and National Defence Committee. We have a Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. Do we have a joint committee on that? Of course not. Do we even have one on Health, Welfare and Science? One might say that that subject is kind of universal. We all grow old, we all get sick and we all die. Perhaps we should have a joint committee on that? Do we? Of course not. Try proposing that idea to the other house or to this one.

The point is, honourable senators, that this is not a suitable subject for a joint committee. By definition—and you only have to read the first few paragraphs—the subject matter concerns this chamber, not the two chambers. That is why a grave error was made. It is compounded by the suggestion that we have the other house swamp the membership and, if they should decide that this chamber should merely come here and recite the ABC once a month, by the power of majority which prevails, that could be it. It is reductio ad absurdum, of course, and I think there are a lot of far fetched, inadequately considered and, perhaps, hastily conceived suggestions in this motion. I am not suggesting that the passage of this motion would be the end of the world or the end of Canada. As my colleague Senator Nurgitz interposed, it would, of course, be the end of the Senate. That can be seen.

I think that that situation should first be considered by this house, which surely has a unique understanding of its own operations and of its motivations; it should have some concept of its purpose, and it should first make some suggestions.

If I were Senator Olson, imbued with the spirit of goodwill in this festive season, I would say, "Yes, honourable senators, we will withdraw this motion. We will hold it back. We will wait until this body comes to some decision on the two matters before it." The first of those is the Lamontagne report. Why cut off the Senate before it has expressed its view on that?

As I mentioned the other day, I have not made my speech, and I don't believe Senator Olson has made his. We waited for months to hear Senator Frith. He told us so much that we need a little more time to digest that and to fructify our thoughts after the stimulation that he gave us. I have not finished my cogitations on his first part, let alone the second and third parts, and now his seatmate, Senator Olson, has thrown at us an important new document with explosive suggestions. How can we possibly balance all these intellectual boomerangs at the one time? We need more time. We need more reflection. We need consultation.

Senator Frith: That is an interesting mixed metaphor, "balancing intellectual boomerangs."

Senator Roblin: You ought to try it some time.

Hon. David Walker: You are doing well!

Senator Macquarrie: Senator Walker is a wonderful man. He says I am doing well. I appreciate that. When one of the great lawyers of Canada says that to me, I should go on a little more, but I am full of kindness and goodwill and I will leave what I think further to another day.

I am appealing to the best instincts of the minister. God knows when the whole session will end, but we don't want the 1982 part of it to end in rancour or bitter argumentation. Let him be reasonable. Let him say, "We will hold this back. We will give it further thought. We will invite people to talk about the Lamontagne report. We will hear the views of the senators on their own future and on their own structure, and we will give more thought to this question of the mathematics."

I know that he, who has served in both houses, has enormous regard for this one, and I know he does not want us to become some diminuendo in some joint committee, where all the great thoughts that have been distilled in this chamber will just perish in the face of the onslaught from the other one. He does not want that. He wants us to enter into this seriously and carefully. He knows that the economic future of Canada is not dependent upon this house. No matter what Donald Macdonald says, you do not improve the economy of Canada by changing the basis of the Senate. That is one thing you do not do.

I am sure the minister will try to improve the Parliament of Canada, and we all want to do that. I do not think there is a senator here who is averse to reform, and even wide-ranging, far-reaching and deep-seated reform. We are not against that idea at all. We want that. But we want it entered into with care.

• (2040)

This body has a function, a purpose and a representational role. Don't forget that one does not need to be elected to be representative. I invite him to allow this chamber—his chamber—to play that role fully, and at some future date, after we have all had time to read, reflect, think, and consult, to take our place— and it should be the first place—in the reform which is mentioned in this illustrious motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: Would the honourable senator permit several questions?

The honourable senator emphasized that this motion seemed to be all about procedures, and that the Senate should govern its own procedures. I wonder if the honourable senator has read the actual terms of reference which state:

> That the Committee include in its final report recommendations concerning the method of selection, powers, length of term for Senators, distribution of seats and other matters that the Committee considers relevant to the reform of the Senate;

Why do you put so much emphasis on procedures? They are simply rules of the Senate which we can adopt ourselves.

Senator Flynn: Why don't you make a speech? After all, you know what you want to say.

Senator Godfrey: I should also like to point out that the committee on reform in the House of Commons recommended—and it has been adopted—that extensive questioning at the end of a speech should be permitted for ten minutes. I am asking the honourable senator a question, and if he does not care to answer it I will ask him the next question.

Senator Macquarrie: I am shocked that Senator Godfrey would think for a moment, or even suggest for a second, that I would speak on any motion which I had not read carefully and fully.

Senator Godfrey: The honourable senator referred to the United States and said that there was no way the House of Representatives would ever suggest reform to the United States Senate.

Is the honourable senator aware of the fact that up until 1912 the United States Senate was appointed by a vote of the state legislatures, and by constitutional amendment, which the House of Representatives had to pass, as well as the Senate and three-quarters of the states, that was changed to an election by direct vote of the people? So the House of Representatives in the United States actually did have an important input into making the United States Senate an elected body. Is the honourable senator aware of that?

Hon. Robert Muir: Does he know that? Why, he taught that subject in university!

Senator Flynn: If you told us what you know, it would not form a long speech.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I wish to point out that in the House of Representatives and the United States Senate it would be presumptuous—indeed, preposterous—for a committee of privileges in one house to be passing judgment on the members of the other house.

I am fully aware of the events that took place up to and including 1912. I was well aware of that before I met Senator Godfrey. I might just throw in a non sequitur and ask him if he knows who the second president of the United States was. It was John Adams, but so what? I am aware of all those things.

Senator Godfrey: Are you aware of the fact that all joint committees, so far as I am aware, usually have a membership ratio of two-thirds members of the House of Commons to one-third members of the Senate, or something along those lines?

There was a Special Joint Committee on the Constitution—

Hon. Martial Asselin: That was not on the reform of the Senate.

Senator Godfrey: That certainly affected the Senate. I am asking Senator Macquarrie, who did not point that out, whether he is aware of that fact.

Senator Asselin: That's an easy question!

Senator Flynn: I suppose you know everything.

Senator Macquarrie: This is prolonging my speech. I thought I had sense enough to cut it short, but if the honourable senator wants it prolonged that is what he is going to have to suffer.

I first served on joint committees of the Canadian Parliament in 1958, so I am aware of most of the things to which he has alluded.

Senator Godfrey: Are you aware of any joint committee on which the Senate had equal representation with the House of Commons?

Senator Macquarrie: If the honourable senator can tell me of any joint committee which had as its terms of reference the structure and future of one of them, then I could give him a good answer.

Senator Muir: Any more questions?

Senator Walker: Too bad!

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie is a speaker we enjoy listening to, not only because of the substance of his speeches but also because he is always so colourful and convincing, but unfortunately, he has failed to convince me as far as this motion is concerned.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I simply want to say a few words. Following the submission of the Lamontagne report recently and the Goldenberg report on certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution in November 1980, many honourable senators have expressed their views on the various options offered to us for a reform of the Senate.

In the last two years, several provinces have also suggested various texts for Senate reform. We now have on the Orders of the Day two items, including one on the Lamontagne report for which I adjourned the debate following the intervention of Senator Frith some time ago.

Senator Asselin: Are you continuing the debate on the Lamontagne report this evening?

Senator Deschatelets: I shall speak about it. We also have on the order a very specific motion introduced by Senator Roblin. This is indeed a motion which I myself seconded on the principle of an elected Senate.

Honourable senators, in views of the motion introduced today proposing the creation of a joint committee of both houses, I do not intend to give the speech I had begun to prepare on the two parts of the remarkable exposé given by Senator Frith because, as many senators have offered their solutions and their views on this issue in the last two years, I am convinced, unlike Senator Macquarrie, that this motion to create a joint committee is quite welcome in the present situation.

I hope that the honourable senators will forgive me if I single out among all the work which has been done the speeches delivered by Senator Roblin and Senator Frith which undoubtedly required many hours of thought and research. I even believe that it would be right to suggest in the circumstances that certain senators be asked to appear before the joint committee which will be created so that they may explain their ideas and opinions; two names which come to my mind are those of Senator Roblin and Senator Frith.

Therefore I support the principle of the motion. It seems to me that it comes at a time following a period of nearly two years when we had an opportunity to make our views known. The government will finally have to take a step forward and come up with some kind of measure. It is my feeling that this joint committee will be instrumental in getting a final decision from the government regarding the changes in this house which may be deemed necessary.

At this point I have a reservation. As was mentioned by several other senators, I deplore the fact that the Senate and House membership on this committee will not be the same. I am quite aware of the fact that numerical equality in itself is no guarantee for us in the Senate. Since this motion is going to be introduced first here in the Senate, I feel that by restricting to eight the Senate membership, we are placing ourselves right from the start in a weaker, perhaps inferior position. However, I do not consider this as a fundamental issue. This is an important aspect, but it is more important still that a joint committee be now struck. I think the present conditions are conducive to an elaborate study that could end in December 1983. We shall still be able to follow the work of that joint committee.

In conclusion, I will say this: As far as I am concerned, I am still convinced, on the basis of my experience over a number of years in this house, that there is a definite need for a second chamber especially in view of the fast changing constitutional process taking place before our eyes. I came to the conclusion that an elected Senate is desirable. According to Senator Frith, an elected Senate would give more teeth to the upper chamber. When I say teeth I mean credibility.

All commentators and newspapermen who followed the Senate proceedings gave due credit to the Upper Chamber for a job well done. Our only deficiency would reside in the fact we do not have a popular mandate. I am now convinced of that.

If we pass that resolution, that joint committee will have to assume its responsibilities. It will report to the government after which, the government will have to assume its own responsibilities. Then the consultation process with the provinces will follow. Under these circumstances, I will support the motion. Concerning the item which appears on the Order Paper under my name, I have no intention of proceeding with it as a result of this resolution.

Senator Asselin: You would be perfect to sit on that committee.

[Senator Deschatelets.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Are you closing the debate?

Senator Olson: I guess so if I am recognized now, but in the event that any other senator—

Senator Flynn: I am wondering if there is someone on the government side who would support you. I suppose their silence is the best indication, but I heard Senator Guay grumbling at one point. He appeared to be very much in agreement with Senator Macquarrie, and I thought that he would intervene. In any event, if no other senator wishes to speak, not even the very learned Senator Godfrey who knows everything about everything, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt Senator Flynn's motion for the adjournment of the debate?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

• (2200)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the delay in calling the vote. I wish to refer honourable senators to the debate which took place this afternoon. I have a copy of the unrevised report of this afternoon's proceedings in front of me. After Senator Olson spoke on the motion for the appointment of a special joint committee, I said:

> Honourable senators, it is not our intention to delay the consideration of this motion too long, but at this point I should like to adjourn the debate. I shall inform the Senate tomorrow or later this evening as to where we stand on this motion.

Senator Frith replied:

> Honourable senators, if that is acceptable—

I think he said "that is acceptable" but even if he said; "if that is acceptable", he went on to say:

> —in the meantime could we adjourn the debate until later this day on the understanding that Senator Flynn may wish to ask for a further adjournment to consider the matter? That being the case, we could now proceed with a couple of bills. I ask that on the understanding that Senator Flynn will take advantage of the opportunity to consult with his colleagues, but may not have an answer for the Senate today, but hopefully will.

I suggest that the position taken by the Leader of the Government is entirely contrary to what his deputy had agreed to this afternoon, and that refusing the motion to adjourn this evening is absolutely a trick which is unacceptable and is a blow to the understanding and co-operation that is required in this place.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I heard what was read, and I remember what I said. I am sorry if there is a misunderstanding, and I certainly—

Senator Flynn: There is no misunderstanding.

Senator Frith: I am certainly not pleased to have Senator Flynn think that anything tricky was being pulled. My intention was to say that I did not want to refuse the motion for adjournment at that time, but I wanted to give Senator Flynn a chance to consult, and that he could then, as I said, ask for an adjournment later. I at no time said that that request for an adjournment would be granted.

Senator Flynn: Gee whiz!

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on the point of order, I shall be prepared to say a few words about it in a few minutes. However, I have to say this: To interrupt a vote while it is proceeding, even to raise a question of privilege or a point of order, is not in order and, therefore, I shall wait for the vote to be taken and will then have some comments to make.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You had better look at the rules.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Look at the book.

Senator Olson: I have been over that a thousand times.

Senator Asselin: I have been over it, too, in the other place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not have to consider the point of order.

All those in favour of the motion—

Senator Flynn: It is not a point of order but a question of privilege.

The Hon. the Speaker: There is no point of order.

Senator Flynn: I did not raise a point of order.

Motion of Senator Flynn negatived on the following division:

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I already explained that I would have liked to have more time to clearly establish the position of our group on the resolution presented by the Leader of the Government.

This was not possible because of the dictatorial attitude of the Leader of the Government and the majority in this house, which has just disgraced itself by supporting this failure to keep a promise. The opposition is being forced to cut short debate on a very important motion which would merit far more detailed consideration.

If that is how you wish to proceed, honourable senators, lackeys of the government, that is your responsibility.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise to speak, since it is obvious that if I do I will close the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Olson speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there are two or three things I should like to say to clear the air with respect to a breaking of some word that the Leader of the Opposition has alleged. If he very carefully reads again what is in front of him, he will come to the conclusion that Senator Frith did acquiesce, on behalf of this side, to an adjournment of the debate until later this day.

Senator Flynn: You have to read the context; don't distort the context.

Senator Olson: I am not trying to distort the context.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You are.

Senator Flynn: You are.

Senator Olson: Perhaps Senator Flynn would like to recall that, while he was making his argument, I sat very quietly and made no interruptions at all.

Senator Flynn: Did you approve by your silence?

Senator Olson: I believe that one has a responsibility to listen to an argument. That is why I was listening so attentively, without interruption, to what the Leader of the Opposition had to say. In fact, I listened so carefully that it now appears I understood what he said better than he understood it himself.

Senator Flynn: Gee whiz, that's a definite lie.

Senator Olson: It is not.

Senator Flynn: It is a lie.

Senator Olson: It is an interpretation.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps Senator Godfrey will rise on a point of order.

Senator Olson: In any event, there is no mystery in any way, shape or form about why this motion should be passed this evening.

I will explain it again to Senator Flynn so that he understands. I am not going to bring up private conversations, but he knows very well what happened in those private conversations. The fact of the matter—

Senator Flynn: I know better than you do.

Senator Olson: —is that we were to start to deal with this motion this afternoon and, due to very sad unforeseen circumstances, that was not possible. Due to those same circumstances, we have forgone the Senate's sitting tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Flynn needs to recall or to reflect on the consequences of postponing until tomorrow evening, for whatever reasons he may have, the adoption of this motion.

I do not want to go back over the arguments I made during the course of my participation in the debate, but the scenario was something like this: If we do not deal with this motion and pass it this evening, so that we can send the invitation to the House of Commons, they cannot deal with the matter until tomorrow evening. That has already been determined. Therefore, it would probably not be dealt with by the House of Commons until Wednesday. As the opposition knows, the House of Commons has already passed an order that it will adjourn at 6 o'clock on Wednesday.

Senator Asselin: And after that?

Senator Olson: Just a moment. The House of Commons meets at 2 o'clock, and at that time they will deal with motions under Standing Order 43, and then Question Period. This means they will not get to the business before that chamber until some time after 3 o'clock on Wednesday. That is a fact which every senator on both sides of this house knows very well.

This means that there is a period of something less than three hours—probably only a little more than two hours—during which the House of Commons will be able to debate the motion. Even if they were to set aside all of the other business for Wednesday, however important it may be, they would have less than two and a half hours to deal with this motion.

Therefore, in fairness, and for all the reasons I explained earlier, we should pass this motion tonight so that the House of Commons will receive it at the opening of their sitting tomorrow. That will enable them to have the day tomorrow and whatever time there is available on Wednesday.

To concede to what Senator Flynn has requested—that the motion not be passed tonight but that it be passed tomorrow night—would be driving us into that less than three-hour period on Wednesday. I do not believe that is a reasonable or responsible thing to do when asking the House of Commons to concur with us and to pass the motion so that the committee can be established before the mandatory adjournment at 6 o'clock on Wednesday.

What also follows from Senator Flynn's request is that, if the House of Commons did not pass the motion, the committee could not be struck for at least four weeks and possibly longer than that. The members of this chamber and the House of Commons who will be on the committee would lose valuable time—time which they need in order to organize what would be a good and effective job with respect to this entire matter, which is certainly of great importance to this chamber, and, indeed, to the whole of Canada. That is the explanation. Whether or not Senator Flynn accepts it, he cannot deny that that is the scenario which would follow insofar as the time frame is concerned.

Senator Flynn: The event will prove you wrong.

Senator Olson: I would now like to deal with one or two questions that were raised in the course of the debate by Senator Macquarrie.

Honourable senators, I have to say that I enjoyed Senator Macquarrie's comments immensely. I appreciate the fact that he, as he said a number of times in his discourse, had fairly short notice in which to prepare such an important speech on such an important matter. I think he did very well under the circumstances.

I also have to say, however, that in the course of his speech he answered almost all of the questions he raised. For example, he asked: What is the hurry before Christmas? He then went on to talk about a number of studies which have been conducted, particularly one that is commonly referred to as the Goldenberg-Lamontagne study, which was really a report of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. That report was brought before this house, and no action has been taken on it. I suggest to him that the motion that is now before this chamber is appropriate follow-up action to what was contained in the recommendations of that good and useful committee report.

Senator Macquarrie made a great deal of the matter of procedure in this chamber and suggested that another chamber should not be involved in that procedure. I have to remind him, however, that the most important parts of the terms of reference do require positive action by both the House of Commons and this house before anything can be initiated. For example, the committee must include in its recommendations a number of things, among them the method of selection, the powers, the length of term for senators, the distribution of seats, and any other matters that the committee considers to be relevant. All of those things require joint action by both houses before they can be achieved or, I suppose, even before they can be proposed as an action taken under the amending formula. Therefore, I suggest to Senator Macquarrie that he made one of the better arguments for the concept that it is essential that the other house be involved in any constitutional amendments that may be made to those major terms of reference.

I have tried to give my point of view to the effect that there are some matters that do not require a constitutional amendment and that we can deal with in this house. These would be matters of our own internal procedure. I expressed the hope that we would indeed consider those kinds of things.

In reply to Senator Deschatelets, I agree with most of his argument with respect to the process of the joint committee's activities. I think he indicated that it was an opportune time and that that process would be a useful follow-up to the work that has been done by the committees in the Senate over the years, particularly the latest one reported in 1980.

Honourable senators, there is much more that I could say, but the hour is reasonably late. In conclusion, I simply want to say that I appreciate the contributions made by those who have participated in the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Unanimously.

Senator Flynn: Abstentions.

Motion agreed to.

THE ENVIRONMENT

MANITOBA—SHOAL LAKE INDIAN BAND—ALLEGED DUMPING OF SEWAGE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have one or two questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

The first question—and he may well wish to take it as notice—is: Can he confirm that in recent days the Shoal Lake Indian Band has dumped five truckloads of sewage waste into Shoal Lake near the intake which supplies water for the city of Winnipeg?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe I heard the question correctly, and, if the honourable senator is right, I shall have to take it as notice. I shall need time to check into the matter.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, while the minister is making his inquiries—and I confess that newspaper accounts relate to several matters connected with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—would he determine whether federal permission was given to the band for this dumping or any kind of dumping? Would he also ascertain whether the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office has completed its study of the general problem of sewage disposal by the Shoal Lake Band, and, if not, why not? Perhaps the minister could bring us up to date on that matter, because it is an ongoing and brewing problem.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am aware of the whole problem—if I may put it that way—with respect to a number of negotiations that have been going on but which have not been completed. I will certainly take the two additional questions as notice. However, I expect that before they can be answered with precision some further discussion and negotiation may be required. In other words, a final agreement has not been reached. That may prevent my giving the usual immediate response to the last two questions.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I fully understand the minister's response. If he is unable to give a detailed reply, perhaps an update on the situation would be of some help.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will get as much information as I can.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

PURCHASE OF CANADIAN TRUCKING COMPANIES BY AMERICAN INTERESTS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning the Cabinet approval of a FIRA decision to allow the purchase by Roadway Express, the largest trucking company in the United States, of Harkema Express Incorporated of Ontario, in view of the fact that a similar, if not identical, application by IU International, in the United States, to buy Canadian Motorways was turned down about a year and a half ago.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall look into that matter also. To the extent that the question can be answered without revealing, in the economic sense, confidential information supplied to FIRA, I will certainly provide as much information as I can.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I fully understand the fact that I shall not receive confidential cabinet information, but perhaps we can get a squaring of the two applications, as to whether one is good and the other is bad, and the reason for the proposed purchase. I raise the question in view of the decision to support, for example, the Maislin trucking firm with Canadian tax dollars. Did the government, in assessing the Roadways purchase, assess the serious damage that would be sustained by a company like Maislin and the rest of the industry in Canada?

Senator Olson: I shall also take that question as notice, but I would like to clarify, for the record, that the support given to Maislin Transport was in the nature of an underwritten guarantee rather than a direct subsidy.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is one that has been asked on a number of occasions. Since we are now approaching the Christmas recess and the end of the year, I would like the Leader of the Government to inform us of the status of the trans-Quebec and Maritimes pipeline and its proposed extension to the Altantic provinces.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe there was a fairly complete update given on this project several weeks ago. It was to the effect that a certain amount of the engineering as well as a number of other things would proceed as supported by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I shall take the question as notice and find out whether there has been any change since the updated report was given, approximately three months ago.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I fully appreciate the fact that an update was given to a similar question a few months ago and perhaps even a few weeks ago. What bothers me however, and what I would like to know is whether the Government of Canada is still as committed to building a gas pipeline across the Atlantic Provinces from Quebec City to Halifax as it was, and whether or not that commitment stands regardless of what happens off Sable Island. I understand that the pipeline companies are now considering construction of a pipeline which would bring gas west from Nova Scotia rather than east from western Canada.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what has just been described is a possibility because of some very encouraging discoveries recently, in addition to a very active exploration and development program off the coast of Nova Scotia. The government commitment remains that certain areas, described earlier under the National Energy Program, are assured of having natural gas available. That commitment is still as valid as it ever was. The question, of course, is as to the area from which the gas should be supplied. That was described in the update prepared by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources some time ago. Another element that has changed is that some of the alternate fuels, such as residual oil and so on, have declined rather sharply in price since that time.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, that is the reason I am asking these questions. I would really like to know what is going on because the people in New Brunswick—and I suppose it comes as no surprise to the minister—were inclined, at least, over the past few months, to believe the Premier of New Brunswick, who was saying that there will never be a gas pipeline built through New Brunswick.

Senator Olson: I would not accept that kind of speculation as having any validity.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF MINISTER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, as I have a few questions for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, could the Leader of the Government tell me whether he will be in the chamber tonight?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I do not believe that Senator Perrault will be here during the Question Period tonight. Senator Petten informs me that he will be here later.

Senator Asselin: After the Question Period?

Senator Olson: It depends on how long Question Period lasts.

TRANSPORT

QUEBECAIR—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether the Minister of Transport today released a report regarding the future of Quebecair?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I will have to inquire. I am not sure that he released a report on his interpretation of the future of Quebecair. However, I am advised by Senator Frith, who is usually well informed, that he believes the Minister of Transport made a statement in the other place today. If that is so, that statement will be available to Senator Asselin early in the morning.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a question for my leader in the Senate concerning the Garrison Dam project. Over recent months I have asked more or less the same question on numerous occasions, and a number of members of the opposition, including, in particular, Senator Roblin, have also asked questions concerning the Garrison Dam project. We ask these questions because we are concerned about what might happen to Manitoba's wildlife and game fish if the Garrison Dam project proceeds.

I have the feeling that the Government of Canada is not taking these questions seriously, and that may be because they do not, in essence, understand the problem.

Just about one month ago we were heartened to hear that the United States Senate had cancelled a $4 million program of financial aid for the Garrison Dam project; but just yesterday they did a turnabout and approved another $4 million so that the work that has been in progress for several years on the project can be continued once more. In my opinion, this amounts to nothing more than a repetition of their annual attempts to send their unwanted waters into Manitoba, infiltrating our waters, spoiling our wildlife sanctuaries and the fresh fish we prize so highly. Not only is this to the detriment of the people of Manitoba; it affects many people in the whole of Canada.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that the question I put in October remains essentially unanswered, and it is my firm impression that the Government of Canada cannot be making the appropriate representations to the Government of the United States with respect to this serious matter, when that government continues to make money available to that project. Frankly, the people of Manitoba find these things hard to believe. For myself, I can hardly find words strong enough to express the sense of urgency I feel with respect to representations—appropriate representations—being made to the American government to stop this project once and for all. They must be made to realize how seriously detrimental the Garrison Dam project will be to the people of Manitoba and even to the people of Canada as a whole. Moreover, if we allow them to go ahead unchecked in this matter, we will hardly be able to stop them doing anything else in respect of our fresh waters. I feel this question is urgent because we will be adjourning within a day or two and will not be returning until the middle of January.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to reassure Senator Guay—

Hon. Martial Asselin: It's about time.

• (2015)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to reassure Senator Guay, as I have done on a number of previous occasions, that the Government of Canada takes the matter very seriously. Very intense and serious representations have been made, and continue to be made, to the United States Administration and Congress respecting this matter.

I think we understand the importance of this diversion—if it comes about—to those who will be directly affected, the residents of Manitoba. Senator Guay should not think that we are not taking this matter seriously. Many negotiations are carried on with respect to international matters, and in many cases, it is more fruitful and beneficial that a day-to-day commentary on such negotiations should not appear in the press. I hope that Senator Guay understands that.

I understand clearly Senator Guay's concern, and so do the other ministers who are directly involved. We understand how this is perceived by the residents of Manitoba. For this reason serious negotiations have been conducted and strong representations have been made.

Senator Guay: I appreciate the comments made by the leader, but speaking on behalf of the people of Manitoba, it seems that we are becoming affected slowly but surely every day, every year. Again, $4 million means a lot. The Garrison is already coming closer to the boundaries of Manitoba and is already infiltrating its waters. I think that it is urgent that we act now and not simply say that we are concerned and aware of the problem. I think something must be done, and done immediately.

Senator Olson: I accept Senator Guay's representations as being well founded and serious. I will ensure that they are conveyed to the appropriate ministers.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I was not aware that this question was going to be asked this evening, so I did not prepare myself for this before attending this evening's sitting.

As a former Joint Chairman of the International Joint Commission I know where the commission stood when this question was originally raised. Would the Leader of the Government ascertain whether that position has changed since December 21, 1973? I will be satisfied if the question is taken as notice.

[Senator Guay.]

Senator Olson: I do not think that there has been a significant change in that position, but since you are asking a question regarding the position of the IJC as opposed to the United States administration, I shall take it as notice.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That's a good question.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to support as heartily as I can the interventions of Senator Guay and Senator Robichaud. Senator Guay has been zealous in raising this matter in the Senate on a regular basis, and Senator Robichaud made an important contribution to this matter when he was the Joint Chairman of the Interntional Joint Commission.

The point I wish to make to my honourable friend is this; I appreciate the orthodox reply he has given, namely, that the government is working quietly through channels and that something will be done to ameliorate the situation. But the unfortunate truth is that the orthodox system is simply not working. So I ask the Leader of the Government to give consideration to this approach.

Last year a parliamentary delegation representing the federal government and the Government of Manitoba visited the Congress of the United States to discuss the matter with members of the House of Representatives. I was pleased to note that it was the House of Representatives which deleted this amount of $4 million, which is the item which attracted attention in the appropriation bill when it was in that house.

While I am not certain that we can give the entire credit to the parliamentary delegation that went down from Canada to discuss this matter with the members of the House of Representatives, nevertheless good results followed, so I assume that something happened as a result of that visit.

What happened this time, however, was that the United States Senate restored the $4 million that gave rise to Senator Guay's observations. Will the government consider whether it would serve a valuable purpose to send a Canadian parliamentary delegation to the United States to visit with members of the United States Senate? If we have the same luck that we had when we visited with the members of the House of Representatives, perhaps we can advance the cause of those who think that the Garrison, as designed, presents a danger to the ecology of the province of Manitoba.

• (2020)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as Senator Roblin and, I think, Senator Guay pointed out, this project has been funded and then had the funds withdrawn several times in the past few years. I believe that there have been some positive signs from time to time from the administration, quite apart from either House of Congress in the United States, of a desire to accommodate the wishes of Canada and the people of Manitoba. I cannot give an undertaking that such a delegation will be set up, but I will take it as a representation with respect to that matter.

I am not sure that I would agree that what Senator Roblin has described as the orthodox method of diplomatic negotiations has been entirely unsuccessful. I know that there has been a change in the last few days, which Senator Guay referred to, with some funding being restored. Nevertheless, it has been on and off—I am not sure I can remember how many times—a number of times.

Senator Roblin: I wish I could be as optimistic as my honourable friend. What happened as a result of the Senate vote in the United States is that we are back at square one. All the work that was done in the last few years by parliamentary delegations and others to persuade the House of Representatives as to the merits of our cause was reversed by the action of the Senate. The point I want to make to my honourable friend—

Senator Robichaud: You mean the Senate of the United States.

Senator Roblin: Yes, not this Senate but the Senate of the United States. This Senate is doing its level best to deal with the matter properly.

The point that I am trying to make is that the American system of government does not lend itself to dealing with the State Department and the executive alone. Canadians have been very slow to seize on that fact. Other countries—the Japanese in particular—keep a constant lobby in Washington, not to deal with the executive, but to deal with the Congress and to deal with senators and members of the House of Representatives because each one of those people, as my honourable friend knows very well, is an independent power centre. It is quite different from the party system we have here. If we want to influence American political opinion and we overlook the Congress, we are overlooking the people who have the final word in so many instances.

Therefore, I say to my honourable friend that that is what I mean when I say the orthodox system of approach does not fill the bill—it does not get the results we want, at least in this instance. I urge him to consider the advisability of taking a more direct approach to the American Congress, which is the master in this particular situation.

Senator Olson: I will be brief, but I do not think that Senator Roblin really ought to—perhaps the right word is "depreciate"—

Hon. David Walker: Deprecate.

Senator Olson: —deprecate—perhaps both words would apply—efforts that have been made by Canadians in making representations to the United States houses. I have been involved in some of them, and I know that Senator Roblin and several other senators have been party to that. In addition, I am also aware that the Canadian Embassy in Washington does, in fact, make representation from time to time, and perhaps almost all the time, to both of those power centres that Senator Roblin described. The difference, of course, is that it is not a high profile. I can understand that, if a delegation goes to Washington, that visit will get more press attention than will some representations made by officers of the Canadian Embassy.

I appreciate the difference but, again, I will take it under consideration. However the existence of the power centres and where they are located in Washington is well known to the Canadian Embassy and the representatives of the ministries who go there from time to time.

Senator Roblin: I do not know whether my honourable friend is deliberately missing the point, but he is certainly succeeding—he is missing the point.

I am quite sure the Canadian ambassador does the best job he can; he is a man of high reputation. I am quite sure that, when my honourable friend was a minister with responsibilities which took him to Washington, he did the best he could. However, neither he nor the Canadian ambassador made it a practice, as we did, to canvass the members of the House of Representatives; that has very seldom been done.

I will not say that the committee of which I speak, which went down last year, is the only body that has done this, but, so far as I know—and perhaps some of the Atlantic senators will correct me if I am wrong in this—with the exception of dealing with the Americans on the fisheries question, this is the first time that Canadian legislators have visited with American legislators; that is the point I am making. To make representation, at other levels in the case of the Garrison did not prove successful, sincere as they may have been.

In the case of the delegation of which I speak, I think they were successful in getting members of the House of Representatives to change their minds on the subject, and I want to do the same thing with the Senate.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I understand the honourable senator wants us to raise a higher profile.

Senator Roblin: No, it is not a question of a higher profile.

Senator Olson: I want the honourable senator to know that I have been to Washington on at least one occasion and have met with more than a dozen senators in one day. I know that other people were there doing the same thing on a particular issue. There have been several such meetings—not just one. I would not like my friend to leave the impression on the record here that that practice has not gone on in the past.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend is not correct. I do not know when a delegation of Canadian parliamentarians went to visit American legislators except for, perhaps, two instances—one to do with fish and one to do with the Garrison. That is quite a different thing from ministerial and other representations. It is not a question of profile; it is question of contact between legislators.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want to carry on the discussion. I have to tell Senator Roblin that I do know of some other delegations.

Senator Roblin: Well, good for you.

Senator Olson: There was one dealing with agriculture, for example.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is it not done every year by the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary group?

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED ARMS REDUCTION BY U.S.S.R.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

We heard some positive news this morning in that the new leader of the U.S.S.R. is reported to have made an overture to the United States to the effect that Russia is prepared to reduce its deployment of SS-20 missiles against western Europe provided that the United States does not go ahead with the deployment of the Pershing II series missiles.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It is blackmail on the part of the Soviets.

Senator Bosa: I am sorry, but I did not understand that interjection.

An Hon. Senator: Ask your question.

Senator Bosa: Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate in a position to share some information with other senators in connection with this matter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have had no additional information from the Department of External Affairs in this regard. I heard the news, as mentioned by Senator Bosa, last night and again this morning. However, I have not had an opportunity to look into this matter.

I will take the question as notice and will ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can, indeed, furnish more detail respecting the "offer," if that is what you want to call it, made by the leader of the Soviet Union.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF MINISTER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the Leader of the Government tell us if we are to be deprived of the presence of Senator Argue this evening?

I have another report to give him in connection with the Argue proposal on the Crow. I am a little disappointed that he is not here to receive it.

An Hon. Senator: A non-proposal.

Senator Roblin: May we expect him?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I think Senator Argue will be here later this evening, but if Question Period is over perhaps Senator Roblin will have to wait until Question Period tomorrow to deliver his report. I am quite sure Senator Argue will be here tomorrow.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We could revert to Question Period.

[Senator Olson.]

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

LUMBER INDUSTRY—EFFECT OF DEVALUATION OF SWEDISH KRONA

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning the position of the Canadian lumber industry.

I am sure the minister is aware that the lumber industry is facing some uncertainty and difficult times, if only as a result of threatened legislative action in the United States. However, there is also a serious problem posed by the recent devaluation of the Swedish Krona. Has the government done a study to indicate what the impact of that action would be on the Canadian lumber industry, and what action does the government propose to take to offset those negative effects?

● (2030)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have a report with me. I do not know whether one has been prepared on the basis that Senator Murray has described, but I am sure that I can request a report and that there are people in the Ministry of International Trade who will be looking into this matter.

The Honourable Senator Murray and I are both aware that a somewhat analogous situation arose, at the time of a devaluation relative to the American dollar, in which the east coast fishing industry was adversely affected. We are conscious of the possible effects of such a situation.

I know that there are other actions being speculated upon in various parts of the United States respecting what has been a significant downturn in their overall lumber requirements. I have to say that we in Canada are extremely concerned about this matter. We hope that it will not lead to a lot of protectionist action. On a number of occasions we have seen that everybody loses once we start down that road.

EDUCATION

SITUATION OF POST-SECONDARY FINANCING

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and has to do with last February's conference on the economy. That conference turned out to be less successful than had been expected. The Prime Minister had announced a new approach on the part of his government with respect to federal participation in post-secondary education financing. A few days later, a document was sent to the provinces to explain this new position. Discussions were to be held in the following months with a view to reaching a conclusion in September because the existing agreements will end next March. Can the Leader of the Government give us a progress report on the discussions which are supposed to have been held? What conclusions were reached at the end of those discussions?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps the best thing I can do, in response to Senator Tremblay's question, is to refer it to the Minister of Finance. He would have been profoundly involved in these discussions over the past few weeks.

As honourable senators are aware, only a few days ago there was a meeting of the Ministers of Finance and federal government officials. It may be that the minister can indicate whether there was any further progress made at that meeting.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: I have a supplementary. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that the discussions mentioned by the Prime Minister were supposed to involve the Secretary of State on behalf of the federal government and the provincial Ministers of Education. They were not necessarily to involve finance ministers of both levels of government. I believe that the Prime Minister referred to such discussions in his recent reply to the Nova Scotia premier who had suggested an economic conference on behalf of all premiers. The Prime Minister replied that such a conference was not necessary. He pointed out that sector-based discussions were now going on, including meetings between the Secretary of State and the ministers of education concerning financial arrangements for post-secondary education. In any case, my question still applies whether or not I am wrong about the identity of the ministers involved. These negotiations should be completed in the near future since the financial arrangements will expire at the end of next March. I would be very interested in obtaining as much information as possible about the progress made, so that we may exchange views in this regard, if only during the debate of Senator Macquarrie's motion concerning the future financing of post-secondary education.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I did understand the question. I want to say that, of course, the Secretary of State and the Ministers of Education would have been involved in some of these discussions. I believe, however, that the first part of the question was primarily a financial matter. That is why I gave that response.

I will take as notice the further explanation which Senator Tremblay is seeking.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: I have a supplementary. I want to point out to the Leader of the Government that the new approach suggested by the Prime Minister would make a simple matter of financing a question of defining jointly objectives for post-secondary education. He made such a definition something of a prerequisite for continued financing by the federal government. It is on this point that I wish to know how the discussions are proceeding.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I understood Senator Tremblay's interpretation. I am not quite sure, however, that that is the only interpretation that could be made.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUNNYBROOK HOSPITAL, TORONTO—SUPERANNUATION OF EMPLOYEES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Lang on November 16, 1982, concerning the superannuation benefits of Veterans Affairs employees who transferred with Sunnybrook Hospital to the jurisdiction of the University of Toronto on October 1, 1966.

It is a long and detailed answer, and, if it would be acceptable, I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The pension portion of the transfer agreement between the federal government and the university did not contain the commitment which Senator Lang indicates. In fact, the agreement required Sunnybrook Hospital to establish a pension plan for the employees transferring from Veterans Affairs, which would provide rights and benefits not less favourable than those that were provided under the terms of the pension plan of the federal government as they existed immediately prior to the date of the hospital transfer. Consequently, Sunnybrook Hospital set up a special pension plan at the time the hospital transferred, which contained those provisions, thereby meeting that commitment.

It was on this basis that monies were transferred from the federal pension fund to the special pension plan fund, in accordance with the terms of the reciprocal transfer agreement negotiated between the parties under the provisions of the Public Service Superannuation Act that were in effect at that time.

Over the years several changes have been made to the federal pension plan, the most notable of which was the introduction of legislation in 1970 which increased the contributions of the employees and provided pension adjustments related to increases in the cost of living. After a few years, as the value of these adjustments increased, former Veterans Affairs employees who had retired under the Sunnybrook special pension plan felt that they too should have their pensions adjusted. However, the special plan could not provide increases to those pensions as there were not sufficient funds in that plan to cover the additional cost. The Sunnybrook authorities appealed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs in 1979 to see if the federal government could offer some financial support to the special plan so that former federal employees who had retired, or would be retiring under the plan, could have their pensions adjusted.

As a consequence, the federal government has been considering whether the original reciprocal transfer agreement should be amended, and whether any additional funds could be provided to the special plan. In the process of this deliberation, an analysis of the pension records of the approximately 700 former employees who had transferred into the special plan has been required. This is a time-consuming process since it involves the location and review of the records, followed by detailed actuarial calculations. Unfortunately, about one-third of these records are no longer available, given the lapse of time since 1966 and the fact that many of them were destroyed as they were no longer needed by the federal plan. It will now be necessary to contact the administrators of the special plan to see whether they can provide the missing information.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has asked me to advise Senator Lang that he has been informed that the completion of the analysis of the pension records is proceeding with all possible dispatch. It is expected that by the end of March sufficient detail will be available to provide the Treasury Board ministers with the information they require in order to reach a decision on this matter.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT

BILL C-647, TO CHANGE THE NAME OF THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF SAINT-MICHEL—THIRD READING

Hon. Azellus Denis moved the third reading of Bill C-647, to change the name of the electoral district of Saint-Michel.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, before proceeding with third reading, I would like to remind you that when the bill received second reading, I asked my colleague to let us know at the third reading stage what the basic reasons were for passing the bill in the other place and for changing the name of the riding. Since we know that as a result of the latest revision of the electoral map, the name of the riding of Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic will be changed to Ahuntsic, can we expect another bill to be introduced in order to have the name proposed by the bill's sponsor? Did the bill's sponsor obtain first-hand information and can he give us any sensible reason for passing this bill on third reading?

Senator Denis: As I said yesterday, Ahuntsic is the largest part of the riding. The request originated in 1979, under my honourable friend Senator Asselin's Government. Unfortunately, that Government was defeated, and the bill died on the order paper.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Asselin: Is that the only reason?

Senator Denis: I believe Mrs. Sauvé was the member for Ahuntsic until 1979. At that time, the riding was called Ahuntsic. That particular area has the largest business section in the riding. I may add that the Ahuntsic subway station is the terminal of our famous metro. Half of the riding is in this area. So people who were used to living and working in the riding of Ahuntsic would appreciate it if the riding could once again be called Ahuntsic.

Senator Asselin: We did not say that. My honourable colleague was supposed to find out from the other place whether a petition requesting the change had been submitted to the member, but none was made.

Senator Denis: That is not necessary, since the member in question represents the riding of Saint-Michel, and anything connected with the riding of Saint-Michel, including the Ahuntsic portion, concerns the member who represents his constituents.

Senator Asselin: It is just a whim.

Senator Denis: Perhaps.

Senator Asselin: He is wrong.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed, on division.

INTERPRETATION ACT BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT CANADA LABOUR CODE

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the second reading of the Bill S-30, intituled: "An Act to amend certain Acts in relation to Canada Day".—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Stand.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No. We have been standing it for a month.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is unwilling to oblige. He is not in an obliging mood these days, judging from last night's performance.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We had better make it clear where we stand now.

Senator Roblin: I believe the Deputy Leader of the Government wants to make it quite clear that he does not intend to become more obliging as the session comes to an end. I expect that tomorrow he will give us another demonstration of his inflexibility of purpose.

However, if that is the way he wants to approach this matter, then I suppose he has the numbers. As I am unable to persuade him by my eloquence to change his mind on this subject, I will save myself the trouble of trying to do so. I simply say that if this bill is considered further in this chamber, it should be dealt with in such a way as to make it more complete in its approach to the problem that it attempts to solve.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, it is my view that this bill should be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to ascertain the difference between it and the first one introduced by the government. The Speaker explained to us that this legislation was quite different from the first one, in that it included the totally new aspects as compared to the amendments I moved to Bill 201 on second reading. The only way to check this is to refer the bill to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. In that connection, I would like to have the advice of the Senate's legal counsel. He originally pointed to some defects that were of a minor nature, in my view. But if indeed this affects the substance of the bill, as the Speaker so decided, it is all the more important that we scrutinize the changes and amend the bill accordingly.

The bill as it now stands leaves in the statutes the title "Dominion Day" instead of "Canada Day", or "Jour du Dominion" rather than "Jour du Canada". This has not been changed. It is an omission that had been pointed out by the Senate's legal counsel; even though it is not substantial, it should be amended in my view. If it is substantial, as the Speaker suggested, it is all the more important to make a change. I would appreciate having the sponsor of the bill tell us if he agrees that, when the bill receives second reading, it should be referred to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, as I proposed earlier.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not believe that the bill should be referred to committee. The bill was introduced in explicit compliance with an undertaking given at the time of the passage of the bill changing the name from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day".

Senator Flynn: False.

Senator Frith: The undertaking was then given that the consequential amendments to the Bills of Exchange Act and other acts that were not part of the bill that changed the name from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day" would be introduced, and Senator Olson, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, introduced the bill in compliance with that undertaking. The bill now before us is one that makes the whole operation complete.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: It is purely routine and is consequential housekeeping. It amends other acts in order to make them comply with the change in the name from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day". For that reason I consider it unnecessary for the bill to go to committee.

Concerning the question of any previous ruling by the Speaker, I do not think that is relevant to whether or not the bill should go to committee.

Senator Flynn: I did not say that.

Senator Frith: I said it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

MOTION TO REFER BILL TO COMMITTEE DEFEATED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C. that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Monday, November 8, the debate on the motion of Senator Olson for second reading of Bill S-31, to limit shareholding in certain corporations.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I do not know whether the Leader of the Government is now in a position to inform us what he intends to do with this bill; does he insist on proceeding with it now, in the circumstances?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Well, honourable senators, tonight is the second last sitting of this chamber before the recess and we will be sitting for a while tomorrow. There is a possibility that Bill C-141, dealing with certain human rights matters, will come to us in time for us to deal with it tomorrow. Apart from that, Bill S-31 is the last item of legislation on our Order Paper and we would like to have it pass second reading, which is the stage it has now reached, and send it to committee as opposed to moving that it be given third reading. In my view it would not proceed further than that in this session of Parliament. As a matter of fact, I doubt that there would even be any sittings of the committee, which, incidentally, would probably be the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. That would mean that it would have to be dealt with again in the new session. I cannot give you a precise date for prorogation and the beginning of a new session, but it would probably be some days after January 17.

If we were to follow that course, that would leave us in a position where we would have disposed of all the business on the Order Paper. We could therefore adjourn tomorrow until the 24th of January, subject to recall because the other place, after returning on January 17, might pass some bills to us during that week.

Just to reiterate, I can assure Honourable Senator Flynn with respect to Bill S-31 that second reading stage and reference to committee is as far as that bill will go. I could go into the reasons behind that decision, but I believe Senator Flynn knows the argument I would make, even though he may not agree with it.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: The Honourable Leader of the Government mentioned that we would return on the 24th. That is a Monday. Why would we not return on Tuesday, January 25, which would be our normal practice?

Senator Olson: I have no particular objection to either the 24th or the 25th, but I have to caution senators that there are at least three bills, C-131, C-132 and C-133, which we should attempt to deal with reasonably expenditiously if they come from the House of Commons. As they have not yet been passed, I do not think we can anticipate what day they will receive third reading in the other place.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Well, they will not be passed before tomorrow.

Senator Olson: They could be.

Senator Asselin: That will not happen.

Senator Olson: If my honourable friend were to use all of his persuasive powers on the opposition in the other place, I am sure he could get them to pass those bills tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Not if we are as successful with them as we are with you.

Senator Olson: At any rate, my feeling at the moment is that they will not be passed in the other place before we adjourn, and I doubt that they will be passed there during the first two or three days after their return on January 17. However, I think we should be in a position shortly after that to receive those bills. I do not want to outline the difficulties or problems involved with respect to the limitation on the indexing contained in those three bills, but it is a fact that later on in January a problem could develop.

The computer that issues the cheques must know which rule is to be applied with respect to the indexing for at least the month of January. That is why the caveat is there.

I think I have been open and frank, and if it were preferable, I suppose that we could adjourn tomorrow until January 25, which is a Tuesday, again subject to recall with the usual notice if there is legislation to deal with.

To get back to where I started, this is the last piece of legislation on the Order Paper and I hope that all honourable senators join with us in passing it so that we can adhere to the possible timetable I have just described.

Senator Flynn: My understanding is that Senator Langlois wishes to speak on this, so I am prepared to yield to him if he wishes to speak at this point.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: I must leave now.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, since the Leader of the Government is using brute force and his majority as well as traditional subservience—

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Conservative!

Senator Flynn: And one of the best examples is that of Senator Robichaud.

He reminds me of the member who said to the Speaker of the House of Commons, "It is quite difficult to vote when the Prime Minister is not here to tell us how." Here, as soon as the Leader of the Government rises, Senator Robichaud knows precisely how he should vote.

Senator Robichaud: As on capital punishment—

Senator Flynn: At any rate that bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

[English]

Would I be interested in what you are saying, Senator Guay?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I would be pleased to repeat what I said. I said that in our case we are pleased to follow our leader, but in the other place and here the opposition have a hell of a time following their leaders because they don't know where they are.

Senator Flynn: I don't think that that is very revelant.

[Translation]

As a matter of fact, Senator Guay reminds me of Panurge's sheep. My good friend Senator Guay behaves exactly like them. He does not mind telling the government off good and proper once in a while, but when the time comes for him to toe the line, he does it.

Senator Guay: Once again, honourable senators, since the Leader of the Opposition has asked me to state my case, I am glad to do so. He has just accused us of behaving like sheep. We have principles and we are ready to stand behind them. If honourable senators opposite are using the word "sheep" so often, it is because they do not know how to speak any other way. They think that they are very clever and witty when they are using it. We are people of principles and we are ready to stand behind them. We know we are right and we are ready to answer to the Canadian people for our action. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition will reconsider his position and stop calling us "sheep", seeing in us principled people like our forefathers were.

Senator Flynn: If Senator Guay is as convinced as he says, it is even worse.

Senator Guay: We know how to take a joke.

Senator Flynn: Try and smile. Coming back to what I was saying, Bill S-31 was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs which has tabled its report. Everybody has read this report with considerable attention. It is clear that this bill leaves much to be desired both as to its basic principles as well as its practical application.

What I have urged the Leader of the Government and the Senate, alas again to no avail, is not to force us to vote on this on second reading. As long as we do not know what final shape and form the government will give to this bill, what would be the use for the Senate to support its subject matter. The Leader of the Government has just indicated that this bill, following second reading, would be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. He also tells us that this bill will die on the order paper. He tells us that another bill will be introduced next session.

Indeed, why should we vote on a bill which will never be passed? The only explanation given by the Leader of the Government is that he wants to retain the date of November 2 to determine the legality or illegality of the purchase of shares by the government of a province or an agency of a provincial government in a company covered by this bill, that is a company directly or indirectly involved in interprovincial or international transport.

We are well aware that this date is retained because as long as this bill is before Parliament, it will be retained by the mere fact that the bill is before us. Nothing is changed by the fact that the bill is at the first rather than at the second reading stage. If the bill must die, the government will obviously have to reintroduce it later on. But until this session ends and a new one begins, this date of November 2 is fully retained.

[English]

Senator Olson: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question? I have never questioned whether or not the validity of that stays at any stage from the day it was introduced insofar as this session is concerned. What I did have some problem with was the period between prorogation and the beginning of a new session. I wonder if you could address that, because that is really the important part of it.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: I am quite willing to do so. I do not understand what difference it makes whether the bill gets second reading or not if the session ends before it is passed, not only by the Senate, but also by the House of Commons. Some time will elapse between the end of this session and the beginning of the next one. The bill has the same value as long as the session continues, whether we are at the first, the second or the third reading stage, as long as the bill has not been passed by the House of Commons. That is quite clear.

What you want us to do is to pass a bill which is clearly defective, about which basic objections have been made and to which the minister has told us that he will make some changes. We do not know the extent or the substance of these changes. They might be very extensive and significant.

The minister has already met a representative from Ontario. He will also be meeting people from Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland and perhaps even Manitoba. As a matter of fact only New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island made no representations. Why should we be asked to commit ourselves at this stage? Indeed, we know there is but one problem. The minister refused to recognize this the first time he appeared before the committee. It has been proved before the committee that the only purpose of this legislation is to prevent the purchase of Canadian Pacific Limited shares by La Caisse de dépôt et de placement du Québec. Truly, what the minister had in mind was a bill that would read as follows: La Caisse de dépôt et de placement du Québec cannot buy more than ten per cent of the capital stock of Canadian Pacific Limited. This bill will come into force as of the day it receives Royal Assent. This is the only justification for this bill. As I said, the minister would not admit it, but it has been proven that a letter was sent by Mr. Burbidge to the Prime Minister. This is a fact. We asked for that letter to be tabled. We have not had it yet.

Mr. Burbidge's concern with Canadian Pacific's subsidiaries, CP Air and CP Rail, was that the Caisse de dépôt et de placement would acquire effective control of the company by holding more than ten per cent of the stock. We had the same concern with Power Corporation, whose involvement had reached 15 per cent. In fact he had made an agreement with Mr. Paul Desmarais in the hope that he would not buy more than 15 per cent, or go above his 15 per cent unless another group or person or institution should acquire more than 10 per cent. In fact, that is the purpose of this bill and it is very restrictive. The interprovincial or international transport problem was only an excuse to step in.

Mr. Ouellet does not like the Caisse de dépôt. The investment policy of the Caisse de dépôt du Québec is a matter which primarily concerns the Quebec National Assembly, and no one else. It is of no concern to this Parliament. Would the Canadian government's main concern be the investment policy of the Caisse de dépôt? However, there again we never had any proof that there was real concern of a company takeover in the area of transport. This does not change at all my point of view. It has never been shown—and the minister could never prove the opposite—that the holding of shares in a corporation dealing in transport and coming under federal jurisdiction, could create a problem. Regulatory agencies such as the Transport Commission or the National Energy Board, carry on their operations whoever is the owner of the shares.

[Senator Flynn.]

That was proven following the problem created by Alberta's purchase of Pacific Western. Indeed, in that respect the bill does not change anything about Pacific Western. Mr. Ouellet has even told us that he is prepared to make an exception in the case of Quebecair.

• (2120)

It becomes obvious that this bill was not introduced to deal with a transportation problem. It was found out in the committee for instance—and this is very significant—that this bill goes much farther than was originally intended. Should a company be involved in an issue of interprovincial or international transportation through one of its subsidiaries, even a taxi company operating between Hull and Ottawa, that company would fall within the ambit of this legislation.

Alcan was given as an example because the Saguenay Terminal Company which ships bauxite to Arvida holds 3 per cent of Alcan shares. The mere fact that Alcan has a subsidiary which is involved in maritime transportation brings Alcan under the jurisdiction of the law. They may not like the investment policies of the Caisse de dépôt, but once again that is a question which primarily concerns Quebec's National Assembly.

That is another problem. If it is also a problem related to the investment of pension funds with respect to the entire pension plan system, that cannot be the solution at all. This bill has nothing whatsoever to do with that question which becomes very important as we gain experience and as the number of contributors decreases as compared to the number of people who draw benefits. That is another matter.

In fact, this bill is almost nonsensical. It does not make any sense at all. Again, no one has shown that the national interest was involved. Speaking on television the other night, Mr. Trudeau came up with a rather fanciful explanation on the nature of Bill S-31.

He said: Imagine if the federal government were to purchase 50 per cent of the shares of a university or some CEGEP. Just imagine! Trying to compare the problem of Canadian Pacific Limited shares being bought by the Caisse de dépôt or by an agency of another provincial government, with the idea that the federal government could gain control of a university or a high school!

This clearly demonstrates that this legislation has been hastily put together. I believe it is the first time, at least in the 25 years I have been here, that I have seen a bill of such scope being introduced simply on the request of a person who happens to be the chairman of a large corporation. Obviously, it is simply intended to solve the problem of that particular company.

I am keenly interested in this problem of concerned managers who want to protect themselves. It happens all the time, in mutual funds companies as well.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: You did not discuss it with your colleague?

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It is me he is talking about.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Well, he was at one time, but he is not any longer. There is no problem there.

[English]

Senator Roblin: I never managed Canadian Pacific Limited. He gives me the credit for it, but I decline.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Well, personally, I deal with mutual funds companies.

Senator Flynn: This notion that management is supposed to be in a better position to serve a company's interests than a majority shareholder is a theory that has always seemed quite esoteric to me and hard to understand. In my opinion, the owner finds it more to his advantage to see to it that his company is profitable than the managers who, in most cases, hold very few shares and have only their positions to protect—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): And their salaries!

Senator Flynn: And their salaries indeed! Yet, their interests are far more limited, in my opinion, than those of the company shareholders.

For those reasons, it seems to me that the Leader of the Government should agree that debate on this bill be deferred, all the more so in view of the specific objections to the report of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

I would now like to draw your attention—to a rather amusing paragraph that makes fun of the government. It reads:

> By virtue of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act (1954), the Federal Government delegated its regulatory powers in the field of extra-provincial motor vehicle transportation to the provinces. However, the present Bill applies to companies engaged in such motor vehicle transportation. In addition, the Bill extends to companies engaged in transportation by air and water.

It appears there was no problem in handing over that area of jurisdiction to the provinces. I do not see why that should create any problems so far as transportation by air and water are concerned, if the government retains its regulatory agencies. In any event, Pacific Western has been told to carry on its partnership with the Government of Alberta. Quebecair will do the same with the Quebec government. I believe the Government of Newfoundland holds shares in Eastern Provincial Airlines. I may be wrong, but I believe that the provincial government has a substantial interest in that company.

In fact, that situation applied, as I said, to an individual case. This can be and shall be to a large extent corrected by the National Assembly. The latter is now considering a bill which will impose on the Caisse de dépôt et de placement du Québec all restrictions regarding disclosure of its operations like any other person acting on the securities market. It has even been said that we would go further. It may be that the percentage of shares that the Caisse de dépôt will be able to purchase in a given company will be reduced from 30 to 20 or even to 10 per cent. That is the problem of the National Assembly.

Can you imagine that we, the federal government, are going to amend, indirectly but efficiently, a legislation passed by the National Assembly which, to date, has not created any problem and which is being considered by Quebec parliamentarians? As I said often, Mr. Ouellet always seems to be saying: "This is a PQ organization". That is what he told me when I questioned him in committee. He said to me: If you wish to go along with PQ members—

This legislation has been passed in 1965 under Mr. Jean Lesage's government. This legislation was maintained under the government of Daniel Johnson, Jean-Jacques Bertrand, Mr. Bourassa and the present administration. Ironically, the Caisse de dépôt makes investments throughout Canada. We seem to be saying to them: Get back to Quebec, try to be a bit more separatist, a bit less pro-Canadian.

This situation is ridiculous. It is in the interest of the present government as well as the Senate, I believe, and also in the general interest not to ask us to accept the principle of this bill at this stage. We must wait and see how the situation will evolve when the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has met with officials from other provinces. The National Assembly, on the other hand, may be able to come up with solutions and will not take a position that creates problems, promotes confrontation and brings about undue squabbles.

Under these circumstances, I should like the Leader of the Government to tell me that he agrees to postpone this debate until we resume sitting in January. If he accepts this suggestion, it would be useful to make a formal proposal in this regard. But if he refuses it, I will move, seconded by Senator Roblin—and I shall continue in English so that it is readily understood—

> That the debate on Bill S-31 be adjourned until January 25, 1983, or until such time as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs reports on the meetings he has undertaken to have with those provinces which have expressed objections to the Bill.

[Translation]

I am ready to withdraw the motion if the Leader of the Government agrees that the bill can stand till then.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, if Senator Flynn is willing to withdraw the motion now and perhaps reintroduce it later, I would like to adjourn the debate on behalf of Senator Léopold Langlois.

Senator Asselin: He cannot speak, he is not here.

Senator Robichaud: I adjourn the debate on behalf of Senator Langlois.

Senator Flynn: I am willing to withdraw my motion if the motion to adjourn is agreed to.

Senator Robichaud: The motion can be reintroduced.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I find that situation somewhat confusing.

Senator Flynn: I will withdraw my motion. Senator Robichaud is moving the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Flynn is withdrawing his motion and I understand that Senator Robichaud is introducing a motion to adjourn.

Senator Flynn: On behalf of Senator Langlois.

The Hon. the Speaker: On behalf of Senator Langlois, Senator Robichaud, seconded by Senator Denis, moved the adjournment of the debate on the second reading of this bill. Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt that motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I do not wish to reflect on the vote that was taken tonight. I take full responsibility for the motion for adjournment of the debate that I made. I made that motion at the request of Senator Langlois, who told me that he had to take a plane at 10.20 this evening. He asked me to adjourn the debate on his behalf.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: If Senator Olson speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Flynn: Oh, no; forget it.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I just want to say a few words as a member of the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. We have heard the president of the Montreal Stock Exchange as well as the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the district of Montreal tell us that this bill was ill-conceived and purposeless. They asked the government to withdraw this legislation. Then, before the committee or in public statements, the minister, Mr. Ouellet, indicated that he was considering introducing at some time in the future another legislation which would better meet certain needs.

I want to add briefly that the leader of the Quebec Liberal Party in the National Assembly also said that he had played a part in setting up the Caisse de dépôt du Québec. He added that he also was opposed to some aspects of this legislation. I also want to point out that the constitutionality of this legislation was seriously questioned when considered by the committee. In conclusion, I shall quote from an editorial published in La Presse of Saturday, December 18, under Mr. Michel Roy's signature:

> Overwhelming evidence is piling up. Bill S-31 has failed. The minister André Ouellet has failed to convince politicians, provincial governments and business circles. He has also failed to enlighten public opinion. This piece of legislation to limit provincial shareholding in tansportation companies is ill-conceived, unfair, unrealistic and imperialistic. The whole thing has to be thrown out and started from scratch.

Under the circumstances, I would have preferred that the legislation be left as is. Since the Government House Leader stated his intention to proceed with second reading, I will have to vote against this legislation.

• (2140)

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, the question which for all practical purposes we must ask ourselves when we are invited to adopt the principle of this bill is as follows: Taking into account the fact that there will be amendments to this bill—the minister himself has already made a statement to that effect, and so did the Leader of the Government at one point, if I understood him correctly—we must wonder if these amendments will be of such a nature as to reasonably modify the principle of this bill.

In order to reply to this question, I shall first of all try to reply to the following one: Where, in this bill, is its principle expressed? I suggest that it is expressed in three separate places; I shall deal first of all with its form. It deals with the purchasing from a provincial agency of shares in an interprovincial or international corporation involved in the transportation of goods or passengers. I will come back later to this so-called interprovincial or international corporation. Clause 3 deals with the limitations on the purchasing of shares by provincial agencies. Clause 3 reads:

> Subject to section 6, no government shall hold or beneficially own more than ten per cent of the shares of any class of shares of a corporation.

From the way things are presented, it seems that a provincial agency would be allowed to hold 10 per cent of the shares of a corporation. We must seek elsewhere the extent of these limitations, more specifically in clause 5 which expresses the real principle. Clause 5 reads:

> Subject to section 6, where shares of a corporation that are held or beneficially owned by a government after November 3, 1982 were not held or beneficially owned by that government prior to that date, no person shall, in person or by proxy, exercise the voting rights pertaining to those shares.

Therein lies the true principle, for, so far as the principle is concerned, it is not the situation that prevailed as of November 3 that counts.

In this matter, as the minister stressed, there is no objection, there is no retroactivity, in the sense that a provincial agency holding shares as of November 2 does not lose its voting rights pertaining to its shares. In a matter such as this, the situation as of November 2 is not everlasting. Things will evolve. Those who manage securities buy, sell or buy back shares. Thus, over a period of many years, it is clause 5 that embodies precisely the principle.

The principle is that a provincial body is not entitled to acquire voting shares. The 10 per cent provided for in clause 3 is thus amended according to the actual principle.

So much for that angle, for that aspect of the principle contained in this bill, that is the voting right pertaining to shares. According to the principle, it is non-voting shares that may be acquired over a period of time under clause 3. Besides, that is what the minister expressed in his own way, which was very clear for that matter; we want in fact that the participation of provincial bodies be passive. This is a vivid description of the lack of voting right. So much for that aspect of the principle.

There is a second aspect to be considered. To what corporations does that principle embodied in clause 3 related to clause 5 apply? The situation seems to be presented from the viewpoint of a particular sector and in this connection, in the plain language he used before the committee or elsewhere, the minister has always pointed to the interprovincial or international transportation sector, but if one attempts to understand what it might mean in this bill, it is the definition of the word "corporation" that gives us the true meaning. And there, it can clearly be seen—the minister recognized it right away, and Senator Flynn mentioned it earlier,—that it is a group of transport companies which will in fact be affected, and their position in the overall economy is difficult to assess; according to the example given earlier by Senator Flynn all the companies involved probably represent half the economy. So, not only interprovincial or international transport is affected but a tremendous number of all economic activites in our country. This was a second aspect of the principle.

There is a third aspect which is not explicitly stated in the bill, but the minister, in its presentation to the committee said that this aspect reflected in fact the intent and the basic objective of the bill. The purpose of the bill is to protect federal jurisdictions over interprovincial or international transport, against any intrusion by provincial agencies or provinces, either directly or indirectly. It was pointed out by many people in committee, including Senator Langlois, that the purchase of shares in a company gives no jurisdiction, because if we are talking about jurisdiction between two levels of government, we mean legislative jurisdiction. The ownership of shares in a company confers no jurisdiction to a province. However, we have been told that the shareholders make important decisions. They may decide, for instance, to locate one of their plants in such and such a region. The Prime Minister himself has even mentioned the hypothetical situation where Aluminium Canada would decide to close Kitimak to concentrate all its operations in Quebec, which would go against the national interest, and when he gave this example, he supposed that the participation of the Caisse de dépôt could lead to such an action by Alcan. In addition, it should be pointed out that if the federal government believes that it has jurisdiction over the decisions of companies, it is because of its legislative jurisdiction that it believes it can use its powers to counter any provincial intervention which seems excessive. However, the government itself is faced with a very serious problem, namely, to what extent it can settle such issues. To take the example given by the Prime Minister himself of a company decision concerning the location of its plants which goes against the federal concept of national interest, what action should be taken in such a case? The federal government could simply say that, in the national interest, Alcan can no longer decide to locate its plants in such and such region. This is the logical conclusion in the example already mentioned. This involves the whole issue of regulatory powers concerning the decisions that companies can make under the existing legislation as to where to locate.

The problem is not so much that a provincial agency would own any amount of shares in the company. It is a matter of knowing whether decision-making will remain with the company or should be transferred to the government. That is the logic of the example given by the Prime Minister.

In my view, the principle of the bill is set out in the three aspects I have just referred to. I am now in a position to answer the question I raised at the outset.

Assuming there will be amendments, will they actually affect the principle of the bill? I submit that if those amendments are purely technical and relate for example to the type of declarations to be made by the companies, which is defined in subsequent clauses, then those amendments can only relate to the clauses I mentioned and in which the principle of the bill is embodied.

I come back now to the problem stated by our leader. If, therefore, amendments cannot but affect the principle, how would you otherwise change the definition of a corporation—the principle being engraved in this definition—how would you amend sections 3 and 5 since they contain the restriction which is to be imposed without affecting the principle at the same time? If, then, conceivable amendments will necessarily affect the principle, how could we be asked to agree to that principle? We take for granted that those amendments are coming. There is, I suggest, a kind of nonsense, of inconsistency in these terms.

I would like to make a last remark. The leader of the government told us why, in his opinion, we should agree to second reading of this bill. In fact, this is to maintain November 3 as a date. Considering how serious it is, from a logical viewpoint, as I said earlier, to agree to second reading of a bill, we must ask ourselves: Is there another way to achieve the desired results, maintaining November 3 as a date, so as to protect November 2? It seems to me that this is at least worth considering and the proposal made earlier by Senator Flynn, I suggest, applies to both sides of the coin in this case. It seems clear that postponing the second reading in January will protect that November 2 date since there will not be a new session. This is only an adjournment, and the present session will continue.

On the other hand, I believe that this will give us enough time to examine alternative means to get the same results the Leader of the Government wants to achieve. I extend that suggestion to him along the lines of what Senator Flynn said when he warned us not to get bogged down in such a way that the Senate would have to be inconsistent in future amendments if the principle had been accepted already. We should rather make good use of this period of time to examine other alternatives. Such is my suggestion to the Leader of the Government.

[Senator Tremblay.]

• (2150)

[English]

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I propose to vote for this bill on second reading because I agree with its generally stated principle, but I am also very concerned about some aspects of the bill which were referred to in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, of which I am a participating member. If the bill should come back from committee for third reading in its present form, I would vote against it. By the same token, if the bill should be re-introduced in the other place and then come to us in its present form, I would vote against it.

I do not think it is necessary, under the present circumstances and in view of the long study given to the bill by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, for me to elaborate on my objections now. But, to give an example, I am deeply concerned about the abrogation of voting rights of holders of shares whose holdings amount to less than 10 per cent. I do not object to the limitation of 10 per cent under the circumstances envisaged in the bill—namely, the limitation of the holding of 10 per cent of the shares. However, I do say that if we permit anyone to buy shares up to the 10 per cent level, they ought to have voting rights attached to them. I know that I am not alone among the members of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee in expressing these views.

So I hope that, if the bill comes back to us, careful attention will be given to this aspect of it and to one or two other aspects which have been referred to in the debate that has taken place here, including some of the things referred to by Senator Tremblay; though, obviously, my view of the bill does not coincide with his view of it. So I wanted to make this qualification, to say that while I vote for the general principle of the bill on second reading, I would not want to see it come into law without some significant changes.

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, what Senator Hicks just said is, more or less, what I have in mind. I must say, honestly, that having read thoroughly the report of the committee submitted by the chairman, Senator Neiman, it is my opinion that the committee went a bit far when it warned the Senate that this piece of legislation is too broad.

Nevertheless, I accept with reservations the explanations given by the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the date might be of importance. I still have my doubts on this matter, but I accept his point of view. It seems that he has information I do not have. I must say, along with Senator Hicks, that if a bill like this one ever comes before us again for third reading, I would have no choice but to vote against such legislation.

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Honourable senators, given the explanations of the Leader of the Government I will also vote in favour of second reading. I see that Senator Flynn is laughing, as he is wont to do. Even if he calls us a bunch of sheep, I think that Liberals have very often shown objectivity. We did in committee and again here, in this chamber. Taking into consideration the explanations given, if ever Bill S-31 comes before us again in its present form, I will also be voting against it.

Senator Flynn: Why not now?

Senator Rizzuto: I am not voting against it now because I consider that the Leader of the Government was quite clear. I disagree with him on only one point. That is when he says that we are going to vote second reading and that the bill will die on the order paper.

Personally, I believe that the session will end upon our return and that we will not have time to study the bill in committee. However, if we have time to refer the bill to the committee after the second reading, the committee could review those serious amendments which would make this piece of legislation a valuable measure in keeping with the interests of all Canadians.

So, if we have time during this session, that is what we should do. At the same time, I suggest to the Government Leader to see whether the minister concerned has met and consulted the premiers, or whether the people involved could appear again before the committee. In the meantime, if the committee found some valuable amendments, would those be carried out after consultation with Mr. Ouellet? Amendments could be made and the bill could come back here if time permits before the new session. That depends on the government. Why not pass this bill if it meets the expectations of a majority of senators.

I doubt that it could be passed as it stands, but if serious amendments are put forward, it could be approved. Why wait for the new session and have the bill introduced once more in the House of Commons and then referred back to us?

The Senate should take its responsibilities, consider this bill, make good amendments acceptable to the majority of Canadians and to our provincial government. After it is passed here, we could send it back to the House of Commons.

● (2200)

Therefore, I personally suggest that second reading of the bill be proceeded with so that it be referred to the committee which—as soon as we return from Christmas recess, be it on the 24th or the 25th of January,—will resume its work and prepare the amendments. We will know by then if the minister has consulted with everybody and will have him appear before that committee to have him make all the necessary amendments before third reading if possible.

Then, it is what I suggest to the government leader. I am quite surprised to see the leader telling us that we should proceed with second reading of the bill, before letting it die on the Order Paper. On this point I disagree with the leader.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, it is really interesting to see how honourable senators across the way recognize the significance of the principle that we defend in this bill.

I am grateful to our liberal colleagues for mentioning tonight that unless the bill is amended, they intend to vote against it.

We could spend the night debating the principle of that bill. A moment ago, I went to see the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the government to find out why they were forcing us to adopt this bill on second reading tonight.

Of course, a majority government can easily steam-roll the opposition and wear us down, considering our small numbers. Of course, it has the right to do it. We could spend the night discussing the principle of this bill, for what counts in a bill is its principle.

As soon as you accept its principle, you must have very serious reasons if you want to vote against it later on. When I consider that a motion was put before the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to the effect that this bill should not be sent back to the Senate because its a bad place of legislation and that this motion was defeated by only one vote, I think that the members of that committee who heard the witnesses and discussed the principle of that bill realized that it was such an important matter that they did not even want to report the bill back to the Senate.

Of course the senators from Quebec have quite a few things to say about the principle of the bill.

The minister, Mr. Ouellet, may have claimed that in committee, the senators from Quebec were defending the Quebec government, but he was wrong. We were defending the people of Quebec, all those Quebecers who put their savings in an investment fund. Those are the Quebecers we were defending.

We are not here to defend the Government of Quebec. We are defending Quebecers. We have quite a few things to say. But since the government does not seem to be willing to give us a chance to discuss the bill in detail,—in fact, I must admit that this evening, I do not have the stamina after the day's events, since a number of opposition senators went to Truro today to attend the funeral of our colleague, Senator Smith. I think that in order to restate the principle that this bill should not be read immediately, I am going to take up the motion withdrawn by Senator Flynn and move:

● (2200)

[English]

> That debate on Bill S-31 be adjourned until January 25, 1983, or until such date as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs reports on the meetings which he has undertaken to have with those provinces which have expressed objections to the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Before the motion is put, does any honourable senator wish to speak to the amendment?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I find it strange that no one on the government side is interested enough in the substance of this amendment to speak to it. I rise in the hope that I may encourage them to expound to this chamber why they consider it inadvisable to wait until we have had some further information about the opinions of the provinces of Canada and of their meetings with the minister in charge of this bill in the other place. If there is anything that comes through clearly to me it is that, if you want a case history of how not to go about a proposition that affects a constitutional area of our political life in respect of the relations between the provinces and the federal government, the way in which this matter has been handled must convince any impartial person that the government has a positive gift for treating an issue of the sensitivity of this one in a clumsy and unbelievably inept manner.

The government has persisted with this stubborn view in spite of the fact that it has heard from many of its supporters, who have couched their criticisms in a very gentle and political way, pointing out to the Senate that they would not be prepared to support the motion if it were to come back to the Senate without considerable change at another time. This ought to be clear warning that the way in which this matter is being handled is not acceptable.

I do not think that this is a very good bill. I do not think that there are many honourable senators who think it is a good bill, and I would not be surprised to learn that many members of the government caucus of the other place do not think it is a very good bill. Why, then, should we be asked to deal with it at this particular time of the year? Why are we being asked to have this matter proceeded with without regard to its political and constitutional implications when the minister in charge of the bill has expressed sufficient concern that he will consult with the provinces which have an interest in this matter before he deals with it further in the other place? That was the clear indication we received from him.

We are not paying any attention to that warning; we are not paying any attention to that statement of government view, as I believe it to be. We are being asked to proceed with the principle of this bill in spite of the fact that it is calculated, it seems to me, to produce unsatisfactory responses on the part of provincial authorities which may be concerned with this matter.

Surely the report of the Senate committee which studied the subject matter of this bill has given ample warrant for the reservations that some members of this chamber have expressed with respect to this matter. The report gave ample warrant, and indeed warning, that this bill is one that should not be proceeded with at this time.

That committee, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, was asked to consider the constitutionality of the bill, and what did it find? It found that the constitutionality of the bill in certain respects was in question, and indeed it is in question. If that is the case, why we are being asked to approve the principle of a bill of which the constitutionality is in question is a proposition that defeats me. I really cannot agree that this is a sensible or proper thing to do.

How could the government confuse the issues in the way they have been confused in this piece of legislation? We are told that the principle of the bill is to prevent a province from exercising undue influence or carrying undue weight in the decisions of interprovincial transportation companies. But is that the only principle that is in this bill? Not at all. The bill goes a great deal further than that. If this were a bill to simply prevent somebody from owning 10 per cent of Canadian Pacific Limited, that is one thing, but this bill covers a degree of interest in transportation that far transcends anything like that.

Any company—and this has been said by honourable senators before, but it bears repeating—that has an interprovincial transport interest, no matter how small, is caught in the net. That is the principle of the bill, yet we are being asked to support it.

When I say that, what do I mean? I mean that even a company such as Alcan—which was the favourite example of a company having a minor subsidiary transportation interest—is caught in this bill. But there is worse than that. What is covered by the definition of "interprovincial transportation"?

Well, we know what that is because we asked legal authorities to provide a definition, and if one examines the document—and I have it in my hand—it defines interprovincial transportation companies as—and this has been set out in cases before the courts—companies that have 1.6 per cent of their trips related to interprovincial affairs. If it is a large company with a transportation subsidiary having 1.6 per cent of its business in interprovincial affairs, then the larger company is caught by the bill. That is the principle of the bill. How can we be asked to support such a stupid, senseless, purposeless, badly drafted, ill-conceived piece of legislation as the piece of legislation that is before us now?

I could go through the other points the committee raised besides constitutionality and besides the unnecessary exercise of federal authority to interfere in innocent activities on the part of the people all over this country. I could deal with the other aspects of the committee's report if it were not so late in the evening. I could point out to honourable senators the reservations the committee had regarding some of the important principles of this bill.

What about the principle of voting rights? Where should we draw the line? The committee was not united on that issue. Half of the committee members, I suggest, thought that the bill was wrong. One can take other aspects ofthe bill on which the committee members were divided, such as whether the government has enough control through its federal regulatory authorities to handle the matter of transportation in this country or not. The members of the committee were divided on that.

The best reason that has been given to us in the course of this debate as to why we should not approve second reading of this bill was given by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, because he was candid enough to tell us—and I thank him for that—that he was not going to proceed with the bill; he was candid enough to tell us that he was going to allow the bill to die on the Order Paper, and I think that that is the best thing that could be done with this bill. If the government wants a bill that will deal with whether or not quasi-public corporations are going to be created by the exercise of provincial pension funds, or matters of that sort, then it is entitled to have a bill that deals with that matter, but this bill goes so far beyond that, and is so doubtfully based, and so indifferently supported by members of the government, that my honourable friend knows he should not proceed with this bill, and he doesn't intend to. He intends to have the bill die on the Order Paper.

If that is the case, why should we be compelled, as we are going to be compelled in a few minutes, I suspect, to deal with the principle of a half-baked, ill-conceived piece of legislation which the government itself knows is not worthy of support?

We are being asked to vote for second reading of an defective piece of legislation which the government itself says it intends to see die on the Order Paper. It seems to me, honourable senators, that this is really too much. We should not be asked to do that. I think we should be quite content to let the matter of approval in principle stand on the Order Paper of this house, and let the matter come to its natural end, as it should do, by being allowed to expire on the Order Paper in due course. That would be the proper policy.

Honourable senators, if there are amendments—and frankly, I think that this piece of legislation is so defective and the principle involved in it extends so far that no amendment could really improve it to my satisfaction—let the government get busy and draft a new bill. The government should drop this bill and come back with something that is more sensible, more fair, more equitable, and something that would commend itself to government supporters. The bill before us does not commend itself to many government supporters who have spoken in this house, and I suspect some who have not.

I want to make it quite clear that if this bill comes to second reading this evening, it is not going to get my support, and I advise the government to follow its own advice and let the matter die on the Order Paper and not proceed with second reading at this time.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, as one who has been wavering on this bill, I must tell you that I have been very much impressed by Senator Roblin's explanation, and those of other honourable senators.

Without going into a long speech on this, could I ask the Leader of the Government whether the November 2 date—and that is the only thing, in my opinion, that will influence me to support the government—is important from the point of view of what might happen in the future? Are we in fact protecting the position of the Government of Canada if it proceeds with further legislation by approving in principle second reading of this bill? If that is the case, then I can understand the position of the government. I personally support—perhaps not the principles as expounded by Senator Tremblay—the principle of restrictions on how far provincial agencies can go in a variety of fields, in this case transportation, and possibly other things. I am one of those who believe that there should be some kind of ceiling placed on holdings of that type.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure me that it is important that the bill receive approval in principle because of the November 2 date? I believe he said that that is important to the Government of Canada.

● (2220)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am very pleased to reply on the motion in amendment that was moved by Senator Asselin, because I want to deal, although very briefly, with some constructive speeches that have been made by a number of honourable senators.

To get back to Senator Buckwold's point as to whether or not it is important, I have said several times in this chamber that there is a question and the legal advice we have obtained is not consistent with respect to maintaining the effective date at which matters in this bill would apply, that date being November 3, from prorogation to when a bill is introduced in a new session. There is no question in my mind that Senator Flynn raised the matter for the rest of this session. The argument was made, again by Senator Asselin, that we will probably still be in this session on January 24.

To answer very directly Senator Buckwold's question, it is extremely important that we do not have a situation where we have an attempt—perhaps a successful attempt—to change the situation from what was announced when this bill was introduced on November 2, after the stock markets closed, which could result in a distortion in the market because some of the agencies that we are dealing with are very large purchasers of stock. That is the reason why I am asking that we give it second reading this evening or before we adjourn for the recess so that is established.

I do not think I should go much further at this stage, because I want to reply, as I said, to a number of speeches, indeed, some of the recommendations that are in the committee's report, as soon as we reach the stage of closing the debate on second reading.

Senator Flynn: Why do you not adjourn the debate until tomorrow and give us the advice?

Senator Olson: We know, and I want to say this as kindly and as gently as I can—I hope it comes out that way—that this is the last evening that we can deal with it. We can bring it up again tomorrow and we will have another bill, but we know that at approximately 5.30 p.m. it is over.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Olson: Yes, it is.

Senator Flynn: No, it is not.

Senator Olson: There is going to be Royal Assent and an adjournment of the House of Commons. They already have a house order for that adjournment, and I believe we are going to adjourn at that time as well.

Senator Flynn: The leader is well aware that we have no set time for adjournment. The proof of that is that now he is keeping us here and he could keep us here all evening, which is completely unfair.

Senator Frith: Imagine how happy you will be to be kept here tomorrow evening!

Senator Flynn: Even if the House of Commons adjourns at 6 o'clock, the Senate can sit all evening tomorrow. What I am trying to explain to the Leader of the Government is that if he wants to adjourn this evening, he can certainly finish this matter tomorrow. I think it is unfair to keep us here at this time.

Senator Olson: Let us call a spade a spade, for a change. We know very well that what Senator Flynn has just suggested is legally and technically possible. As far as the practicality of the Senate's sitting tomorrow evening past 6 o'clock and into the next day, and all the rest of it, that is right.

Senator Flynn: I did not suggest all the next day.

Senator Olson: I think that we have to be fair about this. This bill has been before us for many days and we have put it off, adjourned it, stood it whatever the right word is from one day to the next until we have come to the last day. I want to emphasize that we have been as accommodating as possible. I do not want to repeat all of the arguments about why it is important that it move through this one stage. I will give all the assurances that I can on the rest of it, but what we have come to now is that we have run out of time. For Senator Flynn to drag us another step into tomorrow and to suggest what is going to happen after 6 o'clock tomorrow is a very impractical, although perhaps a legally proper situation.

Senator Roblin: I want to follow up on Senator Buckwold's question because I am not sure I understood the answer. I think the question was—

Senator Frith: Are you speaking on the motion?

Senator Roblin: No, I am asking a question. I can speak on any motion I want to.

Senator Flynn: It is on the motion to adjourn.

Senator Olson: You can only speak once on that motion.

Senator Flynn: No, no, no, not on that motion.

Senator Frith: Go ahead.

Senator Roblin: I have not spoken on the main motion yet. I merely want to ask him a question, if my honourable friend will allow me to.

Senator Olson: Go ahead.

Senator Roblin: I believe Senator Buckwold asked what we have to do in order to keep alive that date of November 3 in respect of the application of this bill. I am not quite sure what answer the minister gave. Is he saying to us that this date of November 3 can only be preserved if we have a second reading? If so, I would like to know on what authority he makes that statement because, even if it did get second reading in this house, it is not the law of the land. It is simply a warning flag to people.

Senator Flynn: That's all.

Senator Roblin: It means that you are staking out your ground; you are saying you are going to go back to November 3; and it is a warning flag. That is fair game. I ask my honourable friend is the warning flag not just as effective, just as red, if this bill is on our order paper regardless of its state of progress? If he is telling me that second reading is necessary to keep that flag red, I am asking him to prove it.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have explained this two or three times already, but I will try again for the sake of Senator Roblin. I have told him very openly and frankly that there are almost no precedents for what is attempted to be achieved with this and, indeed, including maintaining the dates between sessions.

I want to remind him that we, in this chamber, where the bill was introduced, have not taken any legislative action on it. It is highly unusual, but in order to accommodate all honourable senators, we took this bill out of the process of second reading and referred it to committee in order to hear witnesses to assist honourable senators in considering second reading. That is very, very unusual, but it is not completely unprecedented. Bill C-201 is the only other bill I can recall where the subject matter of a bill was referred to committee when we were in legal and formal possession of it. It is done many times in other cases where a bill is before the House of Commons. We did that, too, to accommodate honourable senators, including particularly the opposition.

What I am saying is that there was no action taken. Some hearings were held and legal advice was sought from people who were interested in the bill, including representatives from some of the provincial governments. We have not taken that advice, and I am advised that our position of maintaining that date—I do not want to go into all the reasons why it is so important to maintain that date—would be substantially strengthened if we had taken some action. All we are asking for is second reading. I have already indicated that there are going to be all kinds of opportunities for amendments and even more committee hearings and so on, but I am suggesting that we need to take some legislative action—

Senator Asselin: Answer the question.

Senator Olson: —and second reading is that step.

• (2230)

Senator Asselin: Answer the question.

Senator Olson: That is the answer.

Senator Frith: Though it may not be satisfactory to you.

Senator Roblin: I think one could safely maintain that first reading is, legally, the beginning of the legislative process. We cannot dispute that fact. I want to know if my honourable friend is telling us that, if we give this bill second reading now and allow it to expire on the order paper, as he says, it will have any effect at all in a court of law in Canada.

Senator Frith: That is the opinion.

Senator Roblin: I do not believe it. It is not a law.

Senator Frith: I am not asking you to believe it; you are asking us why that is the opinion.

Senator Flynn: That is not true. You did not get that opinion. Produce it.

Senator Roblin: I would like to have my honourable friend show us that opinion.

Senator Frith: We are not going to do it.

Senator Roblin: It is safe to sit behind the bench and say, "We have a legal opinion." All one has to do is think for a minute about how laws are made in this country. We know perfectly well that, if it is not passed by Parliament, it is not a law. You must introduce a new bill after a new session if it is to have any legal effect at all.

To come to us and say, "We must have second reading now to preserve that date," in my opinion, is a thoroughly fraudulent argument.

Senator Olson: I do not see any point in constantly repeating the reply.

Senator Flynn: Not if you repeat the same thing; only if you have anything to add.

Senator Frith: Let's go, then.

Senator Buckwold: I am not quite satisfied that my question has been answered.

Senator Flynn: You cannot be.

Senator Buckwold: To me, this is a key point as far as my own personal position on this bill is concerned. I am wondering if the Leader of the Government can give us a little more information on the sanctity of that particular date.

Again, I emphasize, if I can be convinced that that has, in any way, some bearing on what happens in the future, I am prepared to support him all the way, as I have, but I want to be convinced. As yet, I am not quite sure. I would like to know who gave that legal opinion.

Senator Asselin: Produce it.

Senator Buckwold: I do not think he has to produce it; I am willing to believe him. He is not going to mislead the house, since he certainly never has before.

Could there be some more information in that regard so that some of us, who are wavering on this bill, might have the satisfaction of knowing that they are voting for what they think is right?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have said several times—and as Senator Buckwold has just indicated—that there is a question, and that it would be a strengthening position insofar as maintaining that date is concerned. I do not know how many more times I should say it.

I have to draw attention to one other matter, and that is that one of the reasons there is some division of opinion with respect to this is that we are dealing with a situation where it would be the Crown versus the Crown. I do not think there would be much division of opinion with respect to that.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: What does it mean?

Senator Olson: The Crown in the name of the province and the Crown in the name of the Government of Canada.

Senator Asselin: It is a bad bill.

Senator Tremblay: It has been debated many times.

Senator Olson: At the moment, I am replying to Senator Buckwold who is asking legitimate questions with respect to this matter. I am trying to indicate to him the uncertainty with respect to this if no legislative action has been taken. I do not think there need be a question in any senator's mind that we have not taken any action yet. There is no determination of this house on first reading—the bill is just introduced. Second reading is the first legislative action where there is an expression of senators' views, and that is all we are asking be done with respect to this.

I want to reply to some of the other comments that have been made as soon as we reach the point of dealing with the motion for second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Asselin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn:

> That debate on Bill S-31 be adjourned until January 25, 1983, or until such date as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs reports on the meetings which he has undertaken to have with those provinces which have expressed objections to the Bill.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I have no doubt that the other side would be happy if I said that we are prepared to have the vote on second reading at this point, without the necessity of ringing the bell again.

The Hon. the Speaker: Does Senator Olson agree not to speak at this stage?

Senator Flynn: I did not make that a condition, but it is a wish.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am prepared not to speak due to the lateness of the hour. I must say in fairness, however, that Senators Flynn, Tremblay, Hicks, Thériault, Rizzuto and several others raised some questions. If all of those honourable senators unanimously agree that they do not wish to have me respond to any of the questions they raised, then it is fine with me that we proceed with the vote.

Senator Asselin: We are not satisfied.

Senator Olson: I have waived my right of reply, but if any honourable senator would like me to respond to the questions they have raised, I will do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that this bill be now read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt that motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 25th January, 1983, at eight o'clock in the evening.

[English]

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: January 25 is Robert Burns Day, a great day.

Senator Frith: Yes, and we will expect an appropriate address from our leading Scot, Senator Macquarrie.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): His speeches are always appropriate, whatever the topic.

Senator Frith: That is true.

Honourable senators, I want to remind you that under House order and according to the new rules of procedure, the other place will return on January 17. January 24 is one week later and January 25 is a Tuesday. Honourable senators will remember that our rules provide for earlier recall. There is a real possibility of recall this time, depending on what happens to particular bills during the week of January 17. Normally, such a recall would not be issued, for example, to deal with bills on a Wednesday that the House of Commons passed on a Monday. But in this case there may be legislation involving the six-and-five program where the dates of cheques to be issued and that sort of thing may be critical. So we may be required to come back earlier than January 25. At the moment, however, the adjournment is until January 25 and the caveat that I have just added is to remind honourable senators that this time there might be a slightly greater chance of recall than is normally the case. In the meantime, Merry Christmas!

Senator Flynn: Is there the possibility of any bills reaching us today from the other place, in which case we would be subject to the order of this house that we waive all rules and allow ourselves to be pushed?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thought that we might receive Bill C-141, providing for amendments to human rights legislation, and I had hoped that I would not be pushing the opposition but would be giving it the opportunity to support that worthy bill. I do not now believe we will receive Bill C-141 this afternoon. So the House order referred to by the Leader of the Opposition is likely "épuisé".

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE FLORENCE B. BIRD

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, it may seem an unusual role for me to be paying tribute to a member of the Liberal caucus, but it is with great pleasure that, on behalf of every member of the Tory caucus, I extend to Senator Florence Bird our sincere best wishes upon her imminent retirement after her distinguished years in the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: When I acted as counsel for the Star in its libel cases, Senator Bird's husband was that paper's head man in Ottawa and I knew him well. He was a fine journalist and I knew through him that his wife was a marvellous support to him over the years.

Florence Bird was born in Philadelphia of American parents, and went to that famous school Bryn Mawr. That may help to explain the many excellent aptitudes she has displayed over the years. In the course of her life Senator Bird has been a journalist, a broadcaster and an author, and has been successful in each venture, but, to my mind, her particularly outstanding achievement was her chairmanship of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. I would suggest to honourable senators that if ever anyone is required to help women, Senator Bird is the recognized authority in Canada on that subject.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: Senator Bird is the author of several books. She is a charming, cheerful and friendly lady of great intellect and ability.

Senator Bird, I hope you will permit me to say that today you retire with the goodwill of every member of this house. I speak for all members in telling you that you will be sorely missed. It is a pity that "ye will no come back again."

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we all realize that members of the Senate appointed after June 2, 1965 hold office until age 75. Unfortunately, Senator Florence Bird falls into that category and will be changing careers next month, on her birthday, January 15. It is most likely that that change will take place before we return.

Retirement is a term that is sometimes used, but Senator Bird's series of highly successful careers indicates to me that hers will not be a retirement but simply a change of career.

Senator Bird takes away with her the best wishes of every one of her colleagues on both sides of this place, as Senator Walker has indicated. I suggest that in addition to that she takes away the best wishes of an amazing number of associates, friends and admirers throughout the government and across the nation.

What a stimulating life she has led, when you consider her record of achievement. She has had a number of careers and has been extremely successful in all of them: in journalism; in broadcasting during and after the war; as Chairman of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and as a consultant to the task force; as a CIDA consultant to Commonwealth countries; and, latterly, as a member of the Senate of Canada. Throughout her life she has used her very special talents for the benefit of Canadians in all walks of life.

Most honourable senators will remember the wonderful broadcasts Anne Francis made for several years on the program "Behind the Headlines." They will recall her newspaper columns on the contribution of women to the war effort. Spurred on by her late husband, the beloved John Bird, she proved to be highly popular with audiences across Canada and was soon involved in assignments that landed her in what are termed "hot spots" around the world.

As Chairman of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and as a consultant to the task force, Senator Bird ensured that her name will go down in Canadian history. The commission's report demanded radical changes which would affect communities and work places right across this country. It led to changes in social attitudes, reform of laws, and the re-writing of textbooks to eliminate sexual discrimination. The commission made 122 recommendations for federal government action, and some 45 recommendations related to provincial jurisdiction. I am sure that it is a matter of great satisfaction to Senator Bird to know that over 50 per cent of the recommendations have been implemented, with many of the balance being partially implemented. That is a tribute to the excellent groundwork laid by the honourable senator and her colleagues on the royal commission.

• (1410)

Senator Bird, I can say with great sincerity that you will be missed in this place because you have always managed to communicate an enormous sense of exhilaration and enthusiasm for the tasks which you have undertaken. You have been an inspiration to all of us, and I know that I speak for your colleagues on all sides of the chamber when I express the hope that your rich career of service will not be allowed to come to an end—and I know that it will not. I am sure that your keen social conscience will not allow you to retire, as I pointed out at the opening of my remarks.

To paraphrase a great American, William Allen White: I know you are not afraid of tomorrow for you have seen yesterday and you love today.

We all hope that you will have a full program that will keep your talents at comfortable stretch and that will bring you great personal satisfaction and fulfilment. We hope that your days will be spent in good health and happiness. I suppose that you will also be working on volume II of your autobiography, if you have any spare time.

I do not think I shall say any more, though there is a great deal more that could be said regarding the friendship and warmth that all members of this chamber feel for Senator Bird on this her last sitting day in this chamber. We have all been inspired by her.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, it has been a pleasure to listen to the well-deserved words of praise spoken today in tribute to the Honourable Florence Bird. During a relatively short stay in the Senate, Senator Bird fully lived up to the impressive reputation she had acquired throughout Canada before joining us.

I was able to appreciate Senator Bird's work in the course of the study conducted by Senator Croll, which took nearly two years. I was impressed by her tremendous talent and her dedication to the cause of improving the well-being of her fellow citizens. You may be sure she played a major role in the investigation itself and in the drafting of the Croll report.

Honourable senators, in referring to Senator Bird, we always mention her competence, her diligence and many other professional qualifications.

Why not say a few words about Florence Bird, the woman, and the elegance and charm she radiates?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Deschatelets: If I were a poet, I would end on the following note:

Far happier are we, honourable senators,

For having had a truly remarkable woman in our midst.

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, it is with infinite regret that we bid farewell to one of the strongest personalities that has graced the Senate with her presence, charm, intelligence and remarkable speaking ability, which she shared with us for so short a time—hardly five years.

Senator Bird defended brilliantly the bills she was asked to introduce in this house. She was extremely effective on the committees of which she was a member, especially the Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, which produced some remarkable reports. She always represented the Senate in a truly splendid manner and her absence will create a large void in a house that has already lost many of its most competent and active members.

I am sure that other organizations will want to benefit from her vast experience and her numerous talents as an announcer and lecturer. In fact, that would only be fair. Unfortunately, her short stay in the Senate does not entitle her to any pension at all.

• (1415)

[English]

I wish you, dear Senator Bird, many years of happiness and good health. I thank you sincerely for having represented us so well and for having fought with such eargerness in favour of women's rights. We will miss you terribly.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I first knew of Senator Bird when she was a well known and respected professional broadcaster across Canada, and I was a fledgling broadcaster in Nova Scotia. I was one of her fans, and I still remember the words: "This is Anne Francis reporting from Ottawa."

I speak today not only as a friend, admirer and colleague but also as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, of which Senator Bird has been a most valuable member. She not only served on the main committee but also as a member of the Subcommittee on Classifications and Salaries. To both committees Senator Bird brought reason, common sense, sensitivity, charm and, at all times, a good sense of humour.

I have also heard Senator Bird speak intelligently, forcefully, with conviction and with great eloquence on a variety of important subjects in this chamber. The work of this chamber has benefited immensely from her presence. I join with my colleagues in expressing gratitude to her for her work and friendship, and wish her continued good health and happiness in the future.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to add one dimension to the end of the chapter in this great life book of Anne Francis. It is a dimension of her fame that perhaps some honourable senators are not aware of, but that the amateur ornithologists of Canada are—I am not making a pun. When the life, in effect, becomes larger than life, as it has for Senator Bird for the many reasons described here, its montage would not be complete without mentioning that her husband, John Bird, whom many of us knew as a journalist, was also for years the columnist for the Ottawa Journal on bird watching. Before I met Florence she was a personage in my life because John used to refer in his column to her and to the frog pond. I do not think any tribute—though this is a small part of it—to Anne Francis—as John always called her in his column—our same dear friend and colleague, Florence Bird, would be complete without that additional perspective and the resulting just description of her as a rara avis.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, I extend my best wishes to my deputy chairman, Senator Bird, whom I am going to miss. She has been a tremendous help to me and to the committee. I could go on and repeat all the nice things that have been said but, instead, I want to associate myself with them. After her retirement on January 15, 1983, I hope she will visit us often. She will always be welcome to sit at my table in the Parliamentary Restaurant. We wish her well, and after January 15 we will all become "Bird" watchers.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, Senator Bird has been a delightful colleague and companion to many of us. She has pursued—and is still pursuing and will, I am sure, continue to pursue—a great career in public affairs for a number of years.

• (1420)

I should like to underline that her career, as well as that of her late husband, was founded not only on intellect but on hard work and diligence.

During a cold January week in 1958, a national convention of the Liberal Party of Canada was held. It ended on the Saturday evening. Of course, I had been working quite hard for a number of months, and, as soon as the selection was made, I told my staff we had to be out of the building by the following night, to pack everything up in boxes and to move them down to the office on Cooper Street. I told them, once they had done that, they could take Monday off.

On Monday morning, shortly before 9 o'clock, in order to see if what I had asked had been done, I arrived at my office. The janitor had already unlocked the door and although, at first glance, there did not appear to be a soul at the office, I noticed two bodies digging in the boxes, which had been laid out and piled up on tables, trying to find some papers and copies of resolutions. They were John and Florence Bird. That was my first acquaintance with Senator Bird. She has delighted me ever since, and I hope we will all continue to be delighted by her for many years to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, may I just add a word or two to the many already uttered in praise of our friend and colleague, Senator Bird.

I, particularly, will miss Florence Bird when she leaves. However, as Senator Bonnell has said, I know that she will be back around our table with us. She has already indicated that she would be happy to write the speeches of any of us—or am I putting that a little too broadly, Senator Bird? I am certainly going to call on her in that regard myself.

I just want to reiterate that I, particularly, will miss her. She has been a confidante and a person who has given me good advice. She is a friend and a lady who is warm, witty and wise, and I will miss her very much.

I should like to express a hope to the Prime Minister. I know this will be a daunting challenge, but I hope he will try to fill the void that her leaving will create with someone her equal.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: With your leave, honourable senators, I would like to say a few words of farewell to our colleague, Senator Bird, who is leaving us all too soon. I have always admired her extensive knowledge and her respect for the French language. On many occasions, when speaking in the Senate, she spoke in French. It was my impression that in doing so, she wished to stress the existence of that other majority group in this country, namely, francophones throughout Canada. She is a very talented woman and she has excellent judgment. I wish her anglophone colleagues would try to follow her example and speak to us in French from time to time.

[English]

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bird: Honourable senators, chers collègues and friends, I am tremendously moved by the gracious and kind things you have been saying about me. I do not deserve them, but they are very heart-warming and encouraging.

I also want to thank those of you who mentioned John Bird. He died soon after I came to this chamber, after 50 years of comradeship, companionship and love. At that time, many of you understood what I was going through. You were generous; you kept me busy; you made me feel that you accepted me as an equal; you listened to me when I talked, and I am grateful for that. Some of you even kidded me along and taught me how to laugh again.

● (1425)

[Translation]

I also wish to thank you for your patience in letting me speak in French. I think it is the more beautiful of our two official languages. It reminds me of the happiest years of my life, those I spent in the Province of Quebec.

[English]

There is, as the Latin poet Catullus wrote, some place, some small place, that smiles for me as no other in the world, and that is a small frog pond which I no longer own but which is always in my heart.

I would like to say one last word, honourable senators. I think it is a great privilege to be in the Senate of Canada. I think that Canada needs a Senate. I am glad that you are going to reconsider how to deal with it.

I suppose that I am not really a very good senator because I have lived for so long in Quebec, for a decade in Manitoba, and for over 30 years in Ontario. It always seems to me that the important thing about our work is that we consent to and improve upon laws which affect all of the people of our great country. I think that it is our job to see that this great country remains strong and undivided for all its people.

Thank you, dear senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not wish to say anything at this stage, knowing that early in 1983 I will provoke a situation in which we will have the opportunity to meet again with Senator Bird. I will wait until that time to tell her all of the good things I want to say about her.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

SPORTS

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO FRANCOPHONES

Hon. Martial Asselin: My question is directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. I could not put this question to him yesterday, when it seems, from what he told me, he was practising his jogging and could not get to the Senate. An important question was directed to the minister or to his office, which had been raised by the francophones hors-Québec. It seems it is very difficult for francophone athletes to carry out their activities in French. Although this is supposed to be a bilingual country, and we are spending over $30 million on amateur sport in Canada, it seems francophones across Canada cannot play at or practise their sports in French. The minister's secretary said that the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport would make an important official statement before Christmas on bilingualism in amateur sport in Canada. I should like to know whether this official statement, which is important to francophones who want to participate in amateur sports in Canada, will be made before Christmas.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, on December 7 I met with representatives of the Federation of Francophones outside the Province of Quebec and discussed with them their concerns about the alleged lack of availability of certain sports services in the French language in many of the provinces of Canada.

I told them at that time that, in my portfolio, I was determined to make sure that there would be equitable treatment of all Canadians, regardless of whether their mother tongue was French or English. I committed myself to surveying the department to determine how well we are performing our job with respect to both the anglophone and francophone communities. I said that I would call for an unvarnished report in this regard and that, when the facts were made known to me, I would move as quickly as possible to correct any possible injustices or inequities. I said that I would meet with that organization within two weeks, and I have kept my commitment.

● (1430)

Yesterday I met with representatives of the Federation of Francophones, principally with Madame Seguin. It was a good meeting. I believe that in the area of certain of our national sports organizations there is an insufficient representation of the French fact in Canada; that we must improve, insofar as we are able, our federal sports delivery system. I outlined to representatives of the francophone community one difficulty which exists, which is that at the grass-roots delivery level sports organizations are not within the control of the federal government. The fact is that the Department of Fitness and Amateur Sport and national sports bodies, in almost all cases, have no say with respect to the way in which those services are delivered.

In a sense there are three tiers of athletic activity in this country. We have the federal level, which includes to a substantial extent the Department of Fitness and Amateur Sport. Honourable senators know of the National Sports and Recreation Centre at which 59 sports are represented. We can move to try to improve the francophone capacity in those national sports organizations, which we fund in part. We hope to do that. The French-speaking services available in the department and associated bodies should be greatly assisted by virtue of the fact that I have approved the appointment of a language consultant to make certain that the Department of Fitness and Amateur Sport monitors, on a continuing basis, the availability of services in both official languages and undertakes initiatives to improve the situation.

I have sent letters to the National Sports and Recreation Centre asking them to follow the language guidelines that we are establishing in consultation with the Treasury Board and the Department of National Health and Welfare. A number of other commitments have been undertaken. Time does not permit me to review all of those commitments, but I am prepared to bring a statement to the Senate as soon as possible, perhaps when Parliament resumes after the New Year. Madame Seguin and I agreed to convene a meeting of representatives of the Federation of Francophones and government representatives, which is being held today. I hope and believe we are well on the way to resolving most of the problems and misunderstandings which may have existed.

I repeat my determination to ensure that this department will observe meticulously the language guidelines which have been approved by Parliament.

Senator Asselin: Thank you very much.

[Translation]

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: If I may, honourable senators, I should like to thank the minister for the announcement he made today and which will make it possible for all Francophones outside Quebec to enjoy it, although I realize that Quebecers will benefit from this just as much as we will. On my behalf and on behalf of those who have made representations, and have written to you, I say thank you, Mr. Minister!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—EAST BLOCK TUNNEL

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I should like to make a brief comment and then ask a question of the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Is it on the same subject?

Senator Robichaud: No, it is on an entirely different subject.

There is a sizeable number of senators who have offices in the East Block—

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Asselin: I am there.

Senator Robichaud: —as well as many ministers and members of the other place. Communications, particularly during the winter months and on rainy days, are difficult because the tunnel connecting the East Block with the Centre Block is not what one might call particularly graceful.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: You don't have to bend down!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Robichaud: Perhaps the Leader of the Government could approach the Minister of Public Works, who is my constituency member in the other place, and ask him whether he could organize some sort of winter works project so that we might have better communication between the East Block and the Centre Block, almost equivalent to the facilities that exist between the Centre Block and the West Block.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and will endeavour to reply soon after we reconvene.

Senator Robichaud: It would be a terrific Christmas gift.

THE ECONOMY

NOVA SCOTIA—GLACE BAY AND PORT HAWKESBURY—RUMOURED CLOSING OF HEAVY WATER PLANTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Donahoe on November 24, concerning the rumoured closing of the Glace Bay and Port Hawkesbury heavy water plants.

If it is agreed, perhaps the answer could be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

> In further response to questions raised on November 24 regarding the heavy water plants at Glace Bay and Port Hawkesbury (Senate debates, pages 5039-40), I wish to assure honourable senators that the future of these plants is a matter under very active consideration by the government. As I have pointed out in the past, the economics of continuing to operate the plants are questionable in view of the poor marketing prospects for heavy water. To continue to stockpile the product under such conditions is not an acceptable economic solution.
> On November 24 I referred to the financial underwriting provided by the government to maintain the Nova Scotia heavy water industry. I would like to point out that this assistance has been very considerable. It amounted to some $113 million in fiscal 1981-82 and will be at least at that level in 1982-83. The government has, accordingly, been making a very major effort to keep these heavy water plants in operation.

The government is, of course, very keenly aware of the employment situation in the Cape Breton region and of the difficulties that would be associated with the laying off of the 800 workers employed in the two plants. For this reason, every possible consideration is being given to ways of dealing with the situation from an employment point of view.

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—EFFECT ON CANADIAN-OWNED SECTOR OF PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Charbonneau on December 7, concerning profits in the oil industry for the first half of 1982.

Perhaps the reply can be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The operations of all petroleum companies were affected, to a greater or lesser degree, in the first half of 1982 by slow economic growth, declining demand for petroleum products, and high interest rates. Because Canadian-controlled companies financed much of their acquisition activity through debt, they were particularly hard hit when interest rates escalated. The recent dramatic fall in interest rates, coupled with changes in pricing, royalty, and taxation schedules recently announced by federal and provincial governments, should improve profits considerably in the second half of 1982.

SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS—BUDGET FOR CONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE

Question No. 88 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. What is the total budget for the construction and maintenance of the small craft harbours branch of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans?

2. Does the budget include installation and expansion of marinas and, if so, what is the breakdown by province of the monies allocated for construction, expansion and maintenance of small craft harbours for the year 1981-82 and 1982-83?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans:

1. The Small Craft Harbours budget for 1982/83 is $52,700,000.

2. The Small Craft Harbours budget does include funds for the expansion of marinas.

The allocated funds by province are as follows:

Province	1981/82	1982/83 (estimates)
British Columbia	$ 5,300,000	$ 5,650,000
Western	830,000	1,102,000
Ontario	3,900,000	3,900,000
Quebec	15,000,000	10,159,000
Nova Scotia	6,800,000	8,100,000
New Brunswick	5,700,000	8,800,000
Prince Edward Island	2,500,000	3,500,000
Newfoundland	7,600,000	10,500,000
Headquarters	670,000	989,000
TOTAL	$48,300,000	$52,700,000

AGING VETERANS PROGRAM—RECEIPT AND APPROVAL OF APPLICATIONS

Question No. 91 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

With regard to the Aging Veterans Program of the Department of Veterans Affairs, by province, how many applications have been (i) received and (ii) approved?

Reply by the Minister of Veterans Affairs:

The number of veterans who applied for, and the number directly assisted under the Aging Veterans Program from its inception to the end of October 1982 were:

	Number of applications	Number of applications approved
Newfoundland	40	7
Prince Edward Island	29	12
Nova Scotia	211	102
New Brunswick	81	56
Quebec	112	68
Ontario	298	289
Manitoba	95	75
Saskatchewan	62	30
Alberta	49	40
British Columbia	167	146
Total for Canada	1,144	825

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

INTEREST RATES—PAPERS TABLED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, on December 14, when I moved third reading of Bill C-134, involving amendments to the Farm Credit Act, Senator Phillips asked some questions regarding interest rates. I undertook to provide the honourable senator with the information as a condition of the bill's receiving third reading. I now have the information, but unfortunately the senator is not present.

I ask leave to table it, or I can give him the information when the Senate next meets.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Table it!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the information be tabled?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill S-30, to amend certain acts in relation to Canada Day.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have no intention of delaying unduly the adjournment of the Senate today, because of all of you I am probably the most anxious to get away from here. I have had it up to here! Anyway, since I have to discharge my responsabilities to the end, I wish to point out that this bill is intended to amend Bill C-201, which our excellent colleague Senator Bird had the honour to pilot through the Senate. Knowing Senator Bird as well as I do and in view of all the tributes that have been paid to her earlier, with which I agree whole heartedly, I am sure that she would be very happy to see this bill passed, a bill which changes the name "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day", or "Fête du Dominion" to "Fête du Canada". However, she will want that legislation to be perfect rather than half-baked, and in her heart—as in the case of the majority of honourable senators—she would like us to pass a really adequate piece of legislation.

As you know, Bill C-201 was drawn up by Mr. Herbert, a member in the other place, but it was faulty. I attempted to have it corrected, but for tactical reasons dictated by the deep-rooted partisanship of the government leadership here in the Senate, my amendments were defeated. Finally, Bill S-30 was introduced in the Senate. This bill essentially aims at making the corrections I had proposed, but which were automatically turned down for purely tactical and partisan reasons. However, with this corrected version, this Bill S-30, we still have an opportunity to do a thorough job.

As I have already pointed out, in Bill S-30 they omitted to change the title of the paragraph where it is provided that henceforth the name "Dominion Day" would be changed to "Canada Day". However, within the title it still says "Dominion Day" or "Fête du Dominion" which does not make any sense because after giving such a title to a section, we come to the description under which, from now on, July 1 will be called Canada Day. This is contradictory and somewhat ridiculous.

When I proposed this change the Chair stated that it was completely different from the one I had moved on October 25. A lot could be said about that decision. So today I offer you an opportunity to remedy the situation. This changes absolutely nothing. You can agree to it right away. The bill will go to the other place and you will not have the embarrassment of a second about-face of having voted today against something you will have to support later. The change I am proposing will come either through a third bill, or if there is no objection through that famous bill that comes every year and corrects all annual errors. However, this will be done.

That is the first proposition contained in the motion which I will introduce in a few minutes.

My second point is that in Bill C-201, which was passed and which you refused to correct, it is stipulated that the first day of July is Canada Day, unless it falls on Sunday. If it does fall on Sunday, the following Monday is Canada Day. Such is not the case at all. The first day of July is always Canada Day, or "Dominion Day" as it used to be called. If that holiday falls on Sunday, then of course the following day is a holiday, but July 1 remains Canada Day.

But Bill C-201 says no, it is not the first day of July if it falls on Sunday, but the day after. That is not true. Once again, you will eventually have to correct that with another bill. Once again I am giving you an opportunity to be consistent without undue complications. If we send these amendments back to the Commons, they will receive the bill and the amendments. Whether these amendments are included in Bill S-30 or in another bill, it will not make any difference to the House of Commons. Another small problem which stems from Bill C-201 is that the holiday must be a Monday if July 1 falls either on Sunday or Saturday. If it falls on Saturday or Sunday, Monday is the legal holiday. July 1 is always the first day of July and the former "Dominion Day", now called Canada Day, is always the first day of July.

Bill S-30 only perpetuates a discrepancy in the drafting of Mr. Herbert's bill. I am simply proposing now to adopt Bill S-30 with those amendments. You will send to the House of Commons a bill which will correct all discrepancies, not only those referred to in Bill S-30 which you have already turned down, but also those which you are being asked to correct today. If you want to be consistent, the simple thing to do is to adopt those amendments. That will not delay or complicate anything. Perhaps the leader of the Government might even run to the telephone right now and ask Mr. Joyal whether he is prepared to accept that without any reservation, or, once the leader has his instructions, he will be able to agree quite simply. When he has his instructions, he can repeat them word for word without having to justify them.

Then again, he could very well go and ask Mr. Joyal if by any chance he might not be very glad to have those amendments. So as to be clearly understood by everyone, I move:

• (1450)

[English]

That the Bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

(a) by renumbering clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, as 3, 4, 5, 6, respectively,

(b) by inserting the following new clauses 1 and 2:

"1. The heading preceding section 2 and section 2 of the Holidays Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"CANADA DAY"

[Translation]

The words "Dominion Day" should be replaced by "Canada Day", because we still have the designation "Dominion Day" in spite of what has been done up to now.

[English]

2.(1) In each year the first day of July shall be kept and observed throughout Canada under the name of "Canada Day"

Bill C-201 says that if July 1 falls on the Sunday Canada Day will be recognized on July 2. It is completely illogical, but that is what you decided.

(2) Canada Day is a holiday except when it falls on a Saturday or Sunday, in which case the following Monday is a holiday."

If honourable senators opposite want to do a good job and pay hommage to the Honourable Senator Bird on her last sitting day, they should accept this amendment and send to the House of Commons a complete and perfect bill.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I listened carefully—

Hon. Martial Asselin: You did not.

Senator Olson: Yes, I did. I listened carefully to the Leader of the Opposition and he is, in fact, introducing another element here.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Olson: He claims that it is the perfect bill—

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: In any case, he never understands anything.

[English]

Senator Olson: Bill S-30 is in compliance with an undertaking that was made—

Senator Flynn: Not completely.

Senator Olson: —by the Secretary of State and by me in the committee and in the Senate, that when we passed Bill C-201 we would bring in another bill dealing with the consequential amendments as outlined in Bill S-30.

I hope that the Leader of the Opposition will not regard it as dismissing his arguments if I do not make a long speech dealing with his amendment. However, I have to say that I am satisfied that Bill S-30, to this stage, does, in fact, comply with the undertakings that were given, and, indeed, with respect to the undertakings that were set forth in Bill C-201.

Senator Flynn: That is false.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator says that what I said is false. That is his opinion.

Senator Flynn: You have been making false statements without interruption for about a week.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Without interruption?

Senator Olson: I did not interrupt you once.

Senator Flynn: I would rather be interrupted and be clear on a matter than say things like you are saying that are false.

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn has a bad habit—

Senator Flynn: It is a good habit.

Senator Olson: —of calling anything that somebody else says that he does not agree with "false".

Senator Flynn: If it is not in accord with the truth, then it is false.

Senator Olson: In any event, let me state very clearly that Bill S-30 does, in fact, deal with the commitments given and provides for the consequential amendments that were undertaken. Therefore, I think that the bill should receive third reading in its present form.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it. I declare the motion in amendment defeated.

Motion in amendment negatived, on division.

• (1500)

The Hon. the Speaker: Dealing with the main motion, is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that all the other items on the order paper should stand, including the inquiry in the name of Senators Leblanc and Hastings and the motion in the name of Senator Godfrey. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SEASON'S GREETINGS

Senator Frith: According to our yearly tradition, I wish everyone fruitful holidays as well as a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I say that Senator Frith has done an excellent job on behalf of all sides of this house during these past few months.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Just briefly, I wanted to join with him in extending our very best wishes to all senators for a happy Christmas and a prosperous year in 1983.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, Senator Frith has told us he likes to follow tradition. Is he also aware that there is a tradition that at this time of the year, before senators leave for their vacation, the Deputy Leader of the Government invites them to a reception in his office?

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I was not aware of that tradition. However, I shall take the word of our former distinguished Speaker for it. I can assure you that if you are willing to provide the refreshments, I am quite willing to lend you my office.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, in spite of trying times of late for the opposition, because we had difficult debates recently, we are happy to follow the tradition and wish all our colleagues a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. I shall simply ask them to use this short vacation as a time of reflection and to come back in a better frame of mind.

The Hon. the Speaker: If I may, I should also like to express my best wishes and say that I hope 1983 will be a great year—

[English]

—not only for the Senate but for the country as a whole, because I think that the great majority of senators here have only one desire: to work for their fellow citizens and for their country. With that in mind, there is no doubt that there will be much for this institution to discuss next year.

I wish you all a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 25, 1983, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, January 25, 1983

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Peter Michael Pitfield

Jean Le Moyne

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons, which were read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk; and were seated:

Hon. Peter Michael Pitfield, of Ottawa, Ontario, introduced between Hon. H. A. Olson, P.C. and Hon. Hartland de M. Molson.

Hon. Jean Le Moyne, of Ottawa, Ontario, introduced between Hon. H. A. Olson, P.C. and Hon. Renaude Lapointe, P.C.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is my pleasure and honour to acknowledge, on behalf of all members of this chamber, the first senatorial steps of the Honourable Senators Pitfield and Le Moyne. I look forward to the opportunity to express these same sentiments, next week, on Senator Kelly's behalf.

May I voice the wish that they all find here comradeship and friendship as well as a sense of excitement in the duties which it is our lot to perform for the greater good of our country.

Welcome, and best wishes.

REFORM OF THE SENATE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—COMMONS CONCURRENCE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the following message has been received from the House of Commons:

> ORDERED,—That a Message be sent to the Senate informing their Honours that this House doth unite with the Senate in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons to consider and report upon ways by which the Senate of Canada could be reformed in order to strengthen its role in representing people from all regions of Canada and to enhance the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country;
> That the Committee include in its final report recommendations concerning the method of selection, powers, length of term for Senators, distribution of seats and other matters that the Committee considers relevant to the reform of the Senate;
> That 10 Members of the House of Commons, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the House as members of the said Committee;
> That the Committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as it may deem advisable or necessary;
> That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House;
> That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;
> That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;
> That the quorum of the Committee be 10 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Committee be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever 5 members are present, so long as both Houses are represented;
> That the Committee be empowered to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen; and

That the Committee present its final report no later than December 1, 1983.

Attest

SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-133, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No. I do not say "no" definitely, but the Leader of the Government should tell us the reason why he is asking leave for the Senate to proceed with a bill that was passed by the House of Commons just two hours ago. It is a most important bill.

In any event, if we on this side of the house were to give leave—I am speaking only of the official opposition; I am not speaking for the group of independents, to which an important addition has just been made—what would be the scenario? When does the Leader of the Government expect that the Senate could dispose of this bill—in a few minutes, in a few days, or what?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his comments and for asking a number of questions to which I am not only willing but anxious to reply. The simple answer at the outset is: Any time before Monday.

Senator Flynn: On Sunday?

Senator Olson: Any time before Monday.

Senator Flynn: On Sunday?

Senator Olson: Not on Sunday. It can be done on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, or Sunday. All of those days come before Monday. I wish to reply seriously to the Leader of the Opposition who has raised the matter of the time frame that we would hope to follow in order to reach not only third reading in this place but also Royal Assent, which is a requirement for the passage of a law. I would be very happy to give a brief explanation of the time requirements.

The Leader of the Opposition, and all honourable senators, will be aware that we, as a government, are, under statute, required to make a payment for the month of January by the end of January. The last day of January is Monday. That is the date that I mentioned, January 31.

My honourable friend knows that there is a regime calling for a certain escalation of the amounts of those pensions that are in effect now, and Bill C-133 does, in fact, make some amendment to the regime, particularly in the amount of the increase for the month of January over the level of payments that was made in the previous month, namely, December 1982. Therefore, we must make a decision so that we can pay the right amount for the month of January, and we think we are obliged to make a payment on or before the last day of the month. Normally, those payments are made a few days in advance of the last day of the month.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It is not our fault.

Senator Olson: It is no one's fault.

• (2010)

Senator Flynn: It is the government's fault.

Senator Olson: I am trying to give an objective explanation regarding what I said at the outset.

Senator Asselin: It is always the same story.

Senator Olson: It is well known that the cheque writing machinery, the computer, has to be put in motion to print the cheques. I am told that that takes—

Hon. C. William Doody: Three seconds.

Senator Olson: —a day or two. Perhaps it can be done before Monday; I am not arguing that. Perhaps even two sets of cheques could be printed, one with one set of figures and one with another set of figures.

Senator Asselin: We have been told that they have already been printed.

Senator Olson: The point is that the cheques have to be printed before they can be distributed. That is logical.

Senator Asselin: Can you give us more logic?

Senator Olson: I am sure the people across the floor would like to listen to the explanation, because it is very reasonable.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is what they don't like about it.

Senator Olson: No, I think that the Leader of the Opposition generally likes to listen to reasoned arguments—

Senator Flynn: But very seldom do I hear any from you.

Senator Olson: Let me follow through on what I said a moment ago. The cheques have to be printed. Somebody says they are already printed.

Senator Asselin: You know that.

Senator Olson: I am not sure they are printed. In any event, there is one other thing that must happen. If the cheques are to be distributed from the post offices across the country on Monday, they have to be sent out to those post offices before Monday. That is also reasonably logical. That means that the cheques have to be printed and distributed to various distribution post offices across the country. Furthermore, even if what my friend is alleging is so—that there could be two sets of cheques—

Senator Flynn: There may be three, for all you know.

Senator Olson: —the fact remains that authority is actually required to put them in the mail boxes on Monday.

Senator Asselin: They are already printed.

Senator Olson: If they are already printed, do you want to hold them up? I am just putting an argument in response to the Leader of the Opposition's argument. What is the critical date? As I said, we need the authority by Monday if we are going to fulfil the obligation we feel we have to these people. Therefore, we are asking the Leader of the Opposition, and, indeed, all honourable senators to pass the legislation, not particularly rapidly because we have from now until Monday. But if we do not give the bill third reading before Monday so that we can distribute the cheques on that date, then we will not be able to pay those pensions in the month of January, when the pensioners are entitled to them, in accordance with the wishes of the people and in accordance with the law. That is why I think we should try to negotiate and work out an arrangement.

I have asked for leave to move second reading of this bill later this day. That is my argument. Surely we can work out some way to give due and proper consideration to Bill C-133, and at the same time comply with the obligation, according to tradition, if not the law itself, and the expectations of all the people awaiting receipt of those cheques.

Hon. R. James Balfour: There is another tradition you are ignoring and you know it.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Evidently, some 18,000 employees of the federal government do not agree with the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In the letter of January 24 which they addressed to all honourable senators they even gave some credit to the Senate. I would like to quote from the second paragraph of that letter, which reads:

> Unlike some Canadians who question the very existence of the Senate, the Professional Institute recognizes that in its role of carefully scrutinizing legislation, it functions as a vital safeguard to the democratic process.

● (2015)

Does the Leader of the Government agree with this? Is this a democratic process, when the 18,000 employees affected are asking us to delay its passage and to have a good debate on it to see what their rights are?

Senator Olson: Well, we are hardly in a debate at the moment, because Senator Marshall has simply asked me a question. In my opinion, the democratic process does mean that there is reasonable debate and that a decision is made on the debate in the interests of the several thousands—many more than 18,000—who believe they are entitled to their cheques by January 31.

Senator Marshall: Evidently, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has not read this letter.

Senator Olson: I have.

Senator Marshall: He has? And he expounds on what he has to say for about 15 minutes simply to say that there is no democratic process?

Senator Olson: I did not say that. I said exactly the opposite.

Senator Marshall: Our job in the Senate, then, is completely disregarded, and so is the request these people are making to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, as well as to others, for serious consideration of this legislation, and a long and lively debate in the Senate on Bill C-133.

Surely they must have had some justification for writing that letter to all the members opposite. They are also pointing out what the Prime Minister said about their rights. If you read that paragraph on page 2 of the letter, you will recall that the Prime Minister committed the government to full indexation of public service pensions as a right. Could the Leader of the Government react to that statement?

Senator Olson: I am certainly reacting exactly and positively to what my honourable friend Senator Marshall is asking, when he asks for a debate, because I, in fact, have asked for leave to start the debate tonight so that we can have a long and lively debate on the matter.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I have no objection to second reading of this bill being moved later this day. Incidentally, I am speaking on my own behalf, not on behalf of any group, independent or otherwise. As a member of the Senate who is a native of this area and who has always resided here, I am aware, as you are, that many people have been involved in discussions on this particular subject. For myself, I should like to say a few words on second reading tomorrow.

In the meantime, I would like the Leader of the Government to elaborate on one point. He suggested earlier that the cheques had to be issued for the "right" amount. What is the "right" amount?

Senator Olson: To answer Senator Lafond, when I said "the right amount," I meant the amount involved, whether there is an escalation of 6.5 per cent over the December payment, which is the bill that has now been sent to us by the Commons, or whether it is the regime in existence prior to the complete passage of that bill, which I think is an escalation in the amount of 11.5 per cent.

Senator Lafond: Well, the government may believe that it is the right amount, but some others may not believe that it is the right amount.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, when we come to second reading, whether it is later today or not, I shall be happy to give a fairly detailed and reasoned explanation of the matter Senator Lafond is asking about.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: My question is directed to the Leader of the Government. Supposing we do nothing, will the people who are to receive the cheques to which the Leader of the Leader of the Government has been referring, receive those cheques or not? That is my first question. I shall wait for the answer and then ask a supplementary, depending on the kind of answer I get.

● (2020)

[English]

Senator Olson: I think we can get into that during the debate. At this stage I would have to say that we on this side are extremely interested in ensuring that the people get their cheques, and we will do whatever we can to ensure that they do.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: I shall rephrase my question. If we do nothing here in the Senate, will all cheques be put on hold or will people receive a cheque on the basis of the criteria currently in effect for determining the amounts they are supposed to receive? Is it the government's policy to freeze the cheques people are supposed to receive at the level prescribed under current legislation, until the new legislation being mentioned this evening has been passed?

The people concerned are expecting to receive cheques in amounts corresponding to the current legislation. My question is as follows: Will the legislation now in effect apply as long as it has not been amended? In other words, will the cheques to which the people concerned are entitled under the current legislation be sent out to them, pending the passage of new legislation that would change the amounts on those cheques? In other words, does the government intend to observe the rules now in effect and the right of the people concerned to receive cheques under the current legislation or, anticipating passage of the bill is it going to freeze the cheques issued under the current legislation, pending passage of the new legislation?

[English]

Senator Olson: That is a long question asked from four different angles but turning out to be the same question. Fortunately, the response is short.

The government wants to send a cheque for the right amount, at the right time, in accordance with the law.

If you look at the background of Bill C-133, you will note that notice was given, I believe on October 28, that the effective date would be January 1, 1983. Notice was given three or so months ago, and the government wants to ensure that a cheque in the right amount is sent out at the right time.

The question of freezing, holding, recovering, and so forth, does not become part of the administrative difficulty at all. Therefore, the government's position is that it wishes to do the right thing, and to do it on time.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: I have a supplementary. As we all know, the government's administrative procedures are computerized, and it is almost a foregone conclusion that the cheques for January 31 have already been printed, since that is how computerized procedures work. Which cheques have already been printed? What amounts appear on those cheques now that they have been printed? Today is January 25, not 31. Those cheques did not come out of the computer yesterday. Were the amounts printed on the cheques established on the basis of existing legislation or on the basis of the legislation we are being asked to consider today?

● (2025)

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, whether the cheques are printed under one regime, or one formula or another formula, or the old formula, my answer is very simple: So what?

Senator Flynn: You don't know.

Senator Olson: What difference does it make whether there is one, two or three sets of cheques, or none, at the moment?

Senator Flynn: You pretend you don't know.

Senator Balfour: Just answer the question.

Senator Olson: The answer to the question is that there is still a certain amount of time required for distribution to the Post Office so that people can get them on Monday in the right amount. Regardless of Senator Tremblay's assertions that this, that, or the other thing might have been done, if we are going to have these cheques in the right amounts in the hands of the people on the day that they are entitled to receive them, what I said in the first sentence in reply to the Leader of the Opposition is still valid.

Senator Tremblay: I have a supplementary question. I understand that there is an automatic cheque printing system. Can the government leader assure us that cheques dated January 31 are not printed now on January 25?

Senator Olson: There is no relevance to that question.

Senator Tremblay: Can you assure us of that?

Senator Balfour: He will not answer that question.

Senator Olson: The question is irrelevant.

Senator Tremblay: It is quite relevant because if the cheques—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Tremblay: —are already printed, they are printed with the amounts based on legislation in force now and before the Senate had decided to pass new legislation, or are they already printed on the basis of the new legislation. Can the leader answer that question?

Senator Asselin: He has already answered it.

Senator Tremblay: What amounts are indicated on the cheques that are already printed?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend seems to know that some cheques have been printed. I did not say that; he said that.

Senator Asselin: You said that.

Senator Olson: He can take responsibility for any other information that he seems to have about those cheques. What I can assure my honourable friend is that each pensioner is entitled to one cheque and he is entitled to it on Monday, and we are going to do what we can to see that he gets it.

Senator Balfour: In what amount?

Senator Tremblay: What is the amount? Is it under the new legislation which is put to us? I will not insist on an answer any longer, but I have not received a clear answer from the Leader of the Government.

An Hon. Senator: Answer yes or no.

• (2030)

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government if he can give us any information regarding plans for committee meetings respecting this legislation. Will this legislation, which affects hundreds of thousands of Canadians, be referred to committee? If so, when will the invitations to various interested groups be issued?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Phillips is asking a question in anticipation of certain procedures that might be followed by this chamber. It may be that the Senate would wish to send this bill to committee, or it may be that it may not wish to send it to committee. We will get to that stage after we have had second reading, which is the normal procedure.

Senator Asselin: What is your order to your troops?

Senator Flynn: What are your orders from the other side?

Senator Phillips: I would ask the Leader of the Government what the difference is between the bill dealing with Canagrex, which is now before committee, and this legislation now under discussion.

Senator Olson: I do not think I have anything further to add to my replies. I have given a complete, clear, reasoned and logical explanation as to the time frame. There have been many supplementary, sometimes related and sometimes not so related, questions to the question put by the Leader of the Opposition when he asked me about the time frame that we could envisage.

My reply is: For the reasons I gave, I am asking for leave to get started as soon as possible later this day so that we can get on with all the stages required to take this bill through this chamber and to Royal Assent. I said that we believe we ought to have done all of that by Monday so we can make the distribution.

Senator Frith: Give leave, or don't give leave.

Senator Tremblay: The Leader of the Government knows very well that the cheques are already printed with the amounts corresponding to the new legislation, and that they have to be sent out before January 31. That is why he has asked us to pass the legislation before January 31.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to the explanation I have already given.

On the more specific question as to whether the cheques have been printed, quite frankly, I do not know whether any cheques have been printed.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a very specific question for the Leader of the Government. If the Senate makes its decision on this bill on, let us say, February 2—that is, Wednesday of next week—thus allowing an orderly debate, what consequences would that have for the government? That is a very specific question.

I am prepared to give the assurance that, as far as we are concerned on this side of the chamber—and I am not speaking for Senator Lafond because he dissociates himself from us completely—

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: —and, of course, I am not speaking for the noisy senator from St. Boniface.

Senator Guay: I would not want the Leader of the Opposition to do that.

Senator Flynn: I have the floor, and he can remain in his seat. That is where he belongs.

Senator Guay: You should try it once in a while. It would do you good.

Senator Flynn: I can put you in your seat even if you have a huge voice because your skeleton is much smaller than mine.

Senator Guay: Tell us what you want to say.

Senator Flynn: If you had not interrupted, I would have already said it.

Senator Guay: I hope it makes sense for a change.

Senator Flynn: It has much more chance of making sense than what you say.

Senator Guay: Let's hear it.

Senator Flynn: I doubt if you would be able to understand, in any event. My good friend, no more noise for a few minutes. Then you can rise and play the trombone.

I was going to say to the Leader of the Government—before I was interrupted by that profound noise from the other end of the chamber—that, as far as we in the official opposition are concerned—

Senator Guay: On the opposite side.

Senator Flynn: I would not be on your side, in any event.

Senator Guay: The same goes here.

Senator Flynn: I am happy with that, and I am quite sure that some of your colleagues would rather see you elsewhere than on their side.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, on a point of order, a man with all the experience of the Leader of the Opposition should come out and tell us what he has to say.

Senator Flynn: I am trying. If the honourable senator had not interrupted so impolitely, I would have done that a long time ago.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. I think the Honourable Leader of the Opposition has a question to put.

Senator Flynn: I am doing my best, Your Honour. You know me.

Senator Guay: You do.

Senator Flynn: His Honour never has to reproach me as far as the rules are concerned.

I am trying to tell the Leader of the Government that we of the official opposition are prepared to say that we would not delay the final decision on this bill—although we would be happy if it were a negative one—later than February 2 if we proceed normally and are not pushed by the government because of its mistake of not proceeding earlier in the House of Commons. It could have moved closure before the Christmas recess.

Now they say that the Senate is not important. I know what the Prime Minister said about the appointment of the new senators. He said, "Who cares who is in the Senate?" and that means who cares what the Senate does, and whether we pass this bill in five minutes. I am quite sure that the Leader of the Government would be only too happy to have three readings of this bill in the Senate tonight.

Senator Olson: I am not asking for that.

Senator Flynn: I am saying to the Leader of the Government—if the only result would be that the beneficiaries would receive the cheques a few days later—assuming that the majority does as it usually does, even if the bill is wrong in principle: What difference would it make?

If the Leader of the Government is willing to agree that we should proceed in a normal way here, I can give him the assurance, as far as this side is concerned—and I am not speaking for Senator Lafond or the others in that corner—that we would have no objection to a final decision being made not later than February 2, which is next week.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to try to answer that question without side comments such as those made by the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: The side comments were made by the senator from St. Boniface.

Senator Olson: They were good side comments, but the Leader of the Opposition made one that made me take notice, and that is that he is now advocating that limitation of debate be introduced in the House of Commons earlier rather than later.

Senator Flynn: Pardon me?

Senator Olson: I think he was advocating that limitation of debate be introduced in the House of Commons earlier rather than later.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes, it could have been done.

Senator Olson: I presume he has raised this as a desirable thing, and that he has become an advocate of that.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn: Not at all. The Leader of the Government does not care about the Senate, just like the Prime Minister.

Senator Olson: I care about the Senate and so does the Prime Minister.

Senator Flynn: "Who cares who is in the Senate?" Oh, yes!

Senator Olson: One of the points I want to make—and I do not want to provoke any comments—

Senator Flynn: If you do not want to, don't try.

Senator Olson: I will be very careful. If we did not believe there would be serious consequences as a result of delaying passage of this bill beyond January 31, we would not be raising the time scenario I described to this chamber a few minutes ago.

Let me go over them again so that my honourable friend will understand. When I am making these explanations, the Leader of the Opposition should be paying attention because he asked the questions. If he would listen to what I am going to say about undesirable and perhaps even illegal consequences that could arise if they were—

• (2040)

Senator Flynn: Since when do you care about the legality?

Senator Olson: I care about it every day of my life.

Senator Flynn: Gee whiz!

Senator Olson: The traditional and legal fact is that we are obliged to make these payments in the month of January. That is one point, and I made that point some time ago. If we do not pass this bill—if we refrain from passing or fail to pass it—until after the last day of this month, then we will have to do one of two things: either hold up any cheques, or issue cheques based on an amount greater than the amount specified in Bill C-133. Certainly my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition would not argue that we can distribute cheques that are in compliance with legislation that has not yet been passed. Surely he would not advocate that.

Senator Flynn: You are doing that with family allowance cheques.

Senator Olson: No, that is different.

Senator Flynn: Oh! Oh!

Senator Olson: We must either hold the cheques until the legislation is passed or we must issue the cheques under the old regime, which is based on 11.5 per cent. In the latter case, with the passage of Bill C-133, which contains the 6.5-and-5.5 provisions, we would be legally obliged to recover that money.

My honourable friend is aware of that because Bill C-133 states that it will be effective January 1, 1983. Notice to that effect was given on October 27 or 28.

Honourable senators, those are the consequences we are facing. I repeat that the timing involved is of the utmost importance. I plead with the Leader of the Opposition—indeed, with all honourable senators—in the interests of the pensioners, to help us do what is right. We do not want to face the problems incurred by holding back, freezing, delaying, or recovering what would be an overpayment if Bill C-133 were to be passed later than Monday.

Today is Tuesday; we have Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday—we can debate this issue rather extensively over what I consider to be a rather long period of time for the consideration of one bill. Although there is a fairly important disagreement regarding some parts of it, it is not a long or complicated bill. The essential aspect of it is the difference in the amount of the escalation, that is all.

I again plead with all honourable senators, in the interests of all of these pensioners, to help us do what is right.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. If the cheques are issued on January 31 under present legislation, they will be of a certain amount. If they are issued on the basis of the new legislation they will be of a lesser amount, since there is a reduction that is being introduced by the new legislation. The Leader of the Government is asking us to pass this legislation before January 31. What is the meaning of that if the cheques are not already printed, on January 25, on the basis of the new legislation?

My question is this: Have the cheques already been written on the basis of the new legislation? If so, the Leader of the Government is simply telling the Senate to entertain something that has already been done. The question then is: What is the role of the Senate in all of this business?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I believe that I have already answered every one of those questions.

I suppose we have reached the point where I should just put the question: Have I leave to move second reading later this day? If not, then I would like to pose another question.

Senator Flynn: You can ask again tomorrow.

Senator Olson: I take it, honourable senators, that leave is not granted to move second reading later this day. Is that correct?

Senator Flynn: You can ask again tomorrow.

Senator Olson: I wonder if I might ask one other question before I get to tomorrow. With leave I would like to move, seconded by Senator Frith, that Bill C-133 be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: No, no; I said no and I said that you can ask for leave again tomorrow. If you ask for leave I will say no again.

Senator Olson: I then accept Senator Flynn's invitation. I have been denied leave for second reading to be given the bill later today. I have been denied leave for tomorrow—

Senator Flynn: Tonight you are denied leave for tomorrow.

Senator Olson: You are inviting me to ask the Senate tomorrow for leave to proceed with second reading. I accept that invitation.

Senator Flynn: You can ask tomorrow, but if you want the bill to be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday, nobody can object. Tomorrow you can ask leave to proceed with second reading tomorrow.

Senator Olson: That is what I understood.

Senator Frith: Let it be understood, honourable senators, that notice is being given for second reading on Thursday.

Senator Flynn: You do not have to give notice for that. Put it on the Orders of the Day.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, just in case there is any confusion, we now give notice that this order will be called on Thursday. We do not hve to give any more notice than that. We will ask honourable senators tomorrow if we can bring second reading forward to tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: That is right.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. John M. Godfrey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the fourteenth report of the committee as follows:

Thursday, January 25, 1983

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Fourteenth Report as follows:

1. In accordance with its permanent reference, Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Committee draws to the attention of both Houses Section 3(a)(v) and 3(c)(iv) of the Restricted Weapons and Firearms Control Regulations, registered as SOR/78-670.

2. These Sections provide for the approval, by an authorized person, of unspecified methods of security for firearms equal or superior to those prescribed in the Regulations. Your Committee is of the view that the adoption of such provisions requires express statutory authority and that the present enabling power is insufficient to support the validity of Sections 3(a)(v) and 3(c)(iv) of the Regulations.

3. Generally, your Committee has taken the position that regulatory provisions which provide for the acceptance of standards "equivalent" to those prescribed must be specifically authorized in the enabling legislation. The exercise of subordinate law-making authority requires Parliament's delegate to adopt rules whose content is fixed and known to the subject; "equivalency" provisions lack these characteristics insofar as they allow for the substitution of unknown standards subject to the sole limitation that they be "equivalent" to those prescribed.

4. It should also be noted that Sections 3(a)(v) and 3(c)(iv) of the present Regulations subject the use of equivalent methods of security for firearms to the written approval of the official authorized to issue the permit. This, in your Committee's view, involves an improper sub-delegation of the rule-making authority to a person other than Parliament's delegate.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY,
Joint Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move that this report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Thursday, February 3.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, January 26, I shall move:

That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, January 31, 1983, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is a popular move. I would hate to have to oppose it.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government.

[Senator Godfrey.]

During the recent recess we had an opportunity to meet with the people of our regions, and I think that all senators without exception have been stunned by the high level of unemployment in this country, particularly in the Chicoutimi area where extremely tragic events occurred in which young people committed suicide. In farewell notes, they indicated that they had lost all faith in life and that they could not foresee the day when they would be able to earn a living like others because they were jobless and hopeless. Similar dramas were reported in other parts of the country as well.

Given the high number of unemployed Canadians, particularly in 1982 when 9.2 per cent of our labour force was idle, the government said that it did not matter because we were fighting inflation. The unemployment figure rose to 11 per cent and stood at 12.8 per cent last December. I should think that honourable senators are aware that those figures are considerably higher in areas such as eastern Quebec where the unemployment rate ranges between 30 and 35 per cent.

I had a dream during the recess. I told myself that, in view of the depressing unemployment situation in Canada, the Leader of the Government in the Senate would surely come up with solutions and tell us how the government has decided to alleviate the situation in an attempt to help the unemployed get back to work.

I should like to know whether my dream has come true. Would the Leader of the Government please tell us whether the government has found ways other than those already in use to upgrade the situation?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the point made by the honourable senator, or, rather, the latter part of the question, or the supporting argument of the question. Yes, the Leader of the Government is deeply concerned about that, as are all members of the government deeply concerned about the distress that goes along with the economic downturn, and the unemployment that is consequential on that downturn in the economy. I believe that some of the programs that have been undertaken by the government, and its determination to bring down the rate of inflation—

Senator Asselin: I am not asking that.

Senator Olson: The honourable Senator is not asking that, but he is asking something else, namely, to create—

Senator Asselin: What new programs have you in mind?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator asks what new programs do we have in mind. The fact of the matter is that the rate of inflation, the cost of interest, and so on, are not unrelated to the success of any programs, whether they be new programs in the government or private sectors. There are a number that my honourable friend may not be familiar with. They have been announced. Indeed, programs that were announced some weeks ago are not fully operational in the economy at present. I shall be glad to obtain a list of those programs.

However, I have to emphasize again that we feel the same deep concern over the distress felt by the unemployed wherever they are in Canada. Whether the figure is 10 per cent or 20 per cent, or at some other level, the distress of the unemployed is felt all over the country. The government feels that very keenly. That is why we sincerely solicit the support of the members of the opposition, and indeed of other governments and the private sector, in alleviating this difficult and distressing problem. I am prepared to give my honourable friend a list of a large number of programs.

Senator Asselin: A list that you adopted two years ago.

Senator Olson: No, no. We keep adding programs encouraging the private sector, other levels of government, further expenditure and amended priorities on existing programs to alleviate the situation. There have been many new ones in the past 30 days; there were some in the past 60 days, and also some in the past 90 days. We are not in the habit of constantly repeating things that happened two years ago, because the intensity of that situation is now far more advanced than it was two years ago.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, if I understand correctly, the Leader of the Government, as usual, is trying to talk his way out of it. I cannot blame him for making use of his talents as a parliamentary speaker and letting us know, very politely, that no further programs are being planned. This is everything the government has done, and I can give the Senate a list of the programs we have in mind and which we may be implementing. What major projects is the government working on in order to bring down the unemployment rate in this country? That is what I want to know.

Since Parliament adjourned before Christmas last December, has the government decided to promote major construction programs to help reduce unemployment? Can the Minister tell me, yes or no, whether the government has finally produced some of those splendid programs to try and help the unemployed in this country? If he says no, the government has no further programs, I will just sit down and I will have to say that once more, the government has failed, despite the fact that during the last election campaign, it promised to find solutions to all our problems if we brought this party back into power.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we have never claimed to have a magic wand or a magic program that could solve all these problems. I think I responded fairly and objectively to my honourable friend when I said that I would be prepared to give him an update on the modifications, improvements and enhancements of employment creating programs.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The mega projects.

Senator Olson: Some of them are mega projects.

Senator Asselin: What are they?

Senator Olson: For example, there is a proposal to allocate $121 million or $130 million to build a ferry not so far away.

Senator Asselin: It is a farce.

Senator Flynn: The tar sands.

Senator Olson: I don't believe you could have a tar sands development in Chicoutimi.

Senator Flynn: But it might have a spin-off effect.

Senator Asselin: Direct aid might help.

Senator Olson: I will say again, very seriously, that I gave an undertaking to provide an updated list. I am sure that my honourable friend will be impressed with the numbers and the scope of that list.

Senator Asselin: I am not impressed with 1 per cent. I am impressed with 12 per cent.

Senator Olson: That is equally distressing; more so to us because we are trying to do something positive about it, which is a heavier burden of responsibility, and we all respect that.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Would the Leader of the Government give an update on the innovative programs submitted by the Department of National Defence to the Minister of Employment and Immigration whereby certain individuals who have, for example, poor work habits and other disadvantaged youth in our country who could be helped by the service would be recruited into the Canadian army?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure that I understand the purport of the question. Did the honourable senator ask for something submitted by the Minister of National Defence? If it is in a cabinet document, it is not public information and I cannot respond to the honourable senator's question. However, there are a number of things the Department of National Defence has undertaken and on which public announcements have been made. I would be glad to provide that information to Senator Marshall.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin in his capacity as minister responsible for the Canada Development Investment Corporation.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Still?

Senator Doody: I think so. It is my understanding that the minister is still there. Some time ago I made inquiries about the intention of the minister with regard to the introduction in Parliament of legislation asking for statutory affirmation of the mandate of CDIC. Can the minister tell us how much progress has been made in that respect? Indeed, is it his intention to introduce the legislation in this session of Parliament?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, the government has instructed the Department of Justice to prepare the legislation, and that work is under way. If the legislation is ready during this session, I shall be happy to see it introduced. However, if this session ends within the next three or four weeks, I think the bill will have to be introduced in the next session.

Senator Doody: Would the honourable senator indicate whether it is the intention of the government to comply with the request of the Auditor General, that the Auditor General be empowered to perform the audits on CDIC and its associated companies?

Senator Austin: The request of the Auditor General has been referred by me to government officials for study, with a request that I be advised with respect to present government policy in that regard. I have not received a report from the officials, because the matter is very current, but I hope to receive it soon.

Senator Doody: I wonder if the minister could indicate what the legislation will specify in terms of the investment mandate of CDIC. Will it have the authority to take monies earned by crown corporations and invest them in other enterprises, or will amendments be necessary to legislation now in place regarding such corporations—for instance, Teleglobe? Will CDIC have the authority to finance de Havilland, Canadair and so on, as it now has, and will that authority be spelled out in the legislation?

Senator Austin: The intention of the government is to give CDIC the same powers and authority to conduct commercial businesses as are now held by the Canada Development Corporation. The direction for the corporation on what investments it shall make shall come either from me or from the Governor in Council. The corporation shall make investments within the framework of a policy established for it by the Governor in Council within the context of authority we will be asking Parliament to grant CDIC.

Senator Doody: Will the direction and policies of such companies as de Havilland and Canadair now be spelled out by Senator Austin under the mandate from the new legislation or will the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance or other ministers who are now answerable for those corporations still hold that responsibility? Indeed, what I am asking is: Will the CDIC, through Senator Austin, now be the super crown corporation responsible for the activities of these other corporations?

Senator Austin: As I announced in this chamber some seven or eight weeks ago in answer to Senator Doody, the mandate of the CDIC in terms of its operations will be added to by the transfer of assets and/or shares directly to me or to CDIC. For example, when the shares of Teleglobe have been transferred, they have been transferred to me as minister responsible because the Teleglobe legislation does not permit those holdings to be held by CDIC or, indeed, by any other corporate entity.

[Senator Doody.]

My proposal to Parliament will be that CDIC be allowed to hold shares in Teleglobe as well as directly holding shares in Canada Development Corporation. The CDC, through the Canada Development Corporation Act, can have its shares held only by a minister at the present time. But with respect to the operations of Teleglobe, Eldorado, Canadair and de Havilland, in effect CDIC is now involved in a study of their financial conditions, their business purposes and their performance. It is its function to be a controlling entity in the nature of a holding company.

With respect to shares in Massey and CDC—whether those shares are held by CDIC with respect to Massey or by myself with respect to CDC—CDIC is essentially an investor and is, of course, undertaking those studies that ensure that it understands the nature and performance of its investments.

So, to summarize my answer, which I hope is completely responsive to Senator Doody's question, the role of CDIC will be to operate as a holding company and in some cases as a control company with respect to wholly-owned subsidiaries which were previously held by the ministers responsible.

• (2110)

With respect to Canadair and de Havilland, the companies' operations are, through CDIC, within my ministerial responsibility. On a broader basis, they operate within sectors of industrial policy established by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In cases where there are shared areas of responsibility there is a committee of cabinet ministers which comes together under the direction of the Honourable Don Johnston to deal with such issues.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The tower of Babel!

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable senator for his answer. As I listen to him I become more and more convinced of the necessity of prompt action by the minister in placing the legislation before Parliament. He has an awesome responsibility of billions of dollars of taxpayers' money, really, through these various corporations. I am not completely clear on the delegation of responsibilities to the ministerial committee, but I am sure that will all be explained in the legislation when it is brought before us.

I would ask the minister to undertake to commit himself to getting the legislation before Parliament a little more promptly than the commitment of the government on the VIA Rail legislation, which we are still waiting for and looking forward to.

Senator Austin: I cannot answer to the matter of VIA Rail.

Senator Doody: You probably will, shortly.

Senator Austin: VIA is not within my responsibilities, but with respect to the CDIC legislation—

Senator Doody: The CDIC will swallow VIA.

Senator Austin: With respect to that legislation, I can assure Senator Doody that I am as eager as he to have it before Parliament.

Senator Doody: Almost!

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

SALE OF APARTMENT UNITS TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several delayed answers to questions which I would like to have taken as read.

The first is an answer to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on November 18, 1982, concerning the protection of depositors involved with Greymac companies.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

I have been informed by the Department of Insurance that Greymac Mortgage Corporation did not provide any of the mortgage financing in connection with the recent sales of the Cadillac Fairview properties. Consequently, its ability to meet its obligations to the public was not affected by these transactions.

There are two Greymac companies that accept money from the public, namely, Greymac Trust Company, an Ontario incorporated trust company over which the federal government has no jurisdiction, and Greymac Mortgage Corporation, a federally incorporated mortgage loan company.

As a federally incorporated mortgage loan company, Greymac Mortgage Corporation is subject to the provisions of the Loan Companies Act. The Department of Insurance is responsible for the administration of the Loan Companies Act, and in this capacity closely monitors the activities of all federally incorporated loan companies, including Greymac Mortgage Corporation.

The objective of the Loan Companies Act and the supervision by the Department of Insurance is to try to ensure to the extent possible that federally incorporated mortgage loan companies remain in a position to meet their obligations to the public. However, no system of supervision can provide absolute guarantee against failure and it is for this reason that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation protects depositors with member institutions.

It should be noted that legislation has recently been introduced to the House of Commons to increase the limit to $60,000. This change would become effective on January 17th, 1983. This new proposed legislation would significantly increase the insurance afforded depositors.

Following provincial action towards Greymac Trust and Seaway Trust, I am told that the Department of Insurance took control of the assets of the federally incorporated Greymac Mortgage Corporation on January 7, 1983.

This action is pursuant to the provisions of section 73 of the Loan Companies Act. Under this section, where the Superintendent believes that any assets of a company are not satisfactorily accounted for and that other circumstances so warrant, he may immediately take control of the company's assets.

Having control of the assets will enable the Superintendent to ensure that assets are properly used in the interests of the companies' bond or debenture holders while continuing with current investigations.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—ATLANTIC CONTAINER EXPRESS—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on December 1, 1982, concerning assistance to Atlantic Container Express. With your leave, I would ask that the answer be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Senator Marshall inquired on December 1, 1982 about the possibility of giving a subsidy to Atlantic Container Express to provide water transport to Cornerbrook.

Previously, a long-term subsidy contract existed with Newfoundland Steamship Ltd (NSL), applicable to services to Cornerbrook and St. John's. In response to representations from unsubsidized carriers that water transport to Newfoundland should compete on an equitable basis, negotiations were undertaken and the Minister of Transport was able to announce in March, 1982 that agreement had been reached to buy out the department's contractual obligations with NSL.

During the negotiations, control of NSL passed to Newfoundland Capital Corporation, which then joined forces with Atlantic Freight Lines Ltd. and formed a new corporation called Atlantic Container Express (ACE).

At present, it is not the minister's intention to revive a program of subsidies for water services to Newfoundland. The minister has, however, asked the Canadian Transport Commission to investigate the allegation by ACE of unfair rate practices by Terratransport Ltd.

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION—SALE OF EVAPORATED MILK TO LIBYA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions raised in the Senate on December 2, 1982, by Senator Doody regarding the Canadian Dairy Commission's role in the sale of Canadian dairy products to Libya. May I have your leave to have the answer taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In order to properly answer Senator Doody's questions, it is appropriate to go back to the first contacts with Libya by the parties concerned.

In 1979, the Canadian Dairy Commission (CDC) was introduced to the Libyan market by Coopérative Fédérée de Québec, who, in conjunction with an established trading company, Francexpa, had been developing this market over a period of years. No sales of Canadian dairy products had taken place up to that point.

The invitation to the CDC to meet with the Libyans was the result of meetings and discussions between the Coopérative Fédérée and the General Dairy and Products Co. which is the Libyan government organization responsible for all imports of dairy products into that country. The Commission welcomed the opportunity since it prefers when possible to deal with major export markets on a government-to-government basis using agents to service the market.

In 1980, the Canadian Dairy Commission accompanied the Coopérative to Libya on several sales missions which unfortunately were not successful.

In March 1981, the CDC again visited Libya in support of a sales attempt. The Commission was aware of the possibility of economic boycott conditions regarding Israel and suggested any transaction be completed with the Coopérative Fédérée, which because of the nature of this type of organization, socialist countries such as Libya consider an acceptable direct trading partner. The meeting concluded with the understanding that the Coopérative Fédérée would handle the sale. The Coopérative took a 3 per cent commission.

The Commission was eventually informed by telex from the Coopérative Fédérée on June 9, 1981 of boycott references in the letter of credit made out in favor of the Coopérative.

Since that sale, the CDC has been selling evaporated milk directly to Libya and paying agent fees to the Coopérative. Even though boycott clauses have been included in Libyan letters of credit in favor of the CDC, the Commission has never supplied the requested boycott declarations that the vessel used is not on the black list and does not call at Israeli ports or certificates that goods are not produced by a company which is blacklisted or affiliated with countries boycotted by Arab countries. Instead the CDC provides certificates of origin stating the product is made in Canada and certificate of quality issued by Agriculture Canada.

As a result of the CDC not providing the requested boycott declarations, in order to secure approval for the release of funds, the banks sent the documents as provided by the Commission "in collection" to Libyan authorities.

Even though the CDC did not provide declarations in accordance with the boycott clauses in the letters of credit, Libya paid for dairy products delivered and continues to purchase from the Commission. At this time the Commission is completing a sale of evaporated milk to Libya and is negotiating for further contracts.

While the Canadian Dairy Commission was not aware of the specific reporting requirements of the Canadian Government's policy regarding international economic boycotts, it has never provided any declaration with regard to the boycott of Israel as required in Libyan letters of credit.

Now that the Commission is aware of the reporting provisions, the Department of External Affairs has been given the appropriate declarations, not only as regards the CDC's current transactions but also in regard to its involvement in the earlier sales to Libya in 1981.

Specifically the Commission has declared that "in the course of its export transactions, the Canadian Dairy Commission has not discriminated against any person on the basis of race, religion, national or ethnic origin and has never refused to purchase from or sell goods and/or services to any other Canadian company, agency or individual, sell Canadian goods and/or services to any country, or purchase goods and/or services from any country and have not restricted commercial investment or any other economic activity in any country on those bases."

With respect to Senator Doody's comments about the content of the Globe & Mail article on this subject, the media report was substantially correct. While the Commission did not provide to the Libyans the requested boycott declarations, it was not aware of and therefore did not conform to the specific reporting aspects of the Canadian Government's guidelines on economic boycotts by reporting to External Affairs that it was not discriminating.

With respect to what action might be taken against the Commission, the Minister of Agriculture sees no need for measures to be taken as no discrimination took place and the reporting aspects of the guidelines are now being complied with.

The minister believes that the Commission is doing a fine job of exporting Canadian surpluses of dairy products on behalf of the dairy farmers of Canada on a heavily glutted world market under very competitive conditions, and that it merits our support.

SPACE EXPLORATION—OIL SPILL CLEAN-UPS—CO-ORDINATING AGENCIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions raised on December 2, 1982, by Senator Thompson dealing with the existence or creation of co-ordinating agencies for space exploration activities and oil spill clean-ups. May the answer be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The responsibility for the clean-up of oil spills in the Arctic (north of 60° latitude) is dependent on the source of the spill and its location. In cases where an oil spill results from activities undertaken by industry, industry is responsible for the clean-up, and the appropriate federal department is responsible for monitoring the adequacy of the clean-up measures. The division of responsibility for oil spill clean-up within the federal government is clearly defined as follows:

—for ship sourced oil spills, the lead agency is the Ministry of Transport—Coast Guard.

—for spills resulting from off-shore exploration activities, the lead agency is the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

—for spills of unknown origin in the marine environment, the lead agency is currently the Department of Environment.

—for spills on land, the lead agency is the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development except when they occur on Commissioner's Lands (land surrounding northern communities) in which case the appropriate territorial government is responsible, or when they occur within the two provinces with lands extending north of 60° in which case the appropriate provincial authority is responsible.

The clean-up of any oil spill north of 60° resulting from a federal activity is the responsibility of the department, agency or Crown corporation responsible for the spill and clean-up measures are monitored by the appropriate federal department as outlined above.

The Department of Environment has the added responsibility for co-ordinating the federal research and development effort for oil spill clean-up and acting as the liaison for the federal government in providing advice to industry, Crown corporations and other federal government departments and agencies.

With regard to the creation of a co-ordinating agency for space exploration efforts, similar to NASA, I am pleased to say that the Ministry of State for Science and Technology provides the chairman and secretariat for the Interdepartmental Committee on Space.

This committee serves as a coordinating agency and co-ordinates the federal government's space activities and advises the minister on all policy matters affecting the space program.

For the information of honourable senators, ten government departments/agencies are represented on the Interdepartmental Committee on Space chaired by MOSST: Communications, Environment, Energy, Mines and Resources, External Affairs, Fisheries and Oceans, Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Economic Expansion, National Defence, Transport and the National Research Council.

The committee, which has been co-ordinating space activities for over 5 years, has a 4-year budget of $475 million.

NEWFOUNDLAND

CORNER BROOK—SUGGESTED LOCATION OF FISHERIES COLLEGE—EXPANSION OF JOB CREATION PROGRAMS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on December 7, 1982, concerning industrial and other initiatives in western Newfoundland, which I would ask be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Economic Expansion has been actively pursuing industrial and other development initiatives in western Newfoundland, including a new technical training facility dedicated to marine and fisheries activities.

The current Minister's predecessor, the Honourable Herb Gray, during a visit to western Newfoundland in July 1982, publicly invited submissions on the matter of a location for a new Institute of Fisheries and Marine Technology in Newfoundland. Responses were received from a number of localities, including the City of Corner Brook. In early September, a delegation, headed by Mayor George Hutchings, made representations to the federal and provincial governments to establish the new institute in Corner Brook.

The Department reviewed all briefs presented. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and Regional Economic Expansion, personally urged the Premier of Newfoundland to consider the regional development advantages of alternate sites and, as an option, the possibility of a satellite or split campus.

The Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, however, has remained firm in its insistence that the proposed institute be located in St. John's. The Federal Government is, reluctantly, constrained to accept the position of the Provincial Government in this matter because education is, jurisdictionally, a provincial responsibility. On October 15, the Honourable William H. Rompkey publicly announced the federal decision to accept the provincial proposal that the institute would be located in St. John's.

As the Minister said in the other place when the Bowater layoffs were announced earlier this month, the Federal Government has made representation to the Provincial Government to have the facility located in a community outside St. John's. However, the Provincial Government insists that it be in St. John's. The Federal Cabinet is now considering the nature and extent of a federal contribution which would permit the Provincial Government to undertake the project.

As for other departmental programs being brought to bear in an attempt to alleviate the economic effects in western Newfoundland, the Department's officials in Newfoundland and Ottawa are closely monitoring the situation. They are in contact with senior officers of the international Bowater organization. Municipal representatives are also consulting with the Department in their investigations of possible economic development alternatives for that area of Newfoundland.

THE CONSTITUTION

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by both Senator Flynn and Senator Tremblay on December 15, 1982, concerning the right of a constitutional veto for Quebec.

Honourable senators, the Prime Minister put the government's position on the record in a telex to Premier Lévesque, dated December 24, 1982.

The text of the telex is self-explanatory and answers the questions posed by Senator Flynn on December 15, 1982. I would therefore ask that the text of the telex be incorporated into the record of today's proceedings.

In answer to the supplementary questions asked by Senator Tremblay, to my knowledge there is no "non-governmental body" carrying out a study of a double majority formula at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the text of the telex be incorporated into the record of today's proceedings?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(Text of telex follows:)

December 24, 1982

My dear Premier:

In your telex of December 17, you requested that I ask the Parliament of Canada to adopt "a resolution which would recognize the right of the government of Quebec to either a general veto or a specific veto, that is, a right to opt-out with full compensation in all cases". You also insisted that this resolution would exempt Quebec from the Canada clause contained in section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

This request strikes me as somewhat curious coming from a government which only yesterday was denouncing federal unilateralism and which has declined to participate in any way in the preparatory work for the Constitutional Conference scheduled for March. I am wondering therefore if you have made similar requests of the Premiers of the other provinces since, as you well know, the Parliament of Canada cannot now, any more than it could before patriation, act alone to determine or to change the amending formula in our Constitution.

If we had had this power, you would not today have to seek special measures to protect the Quebec identity since we all know that the federal Parliament would have opted for the Victoria Formula which recognized a veto for Quebec. Since the federal government has been on record as favouring this formula for more than 10 years—and thus already subscribes to the principle of a veto—you would be better advised to direct your request in the first instance to your colleagues of the other provinces.

You place great importance in your telex on the recent Supreme Court judgment which, in our view, denies "a right of veto the existence of which has never been doubted and which has always been considered essential for the protection of the people of Quebec, cornerstone of the Francophones of North America".

I would like to ask you a simple question. If this right was so indisputable and so indispensable, why was it that you made no mention of it in the agreement you signed in April, 1981 with the other provinces which opposed the constitutional initiatives of the federal government, Ontario and New Brunswick?

In rejecting out-of-hand the Victoria Formula and its veto for Quebec, you chose instead to accept "opting-out", declaring that this formula "ensured the legal equality of all provinces" and, for this very reason, was "clearly preferable, for all Canadians, to the formula proposed by the federal government".

Similarly, when Quebec appeared in 1981 before the Supreme Court in company with the other dissenting provinces and sought to have the proposals for constitutional reform submitted by the Parliament of Canada declared unconstitutional, at no point did you claim a veto for Quebec or that Quebec's participation was indispensable to any consensus to amend the Constitution.

To keep intact a common front to which Quebec was totally commited, Quebec made itself into a province like the others, while, by an extraordinary paradox, it was the federal government which defended to the very end the principle that Quebec should have a right of veto over constitutional amendments.

Faced with this common front of eight provinces of which you were part, and faced too with the Supreme Court's decision of September, 1981, the federal government and the two provinces which supported it had to give way before the notion of the equality of the provinces, and stopped insisting on the constitutional veto for Quebec which, for our part, we had always sought. As I have recently stated, if Quebec did not obtain a right of veto, that is because the government of Quebec did not want one. Think of the strong support there would have been if the government of Quebec had joined with Ontario, New Brunswick and the federal government in favour of an amending formula which would have given Quebec a veto. But you chose otherwise.

Although forced to accept, in the November 1981 agreement, an amending formula which was far from its preferred option, the federal government was nonetheless the one that arranged to modify the formula in order to take account of the interest of Quebecers. In fact, with the support of other provinces, we included a provision in the Constitution which guarantees reasonable compensation to any province which dissents from an amendment transferring powers to the Canadian Parliament in the area of education and culture.

Furthermore, as regards the language of education, I have offered, publicly, to re-word section 23 if this should be necessary to arrive at a Canada clause acceptable to the government of Quebec.

This offer still holds, as well as my suggestion to you that we should unite in our efforts to return again to the right of veto which the federal government and all the other provinces were prepared to recognize for Quebec in Victoria in 1971.

I think it is reasonable, however, to ask you the following two questions:

First, will Quebec agree to participate in good faith in the current constitutional process? The veto question obviously cannot be settled by the federal and Quebec governments alone. We must discuss this matter with our colleagues of the other provinces if we really want to achieve a new amending formula according to the procedures which are now part of our country's Constitution.

Second, in return for the veto, or its equivalent, is the Quebec government prepared to give formal acceptance to the Constitution Act, 1982? It would be unthinkable for the federal government and the governments of the other provinces to devote a great deal of time and effort to the search for an amending formula capable of meeting the needs of Quebecers, only to discover afterwards that the government of Quebec still found other excuses for not accepting the new Constitution.

If, however, you accept these two reasonable conditions, I am fully prepared to explore with you and our colleagues all the available options which could give better protection to the legitimate interests of Quebecers as far as future amendments to the Canadian Constitution are concerned.

As far as opting-out is concerned, you are of course aware that, as I mentioned above, we have already included this concept in the Constitution by providing reasonable compensation in the fields of education and culture. I must tell you frankly, however, that it does not seem to me at this point either necessary or desirable to extend this concept to other fields. To go further would be to encourage the gradual balkanization of the country and thereby put its future in doubt.

As for the Canada clause provided in section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, your government stated that it was willing to accept such a provision at the meetings of provincial Premiers held in St. Andrews in 1977, and in Montreal in 1978, provided that the other provinces agreed, on a reciprocal basis, to guarantee the same rights to Francophones outside Quebec. You even inserted this principle of reciprocity in section 86 of Bill 101. Now that the other provinces have all adopted the Canada clause, it is incumbent on your government to respect its commitment, all the more so since this clause, like the Charter itself, enjoys the support of the vast majority of Quebecers, and since we are ready to re-word it if necessary to make it more acceptable to the government of Quebec. Besides, as you know, our fellow Quebecers are interested not only in the development of the French language in Quebec, but also in the broadening of language rights of Francophones wherever they happen to live in Canada.

Finally, I would remind you that in your letter of August 19, you informed me that the government of Quebec was waiting to consult with the aboriginal communities before "engaging in a constitutional process concerning them". I hope that concern for Quebec's rights, which are already well protected and which we can strengthen in future, will not prevent us from rendering justice to our aboriginal peoples who have greater need than anyone to see their rights better defined and protected in the Canadian Constitution.

Yours sincerely,

Pierre Elliott Trudeau

SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SOUTH AFRICA

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question posed by Senator Nurgitz. It is the long-awaited second part of the answer to his question in relation to sales of military equipment to South Africa. The answer has been put off for so long and he has asked me about it so often that I hesitate to give the answer in his absence. Realizing he is from Winnipeg, I think he might be otherwise engaged this week. For that reason may I be given the pleasure of putting the answer off until next week when he is here to receive it?

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION-LATIN AMERICA AND CARIBBEAN (CALA)—GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATION

Question No. 84 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

Does the Canadian Government send any delegates to the Canadian Association-Latin America and Caribbean (CALA) and if so, how many?

Reply by the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

The Canadian Association-Latin America and Caribbean (CALA) is a private association of Canadian corporations and businessmen involved in trade and economic relations between Canada and the countries of Latin America and the Caribbean. The Canadian Government does not "send delegates to the Association". However, Canadian officials have frequently participated in trade promotion seminars organized by CALA and have, on occasion, accompanied CALA-sponsored trade missions to Latin America and the Caribbean countries. CALA annually organizes a formal meeting with the Government to discuss various aspects of Canada's trade and economic relations with the countries of Latin America and the Caribbean and appropriate Canadian Ministers and officials participate actively in those discussions.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bosa and Benidickson be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Cottreau and Inman on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Le Moyne be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUEBEC—CONSTRUCTION OF F-18A AIRCRAFT—ALLOTMENT OF CONTRACTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. Not long ago it was said, and I believe with some justification, that the economic spinoffs of the construction of the F-18A which the Province of Quebec had been promised by the federal government had proved to be far fewer than expected, and that the Province of Quebec had suffered considerable losses in this respect. The Minister of National Defence, Mr. Lamontagne, said that the province would be offered compensation for the losses suffered with respect to economic spinoffs of the F-18A. Could the minister inform us about the nature of the compensation he intends to offer the Province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice and ask the Minister of National Defence to be more specific or more detailed in his reply. I do not have that information with me.

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF AIR BASE IN LABRADOR

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a related question. Senator Asselin almost took the words out of my mouth with his defence question. Premier Peckford of Newfoundland was recently in Ottawa to discuss with the Minister of National Defence the possibility of, and justification for, establishing an air base in Labrador. This matter is only one part of an overall thrust in reconsidering the first line of defence that exists in Newfoundland if we are unfortunate enough in the future to have a third world war.

Apart from the fact that Newfoundland suffers from a lack of economic development and a lack of representation in the Canadian Forces, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would obtain from the Minister of National Defence a short résumé on the future of the Department of National Defence wherein Newfoundland is concerned.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I shall take that question as notice.

FORESTRY

NEWFOUNDLAND—SITE OF RESEARCH CENTRE

Hon. Jack Marshall: I would like to ask about another topic the Premier of Newfoundland took up here in Ottawa. It has to do with the site for a new federal forestry research centre in the province of Newfoundland. I would point out that I have two more questions to which I am seeking answers.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Marshall could state his questions now, because from what he is saying I think it obvious that the answers will involve reports from other ministers.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

KIRBY TASK FORCE REPORT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I would like to know the status of the Kirby task force report.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I shall take the question as notice.

INSTITUTE OF FISHERIES AND MARINE TECHNOLOGY

Hon. Jack Marshall: My final question has to do with the decision of the federal government on the establishment of an institute of fisheries and marine technology, the location of the institute, and whether the funding has been approved by Treasury Board.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I shall take that question as notice as well.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

NATURAL GAS EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers and request that they be taken as read. The first is a reply to a question asked by Senator Hastings on December 16 concerning natural gas exports to the United States. It is a fairly long answer.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure that if he were here he would agree to having it taken as read.

Senator Olson: So Senator Flynn, on behalf of Senator Hastings, agrees?

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Politics makes strange bedfellows.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, there have been no formal representations made to Canada by the United States with respect to the negotiation of any existing gas export contracts.

However, the issue has been informally discussed between officials and some congressmen have made representations to President Reagan about the matter.

Canadian officials have agreed to a U.S.A. suggestion to hold a meeting of the Bilateral Energy Consultative Mechanism early this year. This mechanism, which was established by the Prime Minister and President Carter in early 1979, will provide a timely opportunity for senior officials to discuss a wide range of energy issues of mutual interest to our two governments.

The agenda for the meeting has not been set but will likely include both multilateral and bilateral topics of mutual interest.

In view of congressional and U.S.A. business interest in the issue, it is expected that the U.S.A. side may wish to raise the question of natural gas exports and gas pricing policies. Although Canadian officials will be ready to respond to U.S.A. questions, they will not wish to preclude the finding of the National Energy Board which is scheduled to issue a report on the results of its omnibus gas export hearings early in the new year.

As for Canadian gas export pricing policy, there are no plans to change current policy as there is no consensus that current policies are inappropriate. There would also appear to be little potential benefit to either the U.S.A. or Canada for Canada to change its export policies until there is greater clarification in U.S.A. domestic policies on natural gas prices.

The U.S.A. is aware that Canada has been a stable long-term supplier of natural gas to the American market. It might also be noted that the Canadian export price which has been unchanged since April 1981 has been falling in real terms while U.S.A. domestic prices have been rising at the same time.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

PURCHASE OF CANADIAN TRUCKING COMPANIES BY AMERICAN INTERESTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question Senator Nurgitz raised on December 21 about a FIRA ruling on Harkema Express. I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The confidentiality provisions of the Foreign Investment Review Act make it impossible to provide the reasons for disallowance in one case and allowance in another. In any event, proposals are considered on an individual rather than a general basis, and on this basis the proposal by Roadway Express was found to meet the test of significant benefit to Canada, while the IU International proposal was not. Some of the benefits offered by Roadway's proposal include new investments, use of Canadian parts and services and additional exports. Furthermore, it was found that on the whole the Roadway acquisition of Harkema would have a beneficial, rather than detrimental, impact on competition in the trucking industry in Canada.

TRANSPORT

QUEBECAIR—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on December 21 concerning whether or not the Minister of Transport released a report on the future of Quebecair.

If the honourable senator agrees, the answer can be taken as read.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Do you have the answer?

Senator Olson: Yes.

Senator Asselin: Is it long?

Senator Olson: Not particularly.

Senator Asselin: Would you read it, please?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, no such report has been released. However, discussions between federal negotiators and provincial spokesmen have been sufficiently realistic to pave the way for negotiations on restructuring Quebecair rather than creating a new company, Quebecair 2.

The government is now waiting for the financial statements of Quebecair to be audited, which would be done around February 15. We shall then be in a position to compare the financial statements with the various commitments the Quebec government is willing to make. It will then be determined whether the project is feasible, and the other discussions now under way will continue, concerning, for instance, the routes which Quebecair has renewed and which will be for its own use.

• (1410)

Senator Asselin: Has any date been scheduled for the end of the negotiations?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the indication is that the auditing is expected to be completed by February 15.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Robichaud on December 21 concerning the International Joint Commission and the Garrison diversion project. The answer is fairly long. Would honourable senators agree to having it taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, the position of the International Joint Commission and of the Garrison Diversion Project has not changed since December 21, 1973.

Although the House of Representatives voted on December 14 to delete funds for the Garrison project for fiscal 1983, a House-Senate conference committee working over the weekend inserted $4 million into their compromise bill for the project.

This is the same level of funding for Garrison as was appropriated by the Congress last year.

The new bill also includes the stipulation that none of the funds can be used for construction of project features affecting water flowing into Canada.

Although we are disappointed by the decision to include funds for Garrison, I would note that the U.S. Congress has been firmly seized of Canadian concerns over this project and that the stipulation on the use of the funds confirms this in U.S. law. We will be following up with the U.S. administration in a continued effort to ensure that no Garrison construction will occur which will result in adverse effects on Manitoba water and fishery resources.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

LUMBER INDUSTRY—EFFECT OF DEVALUATION OF SWEDISH KRONA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised by Senator Murray on December 21 with respect to softwood lumber exports to the United States. The answer is quite long. Is it agreed that it be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

On December 21, the Honourable Senator Murray asked what actions were being taken by the government with regard to the current U.S. investigation of softwood lumber imports from Canada as a result of charges that subsidized Canadian lumber has injured the U.S. industry.

The government has expressed its serious concerns over this investigation; specifically by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of State (International Trade) at meetings with the U.S. Secretary of Commerce Baldrige, Secretary of State Shultz and U.S. Trade Representative Brock. At these meetings it was emphasized that lumber exports to the U.S. are vital to this Canadian industry and to the economics and employment levels of many Canadian communities.

On January 7, 1983, Ambassador Gotlieb presented a formal Diplomatic Note to the U.S. Department of State. The note expressed the government's serious concerns and clearly set out our view that the charges made by the U.S. industry have neither substance nor merit. Secretary of State Shultz has acknowledged the importance of this situation and a formal reply is expected in due course. The Note was also provided to the Department of Commerce which is primarily responsible for carrying out the investigation.

The procedures for such countervailing duty investigations are laid down in U.S. legislation and, once a petition has been filed and accepted, an investigation must follow a strict timetable. As part of this process, the U.S. Department of Commerce has requested background information on the various federal and provincial programs which are the basis of the complaint. The government, in co-operation with the provinces and the Washington lawyers for the Canadian industry, has provided extensive material. Based on this and other evidence, Commerce will make a preliminary determination, not later than March 7, 1983, of whether or not any subsidies exist. I am confident that this background information will thoroughly refute the allegations in the petition—particularly those concerning provincial stumpage practices.

In the meantime bilateral consultations have been initiated with the United States under Article 3 of the GATT Code on Subsidies and Countervailing Duties. The course of events will determine the extent to which further bilateral and/or multilateral actions may be necessary. In all such efforts to preserve this vital export trade, we will continue to work closely with the provinces and the Canadian industry.

We have been in close touch with Canadian companies to monitor the impact of the devaluation last November of the Swedish Krona on Canadian exports, including our exports of softwood lumber. Competition from Sweden is felt most in the U.K. which is our largest market in Europe for softwood lumber. We understand that most contracts for 1983 delivery had been concluded prior to the devaluation. This, along with recent increases in the price of Swedish lumber, has served to lessen the immediate impact on Canadian exports.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED ARMS REDUCTION BY U.S.S.R.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Bosa on December 21 concerning the Soviet proposal to scale down missiles in Europe to equal combined French and British numbers. Would honourable senators agree to having it taken as read?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Bosa is not present, but you have his implicit acquiescence, I am sure.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The recent proposal to establish a sub-limit on Soviet medium range missiles in Europe equal to British and French nuclear missiles would appear to mean the removal from Europe of what could be a significant number of SS-20 missiles while requiring the West to cancel entirely deployments of Pershing II and cruise missiles. On the surface, this appears to be an attractive proposal. Whether or not it is in reality a step in the right direction will have to be determined when the proposal is clarified at the negotiating table in Geneva when the INF talks between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. reconvene at the end of January. There is, for example, no indication given as to what the Soviet Union proposes to do with these missiles when they are withdrawn from Europe, particularly considering the fact their range enables them to strike targets in Western Europe from sites east of European Russia. The Western aim in the INF negotiations is not only to reduce a certain number of long-range INF missiles in Europe but to do away with an entire category of weapons in the arsenals of the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. In return for the removal and dismantling of all Soviet SS-20, 4 and 5 missiles, NATO would forego deployment of Pershing II and cruise missiles. This proposal was reaffirmed recently by the Defence and Foreign Minister of the NATO alliance in Brussels.

CENTRE BLOCK-EAST BLOCK TUNNEL

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer to a question posed by Senator Robichaud on December 22 respecting the tunnel connecting the Centre Block and the East Block. I would suggest that this answer, too, could be taken as read.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Since that is your last delayed answer I guess we can see the light at the end of the tunnel.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

To improve the conditions in the connecting tunnel between the Centre Block and the East Block, honourable senators will be pleased to know that work has already been started by Public Works Canada during the Christmas recess. I should, however, point out to honourable senators that this tunnel is designed as a service tunnel and not as a pedestrian link and we have some reservation on its extensive use for the latter purpose. Therefore, the improvements to be undertaken will be somewhat limited.

Honourable senators will also probably be aware that Public Works has designed a project to provide a permanent and secure underground network as part of the overall planning for the parliamentary precinct, including some additional work to the television facilities presently located in the East Block and I understand that when funds are available for this project the works can proceed. In the meantime it is my hope that improvements presently being undertaken in the tunnel will prove to be satisfactory to the senators at least in the short term.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I should like to express my gratitude to the Leader of the Government in the Senate for having acted so expeditiously in answering my question.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You are very lucky.

Senator Flynn: What else is new? He always is.

Senator Asselin: He has been spoiled.

Senator Robichaud: There certainly has been a great improvement, which is to the advantage of Senator Asselin and all senators who have quarters in the East Block. There still remains, however, much that could be done to improve the tunnel.

Senator Olson: I appreciate Senator Robichaud's comments. Certainly, some improvements have been made, but he and other senators should realize that that tunnel is intended only as a service tunnel. Although it can be used as a pedestrian tunnel, it is not intended as such, and I think renovations will be limited to those that have already been made.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

SALE OF APARTMENT UNITS TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to express my appreciation to the Leader of the Government in the Senate for his delayed answer to the question I asked last year concerning the Greymac Trust and Greymac Mortgage companies. I now have a supplementary question to put to him this afternoon.

Is it the government's intention to bring in new loan and trust companies acts to regulate the concentration of ownership in trust companies and to control the takeovers of such companies?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to the reply I gave yesterday except to say that I will take his supplementary question as notice and put it directly to the ministers responsible.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h) that:

> Notwithstanding any Rule of the Senate, Bill C-133, intituled: "An Act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (No. 2)", be disposed of as follows:
> 1. That no later than six o'clock p.m. today, Wednesday, 26th January, 1983, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and all questions necessary to dispose of the second reading of the said Bill shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment.
> 2. That if the said Bill is read a second time, it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, and that it be an instruction of this House that the Bill be reported back to the Senate no later than Monday, 31st January, 1983, at two fifteen o'clock p.m.
> 3. That no later than four forty-five o'clock p.m. Monday, 31st January, 1983, any proceedings before the Senate shall be interrupted and all questions necessary to dispose of the third reading of the said Bill shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment.

Honourable senators, I shall be pleased to give an explanation of this motion if asked to do so.

I do not think I need to repeat the discussions that took place yesterday with reference to Bill C-133. We were invited to ask again for leave to move second reading today and the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition was that we might consider completing second reading debate today. He then proposed an adjournment after today until Monday of next week. He also felt that the bill should receive some study by a committee.

In the meantime, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science has said that his committee is prepared to study the bill and report it back to the Senate by next Monday.

Therefore, if we complete second reading debate today pursuant to the motion it will be an order of the Senate that the bill be referred to committee, the committee thereby having until Monday to study and report the bill. The motion mentions 2.15 p.m. because that is the time at which we usually reach Reports of Committees.

Having received the report, we will then have third reading debate until 4.45 p.m.—at least, all questions necessary to dispose of third reading debate will be put by 4.45 p.m. on Monday. If the bill receives second reading and is reported by the committee, there will be quite a bit of time on Monday for third reading debate, depending on how long the other items of business take.

As is often the case, this motion represents a compromise between the positions taken by various honourable senators, including the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. I ask honourable senators to support this motion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the explanation given by the deputy leader is adequate and reflects entirely the discussions we had.

I have one problem with the vote at 6 o'clock this evening. If some honourable senators have not had an opportunity to speak on this matter, I do not think it would create any problem if the debate were to be continued until 10 o'clock. I suppose that can be assessed later. I would urge the leader or the deputy leader to indicate that they have no objection to postponing the debate or the vote until 10 o'clock if it appears necessary because that would not disturb the scenario that has been outlined.

● (1420)

My second point deals with the committee stage. I am satisfied that the committee will have ample time to consider the bill. There will be questions as to whether the committee will hear representations from the syndicates or associations involved. I hope that if the Public Service Alliance or the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada want to be heard they will be given the opportunity to appear before the committee.

I expect that we will sit on Monday at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, at which time we will receive the report of the committee. Perhaps it would be advisable to postpone Question Period until 5 o'clock in order to have a full debate on third reading.

In my discussions with the leader and the deputy leader, I sensed that what I have just said meets the general views of not only the opposition but the Senate as a whole, and I hope it is perceived as such.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I shall deal with the points raised in the same order as the Leader of the Opposition made them. To use Senator Flynn's words, I agree that we should assess the situation at 6 o'clock this evening and see if the Senate feels that some honourable senators are being denied the right to participate in the second reading debate, it being understood that we want to have second reading by the end of today's sitting, which may be after 6 o'clock.

As for the committee stage, Senator Flynn's comments will be passed on. My opinion is that his views are supported by most honourable senators, in that an opportunity should be given the groups that he referred to.

With respect to the third reading debate on Monday, I agree that we should decide then on the most efficient way of handling our business at that time in order to give ample opportunity for both third reading debate and Question Period.

Honourable senators will understand that if the bill receives third reading, we will likely have Royal Assent at approximately 6 o'clock on Monday evening.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one small point to mention. If we complete second reading later this day, in order to meet Senator Flynn's point about having witnesses called, we would also have to adopt a motion to refer the bill to committee today.

Senator Flynn: That was understood.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, may we have copies of the bill distributed?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Copies were distributed last evening.

Senator Bell: Perhaps some honourable senators have received a copy, but I have not.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, since the bill received third reading in the other place only at 6 o'clock yesterday evening, what we had for distribution to honourable senators last evening were the second reading copies, as amended. There were two sheets of paper, and, certainly, Senator Bell should have a copy now. I am instructed that we do have copies of the bill as adopted in the other place for our consideration today.

[Senator Flynn.]

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-133, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, as has already been pointed out, the bill before us today is Bill C-133, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

This legislation is the act under which pension increases are applied to the retirement, disability and survivors' pensions of public servants, members of the Canadian forces, the RCMP, judges, members of Parliament and others in the federal public service.

Bill C-133, as amended, would limit the indexation to 6.5 per cent in 1983 and 5.5 per cent in 1984. These measures are temporary, and the bill provides for a return to the present manner of fully indexing public servants' pensions in 1985 and future years.

Bill C-133 is, quite simply, the application of the government's six-and-five restraint program to the indexation of public service pensions.

I might just review the objectives of the restraint program since they should be kept in mind as we discuss this bill. The restraint program is intended to set a clear example of federal leadership so that we can deal effectively with the problems of inflation, high interest rates and unemployment, and of making our economy more productive. Another objective is to provide funds for re-allocation to job creation programs. Bill C-133 will free up an estimated $60 million in 1983 and $105 million in 1984.

As I said earlier, Bill C-133 has its roots in the six-and-five program. The first step was taken last summer when Bill C-124, the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act, was passed by Parliament. This bill limited to 6-and-5 per cent the wage and salary increases of employees in the federal public sector over a two-year period. Another step involves the application of the six-and-five restraint program to the inflation indexation features of family allowances, old age security pensions, personal income and public service pensions.

Primarily because of the contributory nature of the public service pension legislation, this bill has had a most difficult passage through the other place. Many arguments have been put forward to the effect that public servants have paid for indexation, that combining the basic pension accounts with the supplementary retirement benefits account would provide enough money for full indexation, and that the government has broken a contractual agreement with its pensioners and employees. I would like to address these comments since they are serious charges.

Under the present financing arrangements, more than 90 per cent of the indexation payments are now charged directly to the consolidated revenue fund of the federal government. The consolidated revenue fund, as we know, is made up of monies raised from the taxpayers of Canada generally. The primary reason for this is that, when the indexation policy was first introduced in 1970 and modified in 1973, the benefits were extended to all existing pensioners, so that, while it is true that public servants have contributed for their indexing since 1970, those who retired before 1970 made no contribution for indexing and the majority of pensioners who have retired since then have contributed only a small portion of the overall costs of the benefits being paid.

● (1430)

Even if the basic pension accounts were combined with the supplementary retirement benefits account, evidence was brought forward during committee consideration of this bill to the effect that the present contribution rate would still not be sufficient to fully fund the pension plans.

About the many statements to the effect that the government is breaking a contract with its employees and pensioners, I will say this. To begin with, there is no formal contract which parallels the written wage contracts existing between the government as an employer and its employees. Further, while I understand that there was consultation with employee representatives on the question of providing inflation protection prior to the time of its introduction, full indexation came about through a bill introduced by the government and approved by Parliament in 1973. Therefore, it would be more realistic to view such pension arrangements involving the employer and generations of employees as being long term but, at the same time, flexible. Changes can be made to the relevant legislation to reflect varying economic conditions.

The Leader of the Opposition smiles, but it is a fact that this is what happened in 1973, when Parliament, upon adopting the policy of full indexing of public service pensions, took the additional step of applying the policy retroactively to many persons who had paid little or no contributions. This also happened in 1976, when a temporary cap of $2,400 was placed on the indexation which any pensioner could receive in that year.

The government is aware that there are a number of urgent issues which must be tackled. Studies are now under way in these areas and this work will continue as part of the national pension reform proposals which are now before us, as set out in the government's green paper on pension reform. Nevertheless, the government does recognize the contributory nature of the public service pension arrangements. For this reason, the President of the Treasury Board introduced the amendment to Bill C-133 which had the effect of increasing the pension cap from 6 per cent to 6.5 per cent in 1983 and from 5 per cent to 5.5 per cent in 1984.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): How generous!

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Opposition should listen carefully to why this happened.

Senator Flynn: I have heard this before; I already know.

Senator Olson: The amendment was based on the principle that the six-and-five cap would apply to that portion of indexing which would be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund—that is, from tax revenues—but not to the indexing which would be charged against employees' credits in the supplementary retirement benefits account; that is, from the direct contributions by employees and the employer specifically for indexing. Accordingly, the amendment reflects the government view that the capping measure should not apply to the monies set aside for the purpose of indexation.

In closing, let me repeat that the government remains committed to the principle that retired Canadians have protection against the effects of inflation. This is why it is proposed that indexation of public service pensions continue within the limits of the restraint program. Additionally, Canada Pension Plan benefits continue to be fully indexed, as do the income security benefits of those drawing the guaranteed income supplement, so that a measure of full inflation protection remains on a portion of the incomes of many retirees, some of whom are recipients of public service pensions.

What about the concern that has been expressed to the effect that the government is using the pensioners to fight inflation and that they will suffer greatly if indexing is capped in 1983 and 1984? The government is calling on all sectors of Canadian society to respect the restraint guidelines and to settle for something less than full inflation protection. While the economic situation confronting us is far from rosy at the moment, the rate of inflation is coming down. It is inflation that is the real enemy of those who are on fixed incomes. If the rate of inflation continues to drop, the government is optimistic that the proposed increases to public service pensioners of 6.5 per cent and 5.5 per cent will not fall too far short of increases in the cost of living.

Senator Flynn: Then why do it?

Senator Olson: Why? We have to set up programs for objectives that are highly desirable for everyone involved in the socio-economic structure of this country.

This bill respects the principle of the protection of pensions against the ravages of inflation. It is part of a concerted attack on inflation. I suggest that success in this area will be enormously beneficial to pensioners and wage earners alike by maintaining the real value of income.

Honourable senators, I am proposing passage of this bill reasonably quickly. We now know what that entails. We have a house order dealing with the time frames that are involved.

I think that Bill C-133, as amended, with the explanations that I have given for the amendments that were brought in, ought to commend itself to honourable senators. The intent of this bill was announced in the June budget. The actual bill was given first reading on October 28, 1982, in the House of Commons. Since early December, there has been some uncertainty in the minds of pensioners—fuelled by reports in the media—as to whether their cheques would arrive when they should and as to the amount that would be applied to them for inflation protection. In the interests of the pensioners' well-being and in the interests of everyone else involved, I would urge that we proceed with this bill.

Honourable senators, I am happy to acknowledge the motion that was carried only a few moments ago. We now know that January 31, or next Monday—obviously the last day of this month—is the date on which the authority to make the payments will be finalized.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for his introduction of Bill C-133.

As I was listening to him, I was reminded of the discussion in the other place when the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board were described as being "Gray's Elegy." As honourable senators will recall, that poem contains a line about the ploughman who homeward plods his weary way. I am sure that Senator Olson will be plodding his weary way homeward tonight, because it was rough ploughing to take a measure as inequitable as that embodied in Bill C-133 and try to present it in a favourable light—that was rough ploughing indeed!

Senator Olson: I am glad you were impressed.

Senator Phillips: I recognize that Senator Olson was glad to sit down—

Senator Flynn: So were we when he did.

Senator Phillips: —and I can understand why.

Honourable senators, this piece of legislation is what I would call part one of the Trudeau trinity, the Trudeau trinity consisting of the capping of family allowances, old age security benefits, and pensions of retired members of the public service. Unlike the Christian trinity, however, this measure does not have any divine inspiration. In fact, honourable senators, it got its inspiration from a meeting held between Senator Frith, Senator Davey and the former Clerk of the Privy Council, now Senator Pitfield. They had a meeting to discuss the lagging fortunes of the Liberal Party and decided that the thing they had to counteract was inflation, and that the best way to do that was to blame someone else for inflation. By all means avoid mentioning what the government is intending to do with inflation, namely, blame someone else. Those gentlemen are all experts on what I call computer politics. They consulted the computer to see which three groups they could best claim. Children under 16 or 18 do not vote, so they were the number one choice. The number two choice were the recipients of old age security. Because of the high mortality rate of such people, a good many of them would not be around for the next election, so they became choice number two. Then choice number three became the retired public servants, because, after all, they too are getting up in years and they could be influenced by a high mortality rate. Proceed without logic, blame someone else, and confiscate the allowances and pensions of those three groups.

● (1440)

A phone call I received yesterday from a retired public servant described this measure as legalized robbery. Perhaps "robbery" is a rather severe word, but it indicates how that individual felt. It is certainly confiscation, and, as I began preparing my notes for my speech this afternoon, I came to the conclusion that it is robbery, but it is being done in the name of the anti-inflation program and therefore it must be made popular before Trudeau and his followers become as extinct as the dodo.

As the sponsor stated, there are three categories of individuals affected by this bill: retired public servants, retired members of the armed forces, and retired members of the RCMP. Honourable senators may be interested in hearing some figures on the number of people who will be affected by this bill. The number of retired public servants who are drawing benefits at present is 122,600, of whom 32,448 are widows. But, honourable senators, we must not forget those who contribute to the public service superannuation fund who are also affected, and they number 308,000. There are 68,100 recipients of pensions from the Canadian Forces. Of that number, 7,029 are widows, and at present 80,000 members of the armed forces are contributing.

There are 4,454 former members of the RCMP contributing; 468 are receiving survivors' benefits, and at present 17,032 are contributing to the RCMP retirement fund. The total number of Canadians affected is 600,186. There are 90,000 pensions being paid to retired public servants, the average pension being $8,100. There are 32,500 survivor pensioners receiving an average pension of $3,200 per annum.

Honourable senators, imagine blaming a pension of $3,200 as being the main source of inflation. This is the only place the government could find to restrict expenditures. Surely there must be some other sources—

Senator Flynn: Careful.

Senator Phillips: —such as the delegation in Thailand, geisha girls in Japan, and banquets in the Philippines. All those things failed to contribute to inflation, but the pension of $3,200 being paid to the little old lady down the street is suddenly the source of inflation. Honourable senators, there will be a lot of economic textbooks rewritten when economists discover that fact.

Honourable senators, it is not unusual for the Prime Minister to contradict himself. In fact, he cannot go through a revolving door without contradicting himself and causing confusion to everyone following him. But not too many years ago the Prime Minister was writing to the Public Service Alliance pointing out that the public servants who retired were not responsible for inflation. At that time he was a tremendous supporter of indexation. However, since then he has changed his mind. Of course, that was before the three members of this chamber got to him and changed his mind. At that time I believe Senator Davey was rowing the boat, and now Senator Pitfield is doing that for him. So I guess Michael is singing a different tune from the one Senator Keith was singing.

Those who are drawing benefits assert that they draw them as a right, that the benefit of a pension is theirs as a result of their term of employment. That is particularly true of members of the armed forces and the RCMP. The government laid a great deal of emphasis on the fact that after 25 years a member of the armed forces or the RCMP could draw a pension. There was a good deal of logic to that, because it was cheaper to have an individual go on pension than to train someone to replace him. In the armed forces, whether the individual is an engineering officer in one of our destroyers, which is fitted with modern boilers, or whether the individual drives a tank or flies a helicopter, it costs a good deal to train him; and the government was actually saving money by encouraging him to stay in long enough to draw a full pension. Now the government is saying, "These pensions are the source of inflation."

Recipients of those benefits point out that they paid 7.5 per cent of their salary during the term of their employment or enlistment and that one per cent of the contribution went to indexation. They are also quick to point out that in the private sector 5 per cent or less is paid to pension funds and that the employer usually pays more than the employee. Senator Olson, in his introduction, said there was no formal contract signed on the full indexation; but, honourable senators, if there was no formal contract, no understanding and no obligation, then I ask on what basis does the government deduct the contributions from the pay cheques of retired public servants and members of the armed forces? There must have been some form of contract or understanding or it would be illegal for the government to deduct the contribution. I would like a further explanation of that.

I compare this situation, honourable senators, to someone purchasing a stock certificate with warrants to purchase additional shares at a future date. What if, after the individual had made his purchase, the directors of the company unilaterally decided to cancel the warrants? That board of directors would be investigated by the RCMP fraud squad. There would be charges of fraud, misappropriation of funds, theft and all sorts of miscellaneous criminal charges laid. Perhaps it would be a good idea if the same fraud squad would take a look at this cabinet and their actions in this regard.

• (1450)

There was a time when the old fogies of this chamber took a great deal of interest in the concerns of the poor, the afflicted and the downtrodden. I am hoping to see some of that concern expressed in this bill. I am watching to see how the supine supporters of the government vote. I understand that there was a caucus meeting of the Liberal Party last evening, so I can pretty well guess how the majority will vote. However, I have hopes for people such as my friend, Senator Croll, and perhaps even a bit of hope for Senator McElman, that their consciences will annoy them a little bit in voting for this measure.

Hon. Charles McElman: Don't hold your breath.

Senator Phillips: I guess I know how Senator McElman will vote, but I have hopes for Senator Croll. I have not thrown away my copy of Retirement Without Tears, and I think I can still find a copy of the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. I hope that it does not become some sort of Aesop fable and we vote to curtail the pension at $3,200.

But, honourable senators, if you think this legislation is bad and you support it, watch out for the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada. If Donald Macdonald sees that there is unanimous support in this chamber for a bill of this nature, what will he be tempted to recommend?

Apparently the pension adjustment does not apply to everyone and not all adjusted pensions cause inflation. Recently—I believe it was yesterday—the Bank of Canada announced that their pensions were being indexed at the rate of 11.5 per cent. It is rather unusual that those who have been retired for some time and have pensions of $3,200 can only receive a 6.5 per cent increase but those who retired from the Bank of Canada last year and at a much higher pension will receive an indexation of 11.5 per cent. We have really reached the just society, haven't we?

Yesterday I received a number of phone calls on this bill. One with which I was particularly impressed was from an individual who served in the RCAF in World War II, returned to university, became a member of a profession and worked for the federal government for the rest of his contributory years. He tells me that next year this measure will cost him $1,039, and that in 1984 it will cost him $1,700. That is a considerable amount and I can understand why these people are saying that they are being robbed. He further pointed out that if his wife survives him, as is the normal pattern, she will lose $850 per year for the rest of her life. Yet, the Leader of the Government in the Senate says this is a temporary measure. He has not told us when this money that will be lost during these two years will be restored.

I seem to recall a member of the cabinet being quick to point out, when it was suggested that the salaries of members of the other place and members of the Senate be restricted to 6-and-5 per cent, that it would mean a loss from their pensions for the rest of their lives. The Leader of the Government at that time agreed with that member of cabinet. So where is the distinction? When will this money be restored?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Or gained if the CPI is below that.

Senator Phillips: But if it does not go below that amount, you will not need this measure in the first place.

Senator Frith: That is what I say, but you are talking about "ifs."

Senator Phillips: But the CPI going below that amount will not restore the $1,700. It is lost.

The ratio of retired public servants to those filing income tax returns is 1 to 100. This means that for every dollar saved by the taxpayer the people affected by Bill C-133 are forced to contribute $100. The saving to each taxpayer in 1983 from this measure will be $4.00, and in 1984, $7.00. It is not really an effective measure to counteract inflation. Is it worth $7 to one individual to tax a retired public servant, retired member of the armed forces or the RCMP $1,700?

I find it almost impossible to arrive accurately at the amount of money paid into the various superannuation funds.

Sometimes I get suspicious that a great deal of this inaccuracy is due to deliberate manipulation on the part of the government. That is why I was glad to hear that the motion contained a reference to committee. I hope that the committee chairman will have some charts and other information prepared by witnesses to give us further information with regard to the moneys in these funds.

The Auditor General, in his report, expressed some concern about the superannuation funds. I think we should give a moment to that report in considering this bill. The Auditor General stated that because of the various interest rates accredited to the fund, the federal government was understating its liabilities. It is interesting to note that he stated that the federal government liability to the superannuation fund is $8.1 billion; to the Canadian Forces Superannuation Fund, $4.3 billion; to the RCMP fund, $2.1 billion; and to Supplementary Retirement Benefits Fund, $4.2 billion, for a total of $18.7 billion.

Honourable senators, I am a bit concerned that the government, in looking these days for some means to reduce the deficit, will look at these funds and be rather tempted to interfere with them. Such action would be disastrous, but unanimous support in Parliament would encourage that type of action, and, therefore, I hope the debate will be detailed and of such a nature as to give the message to the government that not all in this bill is well received even by the supine supporters of the government who support anything that is introduced in this chamber.

Recently, in the Senate, the government showed great haste in establishing a committee on Senate reform. The Leader of the Government said he wanted to make the Senate more responsive to public demand and have it express more accurately the public viewpoint. No one can find fault with that desire, honourable senators, but is there any need for a committee report in order to respond? Is there any need for a royal commission to tell us how to vote on this bill? Honourable senators, we do not need that. The public has let us know that they do not approve of this bill, but that they consider it legalized robbery.

The public is concerned with the way we are treating our pensioners. Surely just for once, in this the longest parliamentary session in Canadian history, the members supporting the government could vote their consciences rather than their party lines. Just try it once, honourable senators, You will feel better and the public will have much greater respect for the Senate than it has at present.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I agree with the speaker who has just preceded me. I only regret that, with respect to all of the speeches he has ever made, Senator Phillips will be right for the first time in his life.

Senator Phillips: At least I have been right once. I am ahead of you.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, admittedly the bill before us has had a thorough going-over in the House of Commons. As you can understand, I was particularly interested in the debate there because of the subject matter. Consequently, I did not just scan what was said in the House of Commons; I read it completely and thoroughly. There were some excellent speeches in the debate, speeches that are well worth considering. All of the speakers seemed to be sincere, and yet there was something lacking in the approach the government took to this important problem.

Sometimes, honourable senators, one must do the wrong thing for the right reasons—perhaps because it is in the national interest. I suspect that this is such a case. We are sometimes asked to make sacrifices. Well, we all have to make sacrifices occasionally, and I am all for that so long as they are fair and equal. I support restraint in every aspect of government except social security and what that involves. The six-and-five program has been fairly successful—

Senator Flynn: In what respect?

Senator Croll: In bringing about what the government said it would do and in having its effect on inflation. Nevertheless, the very fact that that program, in its reaching out, has now begun to grasp at the retirees, will no doubt clutch at the old age security, and then will go on to the supplements, surely tells us that, as the westerners might say, we should "meet it at the pass" and say, "Just stop right there. You are going too far. Let's discuss this."

Honourable senators, I was particularly distressed to read that the Bank of Canada has reported that its pensions are up by 11.5 per cent. That is a crown corporation. Should there be any distinction between the pensioners of these blue-blood crown corporations and the other people who work under similar circumstances?

We in this country have not been very successful in sharing the wealth. Surely, at the very least, we can try to be more successful in sharing the poverty. That calls for equal sacrifices. The acronym for cost-of-living adjustments is COLA. COLA was intended to offset inflation for recipients particularly of social security and the like; but right before our eyes in this country we see COLA for the rich and diet COLA for the poor.

I am opposed to the reduction of social security in any of its forms, and in any way. Reducing social security will not help reduce the deficit. Personally, I couldn't care less how big the deficit is so long as people are working and are content.

Honourable senators, I suggested that the six-and-five program might be justified on the basis of national interest, but is there any justification for denying a group of retirees what they were promised? Surely they are the least able to keep pace with inflation, and they need that money to protect their standard of living.

The government's green paper on pension reform clearly supports the need to protect all pensions against the erosion of inflation. The government is committed to full indexation of public service pensions. The pensioners have that as a right earned during their working years, and, as I have just said, the government's own green paper speaks in the same language.

The employees contributed 1 per cent of their salary to a special supplementary retirement benefits fund for the purpose of protecting the purchasing power of their pensions. That is all they were asked to contribute. It may have been too little; it may have been too much. That makes no difference.

The argument has been made that there was no contract with respect to public service pensions between the Government of Canada and the organization representing the public servants, but I say that there was more than a contract; there was the word of the Prime Minister of this country. He gave his word at that time. It may be that a contract can be interpreted in any way you like, but the Prime Minister gave his word and it is for us to live up to it.

These pensioners have contributed, first, 5 per cent, and then 6 per cent, of their salaries for the basic pension. They are not wealthy individuals. The average pension is approximately $7,000, and many recipients are survivors. Eighty-three per cent of the survivors receive a pension of $5,500, and most of them are elderly women.

• (1510)

For the average pensioner this legislation means a reduction of $345 a year. That is a great deal of money to them. That is an added sacrifice which they should not have to make.

There are approximately 30,000 spouses of superannuates. Their average pension benefits now amount to $3,000, and their total income, including old age security benefits and whatever else they might have, will be reduced by $355.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Did you say $3,000 for the spouses?

Senator Croll: Yes, $3,000 total income.

I do not wish to make a long speech. Everyone knows where I stand, and have always stood, on this. So, while on my feet, I just want to protest. I have been doing so privately within my own party and publicly. There is only one protest left. This bill is unfair, it is misdirected and it is a mistake. I am too old to turn my back on the old.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: In recent years, honourable senators, I have not always seen eye to eye with Senator Croll concerning some of the issues he has raised. With respect to social benefits, Senator Croll has always done an outstanding job to help the most deprived and the most needy people. His speech and the approach he takes once again to defend those people do not come as a surprise to me.

The bill before us is important indeed. Senator Croll said earlier that both government and opposition members in the other place had debated the issue thoroughly. The topic was so important that this bill deeply distressed several of our colleagues in the other place. I was in the gallery last night when the vote was taken in the House of Commons, and I commend three government members who had the courage to vote against this bill. In the debate prior to the vote, those members explained the basic reasons behind their position.

Those reasons were echoed by the Public Service Alliance when its spokesman made urgent representations on this bill before the committee of the House of Commons. What strikes me most in the adoption of this measure is the fact that people have voiced reservations about the credibility which the government must have with respect to its employees. Serious doubts have been expressed as well about the confidence which public servants must feel toward their employer if labour agreements between both parties are to be worth the paper they are written on. As Senator Croll pointed out, public servants and pensioners had been promised that their pensions would be adjusted to the cost of living index.

Even though government supporters claim that there was no written contract or commitment, I have the impression that the decisions of the Treasury Board—the employer of the public servants—did commit the government, notwithstanding the fact that the provisions were not contained in a collective or written contract. They had, therefore, been promised that the pension rights of retired employees would not be changed without prior consultation. That was not done.

The government tabled a bill in November. The bill now before us has already been adopted in the other place.

In his remarks, Senator Phillips pointed out that pensioners have had a feeling of betrayal in spite of the promises of the Prime Minister and those of former Treasury Board presidents, including the late Mr. Andras and the Honourable Judd Buchanan. Those ministers, when they were Treasury Board presidents, stated on many occasions that their government would indeed stand for the indexation of retired public servants' pensions.

As has been pointed out, and rightly so, this is a complete reversal of government policy, the result of a unilateral decision without prior consultation. As Senator Olson said, the government is seeking ways and means of fighting inflation.

And yet, during the last election campaign, honourable senators, the Prime Minister and the government in power had made a whole series of significant promises on this particular issue. While reading Hansard this morning, I pondered over the promises the government has made through its Prime Minister and other ministers, especially those they made during the 1980 election campaign. They were serious commitments. Of course, I will not review them all here, but there are five which are particularly significant. Mr. Trudeau, for instance, addressed some Toronto students on January 12, 1980.

He promised them that, if elected, a Liberal government would manage the finance of our country more effectively and make a better use of public monies. We are faced today with a $23.5 billion deficit, a deficit which might reach $30 billion. Mr. Trudeau promised also that a Liberal government would make sure that all Canadians could obtain energy at a fair price. It is a fact, however, that this so-called fair price for energy has doubled and even tripled over the past two years. He explained that the government intended to promote growth and increase public participation in the ownership and management of the economy. Go and ask the 1.6 million unemployed Canadians what they think of the promises made by the Liberal Party during the last election campaign.

The government also made promises concerning this bill. For instance, it claimed that the Liberal Party would ensure the security of individuals by helping the most destitute among them. A Liberal government would restore dignity to individual Canadians by ensuring their security. I will ask myself in a little while whether the bill before us meets those objectives. Among the promises made by the government to the Canadian people there is an important one which is particularly relevant. The Prime Minister has stated:

> And, what is more important, we must provide our senior citizens with income security. Retirement should not cause fear, but contentment. We will do all that, and more.

Honourable senators, that is what the Prime Minister said in the Toronto area on January 12, 1980. When looking at this bill before us more closely, we realize that present and retired civil servants are right when they say that they have been cheated and betrayed, and that this bill is systematically robbing them of their money.

Bill C-124 provided for a 6-and-5 program but it was not directed at pensioners, but at public servants, at the people who have a job in the federal Public Service, at people who earn an income. Bill C-133 on the contrary creates an atmosphere of mistrust and suspicion and I am convinced that it will make labour relations even more bitter in the Public Service.

Honourable senators, with our vote, we must decide today whether we shall let the government establish such far-reaching precedents as the one contained in this bill. It is important to note, and Senator Croll pointed this out, that in Bill C-124, which the Senate discussed very seriously, the government was trying to fight inflation more effectively by capping salary increases at 5 and 6 per cent. This is all very well for those in the labour force, but when the government begins to reduce the income of pensioners, of mothers through family allowances and of senior citizens who, in many cases, use their monthly benefits in an effort to survive, I suggest that it is going too far. Whatever our political stripe, I believe that before supporting such legislation we should give it a great deal of consideration.

I have asked an actuary to tell me what will be the actuarial results of the provisions contained in this bill. We are told that the Public Service Superannuation plan is not covered by the Pension Benefits Standards Act which provides minimum standards for entitlements, financing, publication and investment. The pension plan of the Public Service is not managed as a trust, but is administered by the President of the Treasury Board as an element of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Honourable senators, this situation raises the question of whether the plan is managed without any conflict of interest.

The contributions of employees to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account and the Superannuation Account of the Public Service are invested in long-term bonds of the Government of Canada. If you read the brief which the committee of the other place received from the Public Service Alliance, you will note that the Alliance raises the question of whether, if the investments were more diversified, for instance by the purchase of provincial government bonds, the product of such investments might have been at least one per cent more than the present yield obtained by the government. This would represent about $150 million a year.

If we add the compound interest since 1978, this would have represented about $1 billion. In other words, federal government borrowings from the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account and the Public Service Superannuation plan since 1978 have cost the contributors approximately $1 billion, which could have been used to finance full indexation. We would then not have had to pass this piece of legislation.

The surplus interest obtained—that is, the interest now received minus the estimated actuarial interest rate—is not added to those two plans. Instead, this amount is used by the government to reduce actuarial deficiencies. This practice is acceptable as long as the employer keeps its promise to provide fully indexed pension benefits. If the level of indexation is restricted, the possibility of using at least part of the surplus interest to increase pension benefits should be considered.

According to Mr. Murray Segal, an actuary who has appeared before the estimates committee to speak about the 6-and-5 program, this program will save the government $90 million in supplementary retirement benefits.

Furthermore, excess interest from the other fund will amount to approximately $1.2 billion in the next few years, and $360 million of that amount will come from the amounts contributed by pensioners. The latter amount belongs entirely to the pensioners and should be used to pay for indexation of their benefits.

Capping indexation at 6.5 per cent and 5.5 per cent will lower the base amount to which future indexation will be applied. This may or may not be fair to employees retiring from the Public Service in the course of the two years of this restraint program. It is certainly not fair if the program will mean they will suffer a permanent loss of pension income.

Honourable senators, it would therefore perhaps be advisable to provide for an increase in the base amounts when full indexation comes back in 1985. I hope this very important question will be raised in committee and that we will have an opportunity at the third reading stage to bring in an amendment that would change the legislation now under consideration as far as indexation is concerned.

It would also mean that indexation for 1985 would be calculated according to pension benefits as they would have been with full indexation in 1983 and 1984.

We feel that this legislation should be improved. That is why we are going to vote to have the bill, in its present form, referred to the appropriate Senate committee for detailed consideration of the entire indexation issue. If it is desirable to propose amendments to remedy the harm being done to pensioners under the present bill as far as future indexation is concerned, it will be done at the third reading stage.

Honourable senators, it is clear that this bill will cause very serious harm. I may refer you to a letter, which I believe you received on January 24, 1983, from the Professional Institute of the Public Service which represents 18,000 employees, describing the claims, grievances and damages that will be a result of the bill before us today. In its appeal to the Senate, the Institute is confident that the Senate will be able to give the bill serious consideration and in doing so ensure that justice is served.

Honourable senators, since the bill in its present wording does not have my support, we shall have to work together to try to improve it by proposing amendments. If satisfactory amendments to correct the injustice contained in this bill are put to a vote in the Senate, I shall vote in favour. Otherwise, I shall be obliged to vote against this bill.

[English]

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I appreciate the presentation made to us by the Leader of the Government. He may, he may not, but he probably does believe everything he told us. I am afraid I must seriously question some of his assertions. There are some elements in this legislation which lead me not to support it.

I find utterly reprehensible the claim made on local radio by public service unions that this bill involves the reduction of pensions; that is blatantly false. As I understand it, the bill calls for a reduction in the rate of increase, not a reduction in the pension earned and contributed to by pensioners themselves.

In our present economic difficulties, I agree with the principle of sharing the load, but that is only valid up to a point because so many have so little or nothing at all to share. As was stated by Senator Phillips and highlighted in last night's local newspaper, the legislation does not apply equally to all public servants. Apparently, the Bank of Canada is not subject to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. For that matter, other federal institutions may be in the same position. During the last 24 hours I have not searched them out.

I would remind honourable senators that full indexation was a substantial part of the incentive for early retirement, which was proffered during the last eight to ten years to senior, middle-level and other civil servants. They have since retired and planned their lives based on their pensions, and now the government intends to unilaterally renege on a commitment.

Senator Olson has stated that there was no contract. Even if there were no contract, a commitment was made. It is my deep conviction that honourable people and honourable governments honour their commitments whether there is a contract or not.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lafond: The public servants themselves have paid more into retirement funds in order to achieve the full indexation which is now denied them, again, unilaterally. The retirement fund of the public service is fully funded, with part of the pension payments coming from the treasury.

In terms of absolute funds, I question the 90 per cent which was quoted by Senator Olson. It may extend to 90 per cent of pensioners because a good number did retire on pensions before this act came into effect. A large number of pensioners have such small pensions, when compared to those paid in the last five or six years, or even in the last year, that I seriously question whether it amounts to 90 per cent in monetary terms.

When full indexation became the rule, a ceiling should probably have been imposed on the amount fully indexed. I do not believe that was done, and it is now too late to apply corrective measures because many people have planned their existence based on indexation. I suggest that the bill before us should provide a floor below which the proposed adjustments would not apply.

Honourable senators, I have read all of Senator Croll's reports describing the poverty line. Often it is a little vague to me as to who are the poor. I cannot personalize them. However, I know so many civil service pensioners who hang tough until the end of the month in order to be able to subsist. That they should be penalized by the same percentage as others while being unable to fight inflation, I cannot accept. If there were a floor, possibly at the level of normal subsistence—and I refrain from the use of the term "poverty line"—where these restrictions would not apply, that provision would probably salvage, to a great extent, this legislation.

• (1540)

Honourable senators, I speak from personal knowledge and experience. I can so well recall the mid-thirties. Civil servants—the public service—were subjected to consecutive 10 per cent pay cuts, which they absorbed and with which they continued to exist. With the economy drive, which others will also remember, the then Department of the Interior was taken off the map. I speak literally; they were the map-makers in those days. As a result of that, many people in their mid-thirties and early forties, people with families, were laid off and were given small pensions upon which they could not subsist. Now we have an older generation of civil servants who, up to 1970 or 1972, retired at a time at which the salary levels and the pension levels were such that they are now unacceptable. No matter what the intent of the government is in putting through this legislation, to ask these people to bear the burden of alleviating inflation is a measure which, if I may be permitted to paraphrase my bishop, who was one of the major authors of the recent famous report, I find immoral.

Honourable senators, as it now stands, I cannot support this bill.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I have listened carefully to the moving debate on this bill. I will say at the outset that I can understand that we have to have a war on inflation and that the government has to set an example. It seems to me, however, that this example is an inappropriate one to choose when we think that such an example should be based on fairness and justice. I have a number of friends who, at a young age, went into the armed forces and into other government bodies. There was encouragement given to them for early retirement in the form of the "carrot" of indexing. The have planned their lives accordingly.

Across this country, I believe that most Canadians have always looked upon their government not only as one which is fair and just but as one which keeps its word. Ours is a government which is generally considered to keep a commitment once it is made. So I am tired of hearing about legalities—the slipping around of some legalities—whether they be with respect to the Constitution or with respect to our commitments to the people who have worked for government. This breaking of a commitment, honourable senators, is my first uneasiness with respect to Bill C-133. I will go to committee and will look at it, but I certainly want to hear the argument on that.

Honourable senators, I come to the issue that concerns me most. War on inflation—yes! But when we go to war, as many of us have for our country, we go because we are the able-bodied, we are the ones who are capable of standing up and enduring the struggles that are ahead of us. We do not push to the fore widows, survivors and young children. Yet I regret to say that, with this bill, the approach that is being taken by the government—the example which is being set for the rest of the country—would appear to do that very thing.

I listened to the statistics which were read out to us by Senator Croll: the average pensioner, $7,000; 83 per cent of survivors, $5,500; 30,000 spouses of superannuates, with an average income of $3,000. Like my colleague, Senator Lafond, I would like to see us focus not on the figure of 30,000 spouses but on persons.

Honourable senators, I do the shopping, to some extent, in my family. On a Saturday I will go to the supermarket and watch some of the superannuated, the widows, as they wheel their carts around looking at every shelf. Believe me, honourable senators, it makes me feel very uncomfortable. You see them picking up some meat which they hope will be on sale, looking at it and realizing they cannot afford it this week. You see them looking around in a sort of desperation, as of course they have to. I have spoken to some of the cashiers, who have told me that it is the most heartbreaking thing they have seen. Some of these cashiers have even given from their own salaries when they have known personally these dedicated people who have worked all their lives and who want to retire with dignity and in some measure of good health. During the summer, one of the cashiers told me of an old lady who was reduced to the point where she bought cans of cat meat because they are cheaper.

Am I expected—as a senator, as a Canadian citizen—to approve of this sweeping war on inflation, which is going to hit at 30,000 spouses of superannuates with an average pension of $3,000? I suggest to honourable senators that, if we do not follow the recommendation made by my honourable friend with respect to a floor, indeed there is something immoral, insensitive and tragic about this chamber.

[Senator Thompson.]

Looking into the past, I would agree that, for some, a ceiling should have been set with respect to indexing which was not too high. I have seen top civil servants who would retire early and perhaps, by some means, would get extra indexing. There is no question of that.

• (1550)

I think we could tighten our belts, and I am prepared to do that. Surely, honourable senators, we are not going to pass a bill which is going to take $340 a year from people to whom every 10 cents counts towards feeding themselves? Surely we will make some amendment to this, and it is on that basis that I look forward to sitting in the committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is most unfortunate that such an important bill should be introduced in the Senate under such unfavourable circumstances. Granted, those circumstances are not all within the control of the government; the Winnipeg convention does create a problem. But the most important, of course, is the fact that, as the Leader of the Government explained last night, cheques must be mailed. Yes, cheques must be mailed, but they do not want to print them as required under the legislation which is still in place, but rather as proposed in the bill. Hence, the Senate is told that even though the House of Commons has been debating this bill for a month and a half in committee and otherwise we senators have no choice, we have to pass the bill before the end of the month.

I can appreciate that we, in the Senate, cannot have as lengthy a debate as was had in the House of Commons, or even the usual debate we might have under normal circumstances. Still, we could have followed the normal procedure with a reference to committee as is usually done. The Senate might have been induced—perhaps not to defeat the bill—at least to amend it radically, possibly the way some of the preceding speakers directly or implicitly suggested when they said that the bill should apply only to higher pensions.

In any case, as I said a moment ago, it is most unfortunate. This bill has been debated in the House of Commons—for six weeks, I repeat—and the government had to put an end to it by imposing closure, by cutting off debate; perhaps the debate was not cut off, but it was limited indeed. The government did that only last week, and now it sends the bill to us saying: "As usual, given the majority that we, the government, have in the Senate, we expect that you will simply and quickly pass this bill."

And yet, we ought to keep in mind the fact that four Liberal members in the other place were against this legislation and had the courage to rise—a rather unusual occurrence for the Liberal majority—in spite of the admonition and the reprobation of the government, and vote against this bill.

This afternoon, we have seen and heard Senator Croll—not a lukewarm Liberal, not an independant Liberal as Senators Lafond and Thompson can be perhaps—we have heard Senator Croll speak against this bill; Senators Lafond and Thompson did raise a number of objections, and I feel that both of them, as well as Senator Croll, delivered speeches which moved me and which, I think, should have moved most senators.

What is the purpose of this bill? Simply to limit indexation, to change the indexation system of retired public servants. Having heard the speeches delivered here and in the other place, we know full well that pensioners are unanimously opposed, with the odd exception such as those who draw pensions of $25,000, $30,000 or $50,000 and others who get more than that. I can understand that indexing a $75,000 pension is not the same thing as indexing a $3,000 pension. It has always been recognized that an increased cost of living does not, arithmetically speaking, affect the pensioner who gets $75,000 to the same extent as the one who gets $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000 per year. I entirely agree with that. There are problems in that regard, but this bill has not been introduced because of those problems, and if the government wanted these to be dealt with, it should have brought in altogether different legislation.

The previous speakers mentioned that this bill is tantamount to a breach of contract. Senator Olson said no. For my part, I say along with the previous speakers that this is a breach of contract. A contract is not necessarily a paper signed by two parties. Legally speaking, in common law as well as in civil law, if I am not mistaken, when I suggest to someone that I will remit a certain amount provided he has paid his contributions, if that amount is paid for and I begin to remit what I promised in return for such contributions, there is then an implied contract. I cannot, once an agreement has been arrived at, whether it is under the cover of a bill or a verbal contract, unilaterally break that contract. Now there is no doubt that this is what is being done with pensioners. It is a matter of credibility and trust while in this bill the government is going back on its given word. Indeed, it is an expropriation without any compensation because a certain amount has been paid into a fund to allow for pension indexation tied to the cost of living. We are told today that this amount will not be paid, that pensioners will receive less. In my opinion, this is robbery. There is no other word for it. If this were done under a private pension scheme, do you think an insurance company would be allowed to pay less if it had undertaken to increase pension benefits on the basis of the cost of living? Would a company now be allowed to say: "I will only pay 6.5 per cent"? This is robbery. If the government were not involved, pensioners could institute proceedings and even obtain a conviction. Parliament, of course, is supreme. Parliament can rob people. It has done so in some instances in the past. This is what it is doing today. This is what you are invited to do, honourable senators, by voting for this bill.

I would like to record in Hansard the views of the Professional Institute of Canada merely to state some figures which could be discussed later. The letter which I received was written in English. I will read it to you as written. There must be a French translation and I imagine that the translators will get it.

• (1600)

[English]

I quote:

> As the Senate reconvenes, Bill C-133, "An Act to Amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act", will be submitted to you for report stage consideration and third reading.

That should be second reading.

> The Professional Institute of the Public Service representing 18,000 scientific and professional employees of the federal government stands strongly in opposition to the de-indexation of public service pensions proposed by this measure.
> Unlike some Canadians who question the very existence of the Senate, the Professional Institute recognizes that in its role of carefully scrutinizing legislation, it functions as a vital safeguard to the democratic process. Bill C-133 represents a flagrant violation of public service pensioners' rights and in view of the considerable opposition mounted against this legislation, the Professional Institute is dismayed at the Government's decision to invoke closure.

They are referring to when the bill was passed in the other place.

> We ask for your serious consideration of this legislation and look forward to a long and lively debate on Bill C-133 in the Senate.

That's wishful thinking.

Senator Frith: Not as to "lively"!

Senator Flynn: Up to the present speaker. The letter continues:

> If you consider the following points as you make your decision, we believe that you will see no alternative but to vote against the legislation:
> Public employees pay 7.5 per cent of their salary to support their pension plan. In the private sector, employee contributions seldom exceed 5 per cent and are frequently less.
> Benefits paid from the plan to date have been more heavily financed by employees than by their employer. Of $1,360 million paid out between October 1981 and September 1982, employees contributed $735 million compared to the government's $625 million.
> There is a surplus of $15.5 billion in the Public Service Superannuation Account. The interest which can be earned on this amount is more than sufficient to pay for indexation.
> The Prime Minister has previously committed the government to full indexation of public service pensions as a right earned during working years. His ministers previously defended the plan and argued that the government could not break its contract—

And I underline "break its contract".

—with public employee pensioners by reducing indexation.

The government's Green Paper on pension reform clearly supports the need to protect all pensions against the erosion of inflation. Many observers in the private sector clearly agree. The Toronto Star, for example, urged the government on December 27, 1982 to restore full indexation.

The 6/5 programme has been justified on the basis of national interest. Is it in the national interest to deny pensioners, one of the groups in society least able to keep pace with inflation, the means of protecting their standard of living?

Public employee pensioners—all pensioners in Canada—need and deserve your support. Please look closely at Bill C-133 and show pensioners by your vote against this measure that you care about their rights and needs.

It is signed by Jack Donegani, President.

I guess you can say that this letter expresses generally the technical as well as the fundamental objections of pensioners to this legislation.

[Translation]

Before going on, with regard to the promise made by the Prime Minister, I should like to refer to a statement he made during the debates on the very important issue of indexing public service pensions, which took place between 1975 and 1977. That statement is reported on page 22213 of the House of Commons Hansard, and I quote:

—pensioners are out of the work force and cannot bargain or strike for larger incomes. They are not the cause of inflation, they are its victims. We have an obligation to protect them.

Try to reconcile this statement by the Prime Minister with the bill which is before us today!

They try to justify this bill by claiming that it is part of the six-and-five program. I suggest this is not true at all. The six-and-five program has nothing to do with superannuation. This bill may help reduce some government spending, but that is something else entirely. However, it has nothing to do with the six-and-five program which deals with salaries and wages. The government said that it would use the public service as an example for the private sector. Now the government has never claimed that it wanted the private sector to cap the indexation of its pensions. What is more, the government has never suggested that it wanted to cap the indexing of the Canada Pension Plan. I suggest that superannuation has nothing to do with the six-and-five program which is directed at wages and salaries. Superannuation is something else entirely.

If it is true that the capping of pensions is part of the six-and-five program, why is it that the government has never asked the private sector to follow suit? Why should it not apply then to the Canada Pension Plan? Why should it not apply also to the Quebec Pension Plan? Nobody has ever suggested that the six-and-five program should apply to pensions other than those mentioned in this bill. I say that the six-and-five program should not apply to those benefits. At best, it might help the government cut its spending. The Leader of the Government has stated that it would reduce government spending by $60 million in 1983 and $105 million the following year. The government wants to cut these benefits in spite of the fact that the Public Service Superannuation Account is not in the red. It does not show a deficit.

The letter from which I have quoted refers to an aggregate amount of $15.5 billion which yields enough interest to pay all pensions. For the time being, there is no need to use even part of the accrued capital. It seems to me totally unfair and inconsistent on the part of the government to suggest that this bill is part of its 6-and-5 program. In fact, if the 6-and-5 program were to have the success claimed by the government and if, as the Leader of the Government suggested, it would help in the fight against inflation and bring down the inflation rate to 6 or 7 per cent, why would there be any need for this legislation? It would be pointless.

Indexation would automatically be reduced to the level of inflation. I cannot believe that, to reduce inflation, we must reduce the pensions of the people affected by this bill, especially those with pensions under $5,000 or even $10,000. I find this unbelievable. In my opinion, it is simply a means of publicizing the 6-and-5 program, but it will result in a terrible and very unfortunate injustice, as the senators who spoke before me explained so eloquently.

I therefore suggest that this bill is fundamentally wrong and not justified by the reasons given by the government and especially by the hardship it will cause. I hope that the Senate will realize the situation and on second reading will vote against this bill. If, perchance, it would be a miracle! It would be unfortunate for the pensioners and for Canada if the Senate were once again to give in to the government. I hope that the concerned groups will at least have the opportunity to explain their position in committee, that the committee will listen to them seriously and that perhaps, as Senator Thompson, Senator Lafond and others have suggested, this iniquitous legislation will not be applied to those who cannot really afford this capping.

In this regard, I support Senator Croll. There is really something wrong if we are not ready to defeat this bill as we should.

I still hope that this will happen, although I doubt it in view of our past experience. I would like the government to realize sooner or later that the Senate is not simply a rubber stamp and that it does not exist simply to agree with the wishes of the government, even when they are morally wrong, to use the same word as Senator Lafond, yes, morally wrong. I could also speak of a betrayal of government promises. I could not use the word "traitor" because of a decision of the Quebec Appeals Court which has banned it. I have not read the ruling yet, but, in any case, I believe that this bill is certainly an act of spoliation and betrayal and I hope that the Senate will not become an accomplice to such action.

• (1610)

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, so far in this debate on second reading of Bill C-133 many comments have been made both for and against the principle of the bill.

I simply wish to state on behalf of the government that its position is that the first principle of the bill which the government is asking honourable senators to support is that it is part of the 6-and-5 restraint program. Honourable senators will remember that the 6-and-5 program started with parliamentarians and was then applied to the public service. The question raised here on second reading of Bill C-133 is whether that principle ought to be applied to the public service superannuation plan.

We come then to the second principle of the bill. The reason offered by the Leader of the Government in the Senate for so applying it is that 90 per cent of the contributions made come from the consolidated revenue fund, or from the taxpayers to whom we, as senators, also owe some duty.

The third principle is that, although the 6-and-5 program is reflected in this legislation, the increases are increased—because it is not a de-indexation but is a different indexation than would otherwise have applied—to 6.5 per cent in the first year and 5.5 per cent in the second year, which is better than in the case of any other applications of the plan to date. When you consider that 90 per cent of the superannuation comes from the taxpayers via the consolidated revenue fund, you may well ask why the government accepted an amendment in the other place to raise the percentages to 6.5 and 5.5 per cent. The minister, in speaking to the committee in the other place, made the following statement:

> I thought I should explain how the proposal to pay 6.5 per cent in 1983 and 5.5 per cent in 1984 to all beneficiaries under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act was determined. As I said, the history of the accounts shows that some 90 per cent of the total amount of indexing paid is charged directly to taxpayers through the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Therefore we feel that 90 per cent of the indexing to be paid in 1983 should be held to 6 per cent. The other 10 per cent of indexing for which advance contributions have been made will not be capped but will be at the 11.5 per cent level that would have been payable had there been no restraint program. The combination of these two amounts means that an overall increase level of 6.5 per cent can apply to all pensioners for 1983. For 1984, it has been estimated that the formula using the increase in the average of the Consumer Price Indices for the year ending September 1983 over the year ending September, 1982 under the current legislation—that is, without Bill C-133—would have produced an increase of about 8.2 per cent, based on the expectation of a 7.5 per cent inflation rate in 1983, the rate projected by the Minister of Finance in his October economic statement. On this basis a calculation like that which gives 6.5 per cent in 1983 leads to an increase of 5.5 per cent in 1984.

• (1620)

Honourable senators, those are the three principles of the bill that the government asks honourable senators to support on second reading.

I can say that if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, I have authority from Senator Olson, the sponsor of the bill, to waive his right to close the debate on second reading.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, with all respect to Senator Frith, I feel obliged to say a few words to explain how I will vote.

We have to vote on the principle of the bill before we have been given an opportunity to study in depth some of the arguments regarding contract, obligations, and so forth that will be made in a committee of the Senate, which will probably be sitting tomorrow. I am a member of the committee to which this bill will be referred.

My desk-mate, Senator Croll, is a senator who came to Parliament more than 37 years ago, as I did. When I was first elected I was elected under the designation of Liberal-Labour, and under this designation was elected in six more general elections. I will not go into the historic details, other than to say it was not just a pick-up of a name of convenience. There is an historic reason for the title in the amalgamation of the old Independent Labour Party and the Liberal Party in Kenora-Rainy River. I inherited that meaningful combined organization. I will not go into details now.

In the years I sat with Senator Croll in the other place we stood together and voted four, five or six times against our government. I felt that in social development matters and veterans affairs matters I had a better mentor in Senator Croll than I had sometimes in the higher leadership of our party. We have now been desk-mates for a great number of years in the Senate. I want to pay profound tribute to him by voting with him again.

Every time Senator Croll and I voted against the government in the other place, I think we were just a little ahead of our time, because on each occasion I think our views and principles were ultimately adopted in later amending legislation.

As I said, I have never found it inadvisable to follow the leadership of Senator Croll in the councils of our party and in Parliament, and today I am prepared to stand again with my learned desk-mate and vote with him.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I close the debate.

Senator Asselin: It has been closed already.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I understand Senator Frith stated earlier that I would not be replying to a number of the points raised.

As honourable senators know, I have been attending a cabinet meeting. I do not have anything further to add. I think the speech I gave at the outset was so completely self-explanatory that I need not say anything further.

An Hon. Senator: Question?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that this bill be now read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are opposed to the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the order of the Senate passed earlier today provides that, if the bill be read a second time, it be referred to committee with the instruction of the house that the bill be reported back to the Senate no later than Monday, January 31, 1983, at 2.15 p.m.

With that in mind, honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would refer to Motion No. 2 on the Order Paper in the name of Senator Flynn.

Honourable senators will remember that Senator Flynn gave notice of the following motion yesterday:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, 31st January, 1983, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

In view of the order we have adopted, I propose to amend his motion to provide for a sitting at 2 o'clock in the afternoon instead of at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Perhaps a better procedure would be for Senator Flynn, with unanimous consent and pursuant to rule 23, to modify his motion to so provide.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday, January 31, 1983, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, January 31, 1983, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, January 31, 1983

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received a certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that William McDonough Kelly has been summoned to the Senate.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons, which was read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk; and was seated:

Hon. William McDonough Kelly, of Mississauga, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Jacques Flynn, P.C. and Hon. Guy Charbonneau.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (1405)

The Hon. the Speaker: It is indeed a great honour and pleasure to welcome, as a new member of this house, the Honourable William Kelly. I am sure that my feelings are shared by all honourable senators.

He will find here an amazing unanimity on the general objective of making Canada, in all aspects, the best country in the world. The sole misunderstandings are limited to the means of obtaining this noble goal.

SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Peter Bosa, for Hon. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Monday, January 31, 1983

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to which was referred Bill C-133 intituled "An Act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (No. 2)", has, in obedience to its order of reference of January 26, 1983, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but makes two recommendations in relation thereto.

Your Committee recommends that, at the end of the current control period, action should be taken to adjust pension levels as may be necessary to eliminate the long term effect on real pension levels.

Your Committee also recommends that the Government of Canada consider the establishment of a threshold to exclude from the effects of this Bill those pensioners whose total income is below the poverty line.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Chairman

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, because the proceedings are somewhat unusual from this point on, perhaps I should draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that, according to the rules, the bill, having been reported without amendment, stands adopted without a motion being put, pursuant to rule 78(4).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You have made a mistake. The bill does not stand adopted.

Senator Frith: That is precisely what I meant, the subject of "stands" is the report. That is quite correct.

In case there is doubt in anyone's mind, when a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report stands adopted without any motion being put, and the rule goes on to say:

> —and the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

In this case, of course, we have an order that the Senate shall debate and vote on the bill today, and that all questions necessary to dispose of it shall be put by 4.45 this afternoon.

• (1410)

In addition, Senator Flynn suggested on the last occasion that, instead of moving third reading later today, we might agree to proceed with the debate on the bill now and postpone Question Period. We are agreeable to either procedure, but I point out that it will be debated either later today or now, pursuant to the Senate order, and not on a future day. Honourable senators may want to proceed with the debate now or wait until it arises under Orders of the Day.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, since the chairman of the committee is not present and there are recommendations at this stage, I would imagine that once third reading has been moved by the sponsor of the bill we would have an explanation provided by the chairman of the committee or the acting chairman of the committee, Senator Bosa.

As far as Question Period is concerned, I do not know if many questions will be posed, but by proceeding with it now perhaps we would allow some senators to arrive in time for the debate and the vote later today. Perhaps it would be a better idea to have Question Period now, for whatever it is worth or for whatever time it takes.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition on both points. I believe it is clear that the correct procedure is to debate the recommendations and other contents of the report at the third reading stage. I agree with him that it would be quite appropriate for the acting chairman of the committee to lead off the debate on third reading or, at least, engage in the debate on third reading to explain the recommendations contained in the report.

As to the second point, I agree also that we should proceed with the items on the agenda as usual, and have the motion for third reading as the first item on Orders of the Day. If that is agreeable, I ask the Leader of the Government, the sponsor of the bill, to move that the bill be read the third time later this day.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before that action is taken, may I enquire as to whether we will receive copies of the report? Not all of us are members of that committee. We have heard the report read, but it is not possible to grasp what is in it merely by hearing it read. I think it would be a good idea if the chairman of the committee could arrange for the distribution of copies of that report before we begin our third reading debate.

Senator Frith: That is a good suggestion and we shall see that that is done.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, February 1, 1983, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I can explain the reason for this motion if leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1415)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, normally we would adjourn until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon unless otherwise ordered, and I am therefore moving that we sit at 8 o'clock in the evening. Four or five committees will be sitting tomorrow, and adjourning until 8 o'clock in the evening will facilitate the work of those committees. The intention is to deal with some of the items on the Order Paper tomorrow evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No legislation is expected from the House of Commons today or tomorrow?

Senator Frith: That is correct.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I take issue with the deputy leader's statement. It is my understanding, if the news reports are correct, that in the other place there will be limitation of debate on Bill C-131, to amend the Old Age Security Act, which means the debate will be concluded today or tomorrow. Will that mean that the Senate will be under duress and that we shall be under pressure to pass the bill without proper debate so that cheques can be issued?

Senator Frith: It is my understanding that the House of Commons will be at the report stage of Bill C-131 tomorrow. On Wednesday they will be dealing with the question of reports on the composition of committees. Therefore, the third reading of Bill C-131 will not take place until Thursday.

I believe that my colleague, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, as a member of cabinet, can tell us more about the cheques.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the answer is very simple: the cheques have already gone.

Senator Flynn: As usual.

Senator Marshall: You're cute.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Could the Leader of the Government give us some warning as to what we may expect for the remainder of this week?

I am sure honourable senators are aware of the fact that in eastern Canada we have a major strike on our hands involving Eastern Provincial Airways. For the first time in months the 7 o'clock 727, on which we were travelling this morning, was filled. I think that is rather indicative of the fact that we may expect to encounter some difficulty in making arrangements to travel back and forth in eastern Canada.

Would the Leader of the Government give us any information he has regarding what we may expect for the remainder of this week?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have discussed this with a number of senators, including the Leader of the Opposition. I would suggest that we proceed with what has now been proposed—that is, the Senate sitting tomorrow evening so that committees can meet all day tomorrow.

A number of items on the order paper are not government business. We could deal with those tomorrow evening if honourable senators so wish.

Unless we receive some further government business or legislation from the other place by tomorrow evening—and the prospects of that happening are not great at the moment, but I have to add that caveat—I would suggest that we adjourn until the following Tuesday.

As the deputy leader has already pointed out, there is a greater possibility that we will have further government business later in the week, perhaps by Thursday. There are a number of bills that the government believes have been debated adequately. They have been debated for a number of weeks, and in some cases for longer than that, so it is really entirely in the hands of the opposition as to whether they wish, for whatever reason, to pass some of these bills through the last stage in the other place now.

● (1420)

I believe that many of these bills are now at the last stage in the other place, so it is possible that they will come to us quickly. I am sure that honourable senators are prepared to deal with those bills when they arrive. At the moment, however, it does not appear to us that any of them will come over this week. Only Bill C-131 would be introduced into the Senate next Tuesday, at which time we would try to make a projection as to the government business we will receive next week. I think honourable senators will agree that we should spend however much time is required to deal with it.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday, February 2, 1983, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether we will have the benefit of the presence of the other ministers this afternoon? I ask this question because he himself, having no specific responsibility, as a rule, can only take questions as notice and provide a reply which is supplied to him by someone else. The ministers, on the other hand, have specific responsibilities. Senator Perrault, for example, has the immense responsibility of fitness and amateur sport. Senator Argue is responsible for the Wheat Board. Senator Austin is responsible for an infinite number of little boards of all kinds.

The ministers appear in this chamber to give us specific answers to questions which are of their immediate responsibility. Although the presence of the Leader of the Government is always enjoyable, we really cannot do much by way of an active and useful Question Period without the presence of the other ministers.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I suppose it all depends on the questions that are asked and the manner in which they are framed. If the Leader of the Opposition and other honourable senators would ask their questions now, I may know the answers to some of them. I have some information here, if the right questions are asked.

Senator Flynn: The right questions?

Senator Olson: Furthermore, honourable senators will invariably get more fully considered replies to their questions if they give us some notice of them.

With respect to the presence of the other three ministers, I can tell the honourable senator that Senator Argue is attending an extremely important meeting in Europe, and he may not be back for several days. I am sure that when he returns he will be able to tell us whether he has good news with respect to some parts of the Canadian economy, particularly the grain sector. At any rate, he will be able to tell honourable senators what the Canadian delegation has attempted to do at that meeting, and the results may signify good news for us.

I will make inquiries about Senators Austin and Perrault, although I reiterate that I am happy to take questions as notice. Honourable senators will get full and complete answers, possibly by tomorrow night, and, if not, as soon as is possible.

● (1425)

Senator Flynn: I must say, that is quite different from the time when the Leader of the Government was responsible for economic development. He could talk about everything and, even if he did not say much, he was quite entertaining.

Senator Olson: In reply to the Leader of the Opposition, I would say that I am quite prepared to be entertaining now, if that is his objective.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not so anxious to be entertained as I am to be informed. I should like the minister to tell me whether he can give us an undertaking that Senator Austin will be in the chamber tomorrow. I have some questions that I would like to put to him concerning certain of his activities and it would be more productive if I were able to do so face to face rather than through the intermediation of my honourable friend, competent as no doubt he is. I would like the Leader of the Government to let me know if I can anticipate Senator Austin's presence tomorrow.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in the interest of being informative, I will see that a message is conveyed immediately to Senator Austin to inquire whether we can anticipate his attendance here tomorrow. I shall try to advise my honourable friend later today.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES—ANTICIPATED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Can the Leader of the Government tell me whether any statement will be made in the Senate tomorrow concerning the Crow? I believe a statement is being made by the Minister of Transport in the other place. Who will be responsible for informing us?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there has been some speculation, that may or may not be completely accurate, about a number of press conferences to be held tomorrow. In reply to the more specific question as to whether a statement will be made here tomorrow evening, when the Senate meets at 8 p.m., I expect it is entirely possible that honourable senators will by then—much earlier in the day—have in their possession a number of communiqués and other pieces of information respecting the announcement.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, communiqués are all very well in their place, and press conferences are all very well under certain circumstances, but when Parliament is sitting, I do not consider it too much to ask that the government make a statement to Parliament, including this house, as to what is being done with respect to the Crow. We are all on tenterhooks to see how Senator Argue's third option is making out in those discussions; to see, whether he has been sunk without a trace or whether he has been raised on high. I am curious about that. I am sure that the people in my part of the country would expect me to be informed by the government as to what it is going to do with respect to the Crow. If the government makes a statement in this house, it then provides an opportunity for an exchange of opinions.

Senator Olson: I understand that clearly. To answer the specific question concerning who will be here tomorrow evening, obviously I shall have to make some inquiries. I can give the honourable senator as well as other honourable senators the assurance that they will be fully informed regarding the announcement. The honourable senator will have that information in his possession tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would like to know if there will be someone on the front bench who can speak about it. In my opinion, it is not good enough to tell us that we are going to have a press release. What we will require is a discussion of some of the aspects of that in the house, with a further explanation from the minister. If the Leader of the Government is in the house, then I suggest that he undertake that responsibility.

Senator Olson: I will take those representations into account.

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

FISHERIES POLICY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, can the minister give us some further information on the fisheries policy in connection with the European Economic Community? I understand that a new policy was released on January 25. However, when I telephoned the organization, I was told that the person who was listed to provide the information was away for a month. They said that a policy would be issued soon.

This is important to Canada, and particularly to the Province of Newfoundland with respect to the allocation of quotas, especially in view of the fact that the European Economic Community is not helping the development of Newfoundland or its economy since it is banning the sale of seal pelts in Europe. How can anyone in the Senate deal with such a situation when there is no fisheries committee?

I am hoping that the minister will be able to reply without my having to wait a week, by which time the question may be outdated, as are many of my questions and the delayed replies that I receive.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are two aspects to that question. The first is whether there will be an announcement, and my honourable friend knows as well as I do that an announcement will come when they are ready to make the announcement. I do not think that a day was specified in advance, nor do I think that a date has been specified as to whether there will be an announcement following a number of activities which are under way with respect to the Atlantic fisheries.

• (1430)

The other point is that I should like some expansion on the announcement dated January 25, to which the honourable senator referred. I am not sure of the contents of that announcement. So if there is something in that communiqué, or whatever it is, perhaps the honourable senator would like to expand on his questions and I shall obtain an answer for him.

NEWFOUNDLAND

CORNER BROOK—SUGGESTED LOCATION OF FISHERIES COLLEGE—EXPANSION OF JOB CREATION PROGRAMS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, let us take a look at the answer that appeared in Debates of the Senate on January 25 with regard to the location of the fisheries college. The reply says that the federal government is acceding to the request of the provincial government because education is a provincial responsibility. The minister knows that the access schools across Newfoundland were built by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. There is no point in giving an answer like that. It is superfluous, ridiculous and an answer which everybody in the country who has an interest in the matter knew two or three weeks ago. My question was directed to the status of the college, whether money has been allocated for its construction and whether the location of the college has been decided. If the Leader of the Government reads House of Commons Hansard, he will find that different ministers have given different versions of the government's intentions—one being that the matter is still open to question.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, whether Senator Marshall likes it or not, he has to accept the fact that until a firm decision has been made by the government and the ministers are, therefore, authorized to make a firm announcement as to site, amount of funding and so on, he will have to wait. I shall check into the matter again, but if the honourable senator will read the answer carefully he will find that it responds to his question. If there are still some questions open to discussion or negotiation with the Province of Newfoundland, then we cannot make an affirmative announcement until those discussions have been concluded.

Senator Marshall: Let us turn to another answer dealing with the closing of the Bowater plant in Corner Brook, Newfoundland, necessitating the laying-off of some 700 people and resulting in a serious effect on the economy of western Newfoundland. The answer I received was to the effect that departmental officials are monitoring the situation. What kind of answer is that? Either they do not regard senators as being responsible people or they just do not care.

Just three weeks ago I spoke to the chairman of Bowater Corporation and received an answer which had nothing to do with monitoring. If officials are monitoring the situation, why does the answer not say, "We are not interested" or, "We are not doing anything," instead of giving an answer that is embarrassing?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the reason that answer was given is because it is the truth. It is not true to say that we are not interested or that we are not concerned, but it is probably true to say that the departmental officials are monitoring the situation. The departmental officials are not the managers of the plant, as my honourable friend knows, and until we are ready to make an announcement of any type with respect to any government action on the matter it is probably highly desirable to monitor the situation. I do not think that my honourable friend should cast such a disparaging light on that answer or, indeed, on the value of monitoring a private sector company involved in economic activity anywhere in Canada. The reason the answer was given, I presume, is that it is the truth and that is what we try to give in all answers.

Senator Marshall: The Leader of the Government used to be the Minister of State for Economic Development, so he should know something about the matter. Perhaps he could talk to the responsible and expert officials in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and obtain a real answer instead of passing the buck.

Senator Olson: That answer was not intended to pass the buck.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, to keep it for you.

EDUCATION

POST-SECONDARY—STATUS OF FUNDING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Tremblay on December 21 with respect to post-secondary education support. It is a very long one and I ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

On December 21 Senator Tremblay raised some questions about the progress of discussions with the provinces regarding federal support to post-secondary education in Canada. I am pleased to supply further details on this matter. Let me trace the developments of the past 15 months chronologically.

In the November 1981 budget speech, the Minister of Finance indicated that it was the intention of the Government of Canada to seek better federal-provincial arrangements for support of post-secondary education than those offered by the current established programs financing legislation. He stated that March 31, 1983 was the target for achieving satisfactory progress towards this goal.

In February 1982 the Prime Minister offered at the first ministers' conference to extend for an additional year the period for working out new arrangements provided the provinces offered assurances that they would maintain their current share of funding for post-secondary education and would discuss with the federal government ways in which national objectives and concerns in this field might better be met. Unfortunately, the provinces rejected this offer.

On July 9, 1982 the Secretary of State met with provincial ministers responsible for education and outlined the federal position as follows:

"The Government of Canada wishes to achieve three main goals in new arrangements for its general financing of post-secondary education:

—first, we wish to contribute, in an equitable way with the provinces, to providing the resources needed for a strong, dynamic post-secondary system throughout Canada;

—second, we intend to ensure that federal support, in whatever form it takes, is provided in a much more accountable way than at present;

—third, we wish to meet national objectives in support of post-secondary education. In particular, I place high priority on strengthened support of students."

He stressed that it was essential that the constitutional responsibilities of the provinces for education be respected and stated that he wished to consult the provinces on all of these aims before the federal government decided on the measures to be taken to achieve them.

On September 28 the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada, the Hon. Bette Stephenson of Ontario, wrote to the Secretary of State on behalf of her provincial colleagues. She stated that the provinces favoured a maintenance of the principles of established programs financing and indicated a willingness to discuss further the various issues that had been raised in the July meeting.

Since that time, the new Secretary of State, the Hon. Serge Joyal, has held discussions with various provincial ministers, and especially Dr. Stephenson, as well as with representatives of students, faculty and the post-secondary education institutions, to explore further the ways in which federal support can best be provided to Canada's higher education system. Most recently, he met on January 23 with the provincial ministers who were gathered in Victoria for a meeting of the Council of Ministers of Education.

Meanwhile, the Minister of Finance at the December 16 meeting of federal and provincial finance ministers outlined some of the possibilities under consideration by the Government of Canada for future post-secondary support and stated that he would be looking to the outcome of the Secretary of State's discussions with education ministers for an indication of the kind of co-operation that could be developed. Incidentally, I should correct the impression given by Senator Tremblay that EPF arrangements expire March 31, 1983. There is, in fact, no termination date on the current legislation.

The government is optimistic that out of these discussions can come, in the near future, new arrangements for post-secondary support that ensure a closer relationship with national objectives in this field. Let me stress that these objectives encompass not only some rather specific concerns with providing the highly qualified manpower and research capabilities that are essential for our future economic development, but a broad base of general support for the education system and its students. Such matters involve much more than simple fiscal transfers and this is why discussions with the provinces naturally involve, as Senator Tremblay implied, both finance ministers and ministers responsible for education matters.

FORESTRY

NEWFOUNDLAND—SITE OF RESEARCH CENTRE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on January 26. I am sure that he will be very happy because it is the same kind of complete and accurate answer as he usually receives.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He is the only one.

Senator Olson: Since it is not long, perhaps I should read it. The question concerns the site for a federal forestry research centre in Newfoundland.

Honourable senators, the Province of Newfoundland would like to relocate the Newfoundland Forestry Research Centre from St. John's to Corner Brook. Indeed, the Province of Newfoundland has indicated that it is willing to make land available to the federal government in the Corner Brook area for the construction of such a research facility.

This generous offer will be taken into consideration by the Site Selection Committee which is to present a report to the Minister of the Environment concerning the possible relocation of the Forestry Research Centre. The committee is chaired by Mr. W. J. Carroll, Regional Director for Newfoundland and Labrador of the Canadian Forestry Service.

As well, the committee is also considering representations from members of Parliament, members of the Legislative Assembly and community workers—

Hon. Jack Marshall: What about senators?

Senator Olson: —and will make its report to the minister within the next few weeks. I wanted to finish the answer before I replied to Senator Marshall's question concerning representations from members of the Senate. Members of the Senate are members of Parliament.

Senator Marshall: That's right; I forgot. Thank you for that very nice answer.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SOUTH AFRICA

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on December 16, 1981. It relates to the sale of military equipment to South Africa. I previously gave an answer dealing with the general principles applying to his question and promised to give more detail. I now have the detail. It is about two pages long and I am prepared to have it taken as read.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

First, the export of military and strategic goods and technologies are controlled under the legislative authority of the Export and Import Permits Act. Under this act, export permits are required for a wide range of strategic industrial goods and technologies as well as military and nuclear goods and technologies as defined in the Export Control List (ECL). Goods identified on the ECL require permits for export from Canada to all destinations except the U.S.A. where permits are generally not necessary if that is the ultimate destination of the goods.

The process of export permit approval provides and will continue to provide for close scrutiny of individual applications. Where political or security implications exist, permit applications are reviewed by both the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence. Difficult or sensitive cases are submitted to concerned ministers and may also be referred to Cabinet wherever the same is deemed to be appropriate.

Military goods and technologies subject to the U.N. arms embargo on South Africa are identified on the Export Control List. The majority of goods listed on the Export Control List are not military but rather strategic industrial items; that is, equipment and technologies of a commercial civilian nature and design that could have a military application. Included here are items such as computers, telecommunications systems, certain civilian aircraft, avionics equipment, sophisticated industrial fabricating machinery, etc. Exports of this type of equipment to South Africa are allowed only when destined to bona fide commercial concerns for civilian application. Where doubts are raised about the end user of such equipment, permit applications are considered interdepartmentally. Should there be any evidence that the equipment in question is to be used for military purposes against the civilian population, the permit application is denied in keeping with U.N. Security Council Resolution No. 421. No export of military goods to South Africa is approved.

Secondly, although the prime criterion for government assistance to industry under the Defence Industry Productivity Program (DIPP) or the Program for Export Market Development (PEMD) is that an adequate exports market is identified which meets program requirements, all exports must also conform to requirements of the Export and Import Permits Act.

The vast majority of defence and related high technology products assisted by DIPP are exported to the U.S.A.; others would be sold only to countries for whom an export permit could be obtained. Therefore few, if any, such products were exported knowingly to countries "regularly cited by Amnesty International for human rights violations". However, since DIPP assists a wide range of Canadian industry, including manufacturers of castings, precision machining, steel plate, etc., most of which are exported to the U.S.A., it is possible that some Canadian components could be included as part of complete U.S. products which might be exported to some of the countries in question.

In the case of PEMD, assistance is granted for a very wide range of products and services, many of which do not involve products listed on the ECL. However, many exports to countries listed on the Area Control List (ACL) of the Export and Imports Permits Act or those subject to U.N. Resolutions would still require export permits, which might not be granted. In this regard, it should be noted that PEMD assistance would not be granted if it was known at the time the application was being processed that an export permit would not be granted.

Thirdly, applications for assistance under these two programs are not considered "exclusively on an economic basis"—by which it is assumed is meant on the basis of the value of sales. To qualify for assistance a number of eligibility criteria must be met both by the company and the product—which are available from ITC/REE Program Office, Regional Offices or DEA Defence Programs and Special Marketing. If there is a question of a need for export permits, then interdepartmental consultation between DEA and DND, and other departments as appropriate, takes place as standard procedure.

[The Hon. the Acting Speaker.]

SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—THIRD READING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-133, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, I think that Senator Flynn will agree with me when I suggest that perhaps we ought to hear from the acting chairman of the committee. I would like to compliment the committee on their work last week on Bill C-133. The two recommendations are such that we should consider them. Therefore, I think it would be useful to begin that consideration by having an expanded report from the acting chairman of the committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We want to hear from Senator Bosa.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, the committee met last Thursday at 9 o'clock and it heard all the witnesses who wanted to appear and make representations.

● (1440)

At the end of the testimony the committee engaged in a lengthy discussion of what it ought to do and what it ought to recommend to the Senate. It came to the conclusion—not unanimously, I must say—that it would report the bill to the Senate without amendment. However, the committee did include two recommendations in its report.

The first recommendation was basically Senator Thompson's. He had been advised by Mr. Barnes of the Federal Superannuates National Association, who appeared before the committee, of the fear that that association had concerning the long-term effects of the application of the 6.5 per cent and 5.5 per cent increases on pensions. In response to that the committee approved the following recommendation:

> Your committee recommends that at the end of the current control period action should be taken to adjust pension levels as may be necessary to eliminate the long-term effect on real pension levels.

The committee then proceeded to discuss another aspect of the effects of the 6½-and-5½ program and, as a consequence, made the following recommendation:

> Your committee also recommends that the Government of Canada consider the establishment of a threshold to exclude from the effects of this bill those pensioners whose total income is below the poverty line.

Some senators were under the impression that the approximately 30,000 pensioners who receive survivor's benefits, and whose average benefit or pension is approximately $3,200, would be in such an age bracket that that would represent their entire income. That was the reason behind this recommendation.

However, we were not provided with any statistics by either the minister or the officials of the department, or by the witnesses who appeared before the committee. We were not told, for instance, the age bracket of these 30,000 or so recipients of such small pensions; we were not given any statistics relating to why their pension are so low. The members of the committee could only speculate on whether particular pensions were low because the recipient's spouse had been an employee of the government for only a short period of time and had then died. If that were the case, the recipient of that particular small pension might be a young person who has remarried.

If the person in question had died after January 1, 1966, the day on which the Canada Pension Plan went into effect, then, as honourable senators will recall, there would have come into play the provision in the Canada Pension Plan that anyone who had contributed for a period of ten years would receive the full benefits under the plan, while anyone who had contributed for fewer than ten years but had reached the age of 65 would receive a percentage of the benefits that the plan provides.

We can presume, honourable senators, that, since the Canada Pension Plan has been in effect for the past 17 years, anyone who died 16 years ago or later would have left some survivor's benefit to his or her spouse. That is the only conclusion we were able to come to, and that was based on our searching our memories rather than on statistics and hard facts that might have been provided by either the witnesses or the officials.

I hope, honourable senators, that that explains the thinking behind the recommendations accompanying the report I have submitted today on behalf of Senator Bonnell.

Senator Flynn: Did you support those recommendations yourself?

Senator Bosa: I supported one of them.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before I make a few brief remarks on the bill, will the Leader of the Government indicate to the Senate whether the government is prepared to accept the recommendations of the committee? Can he give us some indication of the government's thinking before further debate takes place?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Phillips will understand that the Leader of the Government in the Senate, even though he is a member of the cabinet, cannot give that undertaking now. What the committee recommends is that at the end of the current control period some action should be taken to adjust pension levels for a number of reasons. It also recommends that the government consider the establishment of a threshold.

The fact of the matter is that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science has only now presented its report to this chamber. The government has not had time to consider it. On the basis of simple logistics, it is obvious that that question cannot be answered; but even from a policy point of view I am in no position to give the kind of undertaking Senator Phillips has asked for.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, as Senator Bosa stated, the committee heard a number of groups. In the morning session the superannuates's association presented an excellent brief, and gave the committee members the benefit of their personal situation and experience. I found that group to be quite helpful. The other groups which appeared in the afternoon also presented helpful views.

The concern of the committee can be summed up in the two recommendations attached to the report. Its first concern was the fact that this is not a two-year measure. As this legislation stands, the reduction or loss of pension resulting from the decreased indexation will continue for the lives of the recipients and the lives of their survivors. The committee concluded that at the end of this legislation the recipients of the pension should have the indexation restored to the level which would exist if the legislation were not passed.

If I understood him correctly, Senator Bosa mentioned that the recommendations were not unanimous. I believe, however, that this recommendation was unanimous.

Am I correct in that belief, Senator Bosa?

Senator Bosa: I was referring to the report's not being unanimous. Certainly, this recommendation was unanimous, yes.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, one member of the committee expressed a concern—and he may wish to elaborate on it—that pensioners should be included in any further benefits given to public servants. Retired public servants have no means of negotiating with the government. It is quite possible, therefore, that in future public servants may receive further benefits to compensate for the reduction of their present salaries. The suggestion was that that should be reflected in pensions as well.

The particular member of the committee who voiced that suggestion expressed eloquently the viewpoint that pensioners should be treated in the same manner as the present employees.

Senator Lafond, in his remarks, expressed the viewpoint that there should be a threshold for the income which would be affected by this legislation.

• (1450)

Senator Bosa referred to the possibility of other income. I really do not think that that is important, Senator Bosa, because it is the poverty line that is important. If a survivor is receiving $3,200 from a spouse's public service pension, and a small amount from the Canada Pension Plan, the amount from the Canada Pension Plan is really unimportant as far as this recommendation is concerned. It is the poverty line that is important with respect to this recommendation. I am sure Senator Bosa recognizes that and was not trying to whitewash the recommendation or weaken it in any way by ignoring the fact that the poverty line is the essence of the recommendation.

Honourable senators, one item that disturbed me personally during the committee stage—and I think it disturbed Senator Bosa also—was the difficulty of accounting for these various superannuation funds. There is, as honourable senators are aware, a superannuation fund, and then a separate fund for indexation funds. The government treats the superannuation fund differently from the way it treats the supplementary retirement benefits fund. This leads to confusion when a public servant retires and the government has not paid interest into the supplementary retirement benefits fund, with the government maintaining it did but that it credited it to the individual's fund. One has to be somewhat of an actuarial expert to follow the arguments on both sides. I am certainly not an actuarial expert, nor do I think are other members of the committee. Therefore, I should like to see the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance study this and make a recommendation to the government that both funds be treated in the same manner so as to avoid this confusion.

Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government, in reply to a question I put, said that the report of the committee had just been received, and that the government had had no time to consider it. I would be very surprised if on Thursday afternoon the Leader of the Government did not know about these two recommendations. I saw the Liberal whip at the committee proceedings, so I presume he would have advised the Leader of the Government on Thursday of those two recommendations.

If the Leader of the Government did know about them on Thursday afternoon, I should like him to tell us if he had an opportunity to speak with the President of the Treasury Board. I should like him to assure this chamber that the government is prepared to give serious consideration to these two recommendations.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Phillips: The second recommendation, honourable senators, requires immediate attention. We cannot wait until the program expires to establish a threshold. That must be done immediately. Therefore, in order to give the government an opportunity to establish that threshold, I move, seconded by Senator Muir:

> That Bill C-133, an Act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (No. 2), be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day six months hence.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, if no one else wishes to speak at this time, I should like to make one comment, and that is—

Senator Flynn: When the question on the motion in amendment is put, you may speak.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Muir:

> That Bill C-133, an Act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (No. 2), be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day six months hence.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not intend to debate the motion in amendment, but in light of the order of this house, that the motion for third reading be voted on, and all necessary questions to dispose of third reading be put, not later than 4.45 this afternoon, I question whether the motion in amendment is not contrary to that house order and, therefore, should be ruled out of order as it applies to this particular bill.

Senator Flynn: I do not really see how the deputy leader can make that argument. It must flow from his imagination. There is no doubt that the order we have adopted does not preclude any amendment of any kind.

If the deputy leader reads paragraph 3 of that order, he will see that it states:

> That no later than four forty-five o'clock p.m. Monday, 31st January, 1983, any proceedings before the Senate shall be interrupted and all questions necessary to dispose of the third reading of the said Bill shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment.

It says "all questions", not "the question".

I do not know whether the plural means nothing or whether it is the contention of the deputy leader, that it does mean nothing, but I should like to hear from him on that point.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I think he is confusing passing the bill with disposing of the amendments before the house.. There is nothing in the order that says we have to pass the bill; the order merely says that we must dispose of it, and that is what we intend to do. If the government follows our advice, it will be disposed of for quite a long time.

My honourable friend ought to make that distinction. He is so anxious to get it passed that he thinks the only alternative we have is to pass it, but that is not so. The order says that we must dispose of it, and we can dispose of it in any manner we wish. There is nothing in the order that says we have to pass it, therefore, the amendment moved by my honourable friend, Senator Phillips, is perfectly in order.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, it seems to me that the only question we have to resolve now is whether we vote on Senator Phillips' motion for a six-months' hoist now, or whether we delay that vote also until 4.45 p.m. It is of little concern to me which the house decides to do.

Senator Flynn: One way or another, I have no problem. If it is the wish of the deputy leader that the two questions be put together at the end—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is really not a question of what I want or do not want; it is a question of whether the motion is in order.

In my opinion, there is a question with regard to this particular motion in the context of the order of the Senate, because this is not a motion amending the motion for third reading, but a motion for a six-months' hoist which, in effect, defeats voting on the motion for third reading.

Of course, what I am anxious to do, and what I think the Senate was anxious to do having regard for the order it made, is to have this disposed of, not necessarily to have it passed. It is up to each senator to decide whether it should be passed or not.

I believe there is a question of order regarding this particular motion for a six months' hoist in the context of the wording of the house order, and I simply ask for a ruling on it. It is not a matter of personal caprice.

Senator Flynn: Are you really serious? I think you should study the meaning of that kind of motion, which has the effect of defeating the bill without saying that we are entirely opposed to it. It is the equivalent of voting against third reading but in a different way from voting directly against third reading. The six months' hoist has always been interpreted that way. I do not think Senator Frith has understood the words he read.

● (1500)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, do I put the question?

Senator Flynn: If Your Honour says that the motion is in order, I think that Senator Godfrey wants to speak to it now, and perhaps I shall have a few words to say as well.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Is Your Honour ruling that it is in order, then?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, if I might make a suggestion, I do not think it is fair to the Speaker to have to make a ruling at this particular moment on something that requires some thought. The ruling could be made at 4.45, and we could have the two votes at that time.

Senator Flynn: I agree with that. If Your Honour wants to take the objection of Senator Frith under advisement, that is fine. In the meantime, we could continue the debate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I declare that the motion in amendment is in order, so if you want to discuss it, go ahead.

Senator Frith: Is that without any further reference to the rules?

Senator Roblin: Wait a minute!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let me tell you what I had in mind.

Senator Flynn: When it is obvious, there is no necessity.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn asked if I were serious. I simply want to draw to the attention of honourable senators that there is a provision in Beauchesne that the motion for a six months' hoist is in order on second reading. This bill has already received second reading. In my submission, this motion is not in order on third reading.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Frith: The reference is at page 225 of Beauchesne.

Senator Flynn: Because it says it is in order on second reading, you cannot argue that it is out of order on third reading.

Senator Roblin: That is ridiculous.

Senator Flynn: You are really pushing things.

Senator Frith: I assume that when Senator Flynn says "you" he means the Speaker, since he makes his comments on a ruling—

Senator Flynn: When I say "you" I mean you, Senator Frith.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could—

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators—

An Hon. Senator: Order!

Senator Olson: I think I have the floor.

Senator Muir: I rise on a point of order—

Senator Olson: It is a point of order that we are talking about.

Senator Frith: The Speaker has made the ruling, so let us leave it at that. We are uselessly getting into name-calling.

Senator Olson: My point is that there are other associated problems, namely, the matter of the debate of the motion. I believe there has been a suggestion, which perhaps we should consider, that there cannot be two motions before the house at the same time. Even Senator Flynn will agree to that.

Senator Roblin: There are not.

Senator Olson: It is a hoist. There is no doubt about that. Perhaps we could carry on with the debate until the house order takes effect at 4.45, and put both motions at the same time.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to speak to a point of order. I want to point out to the deputy leader that Beauchesne also deals with amendments on third reading. He gave us the rule about amendments on second reading which clearly makes it obvious that six months' hoist, as is being proposed, is in order on second reading. If he turns to page 239 of Beauchesne, paragraph 802, he will see the following:

> When an Order of the Day for the third reading of a bill is called, the same type of amendments which are permissible at the second reading stage are permissible at the third reading stage—

Of course, that is ordinary common sense.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, the most elementary rule of Parliament is being ignored. Her Honour the Acting Speaker made a ruling at least ten minutes ago, and put a motion. I would hope that this chamber will respect that.

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the two motions be put at 4.45?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, it makes sense that we should continue until 4.45, and dispose of both motions at the same time. I do not know what the proper procedure is.

Senator Flynn: I do not mind if the vote is taken now, but if Senator Godfrey wants to speak—

Senator Godfrey: The point of procedure that I was going to speak on was something entirely different. I want to speak on that later. I am sorry.

Senator Flynn: If the motion is before the house and has been ruled in order, I want to add a few words.

I could not attend the committee meeting in the afternoon, but I was there in the morning. I heard witnesses and the minister, in particular, establish that this bill has nothing to do with the deficiencies of the pension system, in either its general application or in connection with the indexation of pensions. These problems have been in existence for a long time. I believe it was made clear that the government could have operated in another way, but that was not the point of this legislation.

The government claims it brings in this legislation under its six-and-five program. There again, no evidence was adduced to prove that it had anything to do with it, because the program aims especially at the freezing of wages, and pensions in the private sector, for instance, are not affected. The Canada Pension Plan is not affected. Why they picked on the public service in this particular instance is far from being clear.

The Leader of the Government said the other day that they are going to save $60 million this year and a little over $100 million next year, but the problem of reducing government expenditures is something entirely different from the question of the six-and-five. You can save money but the objective of the six-and-five program is to have less money available for consumers in general and to reduce expectations.

The minister was not able to convince me—I do not think he convinced many people in attendance—that they were not breaking an agreement with the public service pensioners or even with the public service employees by doing that. The minister's argument was that there is no mention in the collective agreement of pension benefits. The fact that there is nothing in the collective agreement does not mean there is not another agreement regarding pensions. It is obvious that when the associations or the syndicates negotiate the question of wages they take into consideration the benefits provided public service employees and pensioners by way of this pension system. It is clear to me, and as mentioned by Senator Phillips, that they are picking on a group—the pensioners themselves—who have no way of negotiating.

• (1510)

Of course, the inequities the report underlines are quite obvious. For those pensioners who are receiving a small pension under this system and probably very little otherwise, taking only a few dollars from them could mean a lot of hardship.

It is quite clear that the bill is not related to the six-and-five program. It is not aimed at correcting the deficiencies of the system and picks on a group unable to defend itself.

There was no consultation with any representative of this group before the legislation was introduced; the government did not accede to any of the requests made. Therefore, by voting for the motion for a six months' hoist we would be giving the government an opportunity to review the situation, to correct the inequities which the report mentions, if that is possible, or even to come to an agreement with the group affected by this legislation. Questions of equality and legality are involved here. We should deal with the bill by way of the six months' hoist.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I made my feelings known to the Senate when I abstained from the vote on second reading.

As a member of the committee, I listened carefully to the representations made by various groups. I must take exception to the points raised by the Leader of the Opposition. In my humble opinion, only one point he has raised makes any sense.

As I said when I abstained from voting on the motion for second reading of the bill, I favour the six-and-five program. Contrary to the impression of the Leader of the Government, I was convinced, by listening to the minister, that, in fact, this bill is really part of that six-and-five program.

The reason it is part of that six-and-five program is because 90 per cent of the cost of indexation of the pensions is paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and, therefore, if government employees are asked to accept increases of 6 per cent and 5 per cent so that less money will be taken out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, then the same principle should apply to those receiving those monies in the form of pensions.

My concern with this bill, which I did not explain in detail when I abstained, is the fact that ever since my involvement in public life began I have had difficulty accepting the principle of percentages. While in and out of government I have been given all kinds of reasons for the percentage basis, but nothing has changed my mind—I still see no fairness in it.

For those who are receiving a pension of $50,000, an increase of 6 per cent—when the cost of living may have been 10 per cent—will cause no hardship. However, for the poor people—that is, those whom I have tried to help during my public life—who require food, shelter and clothing, the basic necessities of life, it may cause hardship. When a person is receiving $50,000 or $60,000 a year, an increase of 6 per cent means an extra $3,000. Even when the cost of living is increased by 10 per cent, we know that that 10 per cent is not composed only of food, clothing and shelter.

When I asked questions during the committee hearings of those from government and the pensioners' representatives, no one could tell us who, in fact, would be hurt by this 6 per cent.

Some people may receive only $3,000 pension as a result of time worked with the government, but they may have other pension income from private plans or from other sources of income. However, we know that some people will be hurt. I am thinking particularly of widows whose husbands worked in the public service when salaries were perhaps as low as $8,000 or $10,000 a year. When the spouse dies, the surviving spouse will receive only 50 per cent or 60 per cent of that pension income. Therefore, at age 65, that person may be receiving only $5,000 or $6,000 a year. We were told that those people may only number 10,000, but I believe it is the job of government, with all the computer facilities now available, to find out who those 10,000 people are. If they cannot do that, I say there is something wrong with the system.

I cannot accept the view of the Leader of the Opposition that this does not pertain to the six-and-five program. It is part of it, and it is only fair that some who receive substantial pensions should contribute in times of economic hardship, particularly when employees are asked to make a sacrifice to this cause.

I expressed the view in committee that I would hope that, whatever the government, when the economy of this country returns to a normal plateau—and I do not mean a booming economy—the government will deal with pensioners in the same way as it will deal with employees. Under law, employees do have bargaining power, but, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, the pensioners have none. I hope that, down the road, the pensioners will be treated in the same way as the employees who have the pressure of bargaining power. When this bill expires at the end of two years, I hope that, whatever government has to deal with the matter at that time, it will treat the pensioners in the same way as it will treat employees.

In my humble opinion, I do not think the six months' hoist makes any sense. It is not new, and it is not the last time we will be faced with it. I think this bill should pass, and it should be our job, as senators, when this legislation expires, to keep pressing the government to be fair to pensioners.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I wish to speak on the question of procedure and whether or not the subject matter of this bill should not have been referred to committee three or four weeks ago.

When I first arrived here, we constantly heard about the Christmas closure, a rush of bills at the last minute before the Christmas adjournment that we did not have time properly to consider before passing. It was some years before I realized that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was, in effect, the only committee, with very rare exceptions, which studied the subject matter of bills introduced in the House of Commons before they actually reached the Senate.

It is quite obvious to me that this so-called "Christmas closure"—and we have an example of it in this bill even if it is not now Christmas—could be gotten around by commencing our study of the subject matter of these bills six weeks or two months before the bills reach the Senate.

● (1520)

Here is an example of a committee recommending that the government should consider that action be taken. It is too late, for all practical purposes, to pass an amendment at this time. The cheques to pensioners must go out tonight. If this committee had been considering the subject matter of the bill four or five weeks ago and had come to the firm conclusion that these two things should have been done, it could then have negotiated with the minister and insisted upon receiving the kind of undertaking that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has received in the past—namely, that the act be amended within some reasonable time in the future in conformity with the committee's recommendations. The bill is not necessarily held up; the bill can be gone ahead with and the undertakings will have been obtained from the minister. Because the subject matter of this bill was not referred to committee a few weeks ago, much of the effectiveness of the Senate consideration is lost.

I merely point out to honourable senators that this is one of the matters I brought to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate in a letter about nine months ago, a copy of which went to the committee chairmen. It was considered at a meeting of committee chairmen and it was the consensus, I believe, that we should resort to the procedure of studying the subject matter of a bill much more often than we have in the past. This bill is a perfect example of why we should do so.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to make a brief observation on some of the things that happened in committee. A number of senators expressed concern about the limited benefits received by survivors at the present time. As has been said earlier, it appears that there are approximately 30,000 spouses who receive such benefits. I was disappointed in that the witnesses did not provide us with concrete examples, which would have enabled honourable senators to make judgments based on accurate information rather than on speculation. Senator Thériault speculated a moment ago, as did Senator Thompson last Wednesday in his intervention on this subject, that if the witnesses had come forward with some concrete examples which illustrated exactly why these pensions are so low, and if they could have referred us to two or three examples of cases indicating that these recipients had no income other than the benefit the spouses were receiving, perhaps we could have come to a more accurate conclusion. The only example given to us was that of one of the witnesses, a former army officer, who retired in 1976 at the age of 51 with a pension of a little more than $12,000. That pension was fully indexed and, according to him, now amounts to approximately $22,000.

One other point of concern to honourable senators was whether such people received other income from employment or other benefits from different sources. We asked this witness whether he had ever worked after retiring. He said that yes, he had, but that he and his wife had discussed the matter and had decided to relinquish full-time employment. He admitted that he works part-time now. Therefore, the members of the committee could not get a real handle on this extremely delicate and sensitive issue.

I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to another aspect of the matter, to which the Leader of the Opposition made reference a moment ago when he suggested that the government applied this restriction only to pensioners. He said that the 6-and-5 program was designed as a salary restraint program. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition overlooked the fact that this measure is also applied to family allowances. Further, with respect to pensions, it is only applied to that portion of the pensions which has to do with indexation, to which the government contributes a substantial amount of money through the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Senator Flynn: Compensation is provided, however, for those pensioners who are below the poverty line or the annual guaranteed income.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, there were two other matters the Leader of the Opposition raised which I feel deserve comment: first, that the Canada Pension Plan is fully indexed, but the CPP is a fully contributory plan.

Senator Flynn: So is this.

Senator Bosa: No, it is not.

Senator Flynn: After 1970 pensioners have contributed to it.

Senator Bosa: It is a contributory plan to that extent, but the indexation part of it is not fully funded. The government has to make up the deficiency. The restraint is applied only to that portion which the government contributes to the fund.

Secondly, the Leader of the Opposition made reference to the fact that the government zeroed in on people who cannot defend themselves because they have retired.

Senator Flynn: That is what the Prime Minister said.

[Senator Bosa.]

Senator Bosa: It ought to be mentioned, however, that the indexation plan went into effect on January 1, 1974, but the indexation provision is applied to all of those pensioners who were receiving a pension prior to 1974. Therefore, it can be seen that the government has dealt with the retired public service community in the same way as it deals with the current government employees. I simply wanted to clarify that point.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I suppose we can consider whether we should separate these two questions. The suggestion has been made that the motion for the six months' hoist, which has been ruled to be in order, be considered one of the questions to be put.

Senator Roblin: Can we not put that question now?

Senator Frith: Yes, we could. I am content to have it voted on now, and then to proceed. It is also open to us to continue with debate and, when we have exhausted debate on all questions, including any other amendments which may come along, to put all of the questions at once.

Senator Flynn: As you wish.

Senator Roblin: I would just like to offer the suggestion that there may be some advantage to proceeding in the regular way; that is, if no one else wishes to speak on the six months' hoist, that we put that question and dispose of it now. There may be some honourable senators who would like to speak on the main motion. It is a little less confusing if they have the opportunity to do so in some clear way. This way is also closer to our rules, which establish that we ought to have one subject at a time before us for debate. Unless there is some strong reason against it, I suggest that we put the question on the amendment and dispose of that.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, these are the options open to us now, and we are content to proceed with either.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that this bill be read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Muir:

> That the Bill C-133, intituled: "An Act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (No. 2)", be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day six months hence.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

● (1540)

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment lost.

Is there any honourable senator who wishes to speak on the main motion?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I regret that I cannot promise the Senate to add anything new to the debate which has taken place this afternoon, but perhaps I can purge my own feelings by speaking briefly on this particular topic.

It seems to me that the Senate has failed in an important responsibility that was presented to it to rectify what is a patent injustice in the legislation before us.

The report of the committee was comforting to me, because while its members were prepared to report the bill without amendment, not something I would have readily agreed to, they did propose two clear recommendations which undoubtedly would have gone a long way towards removing unfairness in this legislation.

When you are reducing people's expectations, it is hard to satisfy everybody, there is no doubt about that. When you are reducing people's expectations with some shadow of economic justification, it becomes even more difficult; but when those expectations do affect people who deserve our concern, then we have a responsibility to do more than we have done in the present circumstances.

The first recommendation calls for the elimination of the long term effects on the real pension levels. I believe that is a valid recommendation, and I would support it. However, I am particularly struck by the second recommendation, which suggests that there should be a threshold taking into account those pensioners whose total income is below the poverty line.

How we can have failed to make our point more effectively in respect of this matter is something that distresses me. Someone has said that there are 30,000 of these pensioners, and I suppose most of them are women. They are probably survivors. Anyone who has studied the question of the position of women in the economic life of this country knows that widows of pensioners, and women generally who have reached the pensionable age, comprise perhaps the largest group who deserve some consideration and attention in this country as being the people who are having the worst of the economic situation. We were told there are 30,000 people falling into that category, but we are not really sure of that figure. One of the members of the committee who spoke today complained that further evidence was not adduced by those who appeared before the committee. I really do not think that that is a reasonable expectation. How can one expect these thousands of women, who have no real access or means of appearing before the committee, to appear before the committee to present their cases? Is it reasonable to expect them to have done so? I am not even sure that the pensioners' association was in a position to present the case of those whose pension resulted in a total income below the poverty line.

However, there are people who could have given us that information, had we asked for it. Of that I feel certain. Those are people representing the government. The minister appeared before the committee, as did officials from his department. Surely they should have been questioned on what the situation really is, and could have exposed to the committee the real impact of this measure on those whose total income is below the poverty line. I am sure they could have given us a reasonable estimate of how many there are, and some idea of what the total impact of this measure is going to be on those people.

Senator Thériault: They could not.

Senator Roblin: Surely it is not beyond the wit of man to find out, somehow, what the impact of this measure is. That the Senate committee was unable to do so within the time limit it had imposed upon it is something I regret. It may be excused, but nevertheless I regret it.

Something more than that was adverted to by Senator Godfrey. I want to say how much I agree with the point he made—that is, that we now regard ourselves as an advisory body; that we do not really feel that we have the political legitimacy or the moral authority to dig our heels in and insist on amendments to bills. I, for one, regret that. I understand it, but I regret it, and that is one reason I advocate reform of the Senate. We should dig our heels in when we come to a matter of this kind.

However, we have developed something a little better than a piece of good advice which no one will pay attention to. We have developed a technique—and Senator Godfrey spoke of it—whereby a committee, wishing to make a recommendation for a change to a bill but feeling it has not the political legitimacy to insist on a formal amendment, could have the opportunity of presenting the matter to the minister concerned to obtain from him a statement of government opinion and, hopefully, some assurance that the matter would formally or informally be taken care of after the bill had been passed.

I must say that in some instances—perhaps not as many as I would like—that system has had effective results. Ministers have given undertakings to committees which have raised points of the kind adverted to in this committee report. They have been dealt with in committee, the minister has considered them and, in some cases, has been able to give an undertaking that the matters would be considered, the views of senators would receive due weight and something would be done to relieve the inequity or disadvantage that the committee had discovered.

That was not done on this occasion. I do not know why it was not done, but it seems to me that, of all the useful initiatives the Senate could have taken, that is surely one.

We do not feel we have the moral authority to throw a bill out; we do not feel we have the moral authority to amend a bill. None of those things do we feel strong enough to do. However, we have developed a system of asking a minister kindly to take our concerns into account and to do something to effectively remove the inequality, the injustice or inequity we have perceived.

For whom could we have spoken more eloquently than for these people whose total income is below the poverty line? Do we know what that means? Well, Senator Croll knows what that means because he has been working on that for the better part of a lifetime, and has the courage of his convictions. There is no question about that, and I am sure other honourable senators know what that means. Why, then, have we done so little to bring this matter to a form in which our protest, our advice, our counsel could have been given due weight by the government? I do not know why, because in other instances that has been done by other Senate committees.

I was much distressed to hear the Leader of the Government say that he had no information on this and that he was not in a position to give us the policy on it. It really does not surprise me, but I do not know why the minister who appeared before the committee, whose bill this is, would not have been in a position to deal with this matter in some way that would give satisfaction.

I think this clause is unjust. You can make the strongest arguments you like about the six-and-five program. One of the authors of the six-and-five program has graced us with his presence this afternoon, and I really wonder if he cares to defend it with respect to this particular group of pensioners whose total income is below the poverty line.

One could be the strongest advocate in the country of the six-and-five program, but I do not think that one would like to say one is if it is going to apply to this particular group of pensioners whose pensions are below the poverty line. It should not apply to them on any basis of equity, justice or reasonable application of burden in the country.

It is beyond us now. We have missed our opportunity, and I regret that. The bill will be passed, and I only hope that, regardless of what may have appeared to be the unresponsive nature of the government's approach to this problem presented in the committee or in the Senate this afternoon, at some time in the future the Leader of the Government will be able to rise and tell us that the matter has been considered and regulations will be passed to take care of it.

I am quite prepared to give my honourable friend full credit for a largeness of view and a generosity of heart if the government is willing to undertake to give us some satisfaction on this point. If they do that, they can have all the credit in the world they like, but when it comes to pensioners whose total income is below the poverty line, with so many of them being women struggling to make a living, I think that is the least we can expect the government to do.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication has been received:

RIDEAU HALL

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Julien Chouinard, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Missisquoi.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Saint-Michel.

An Act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (No. 2).

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT MOTION RESCINDED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I move the adjournment now, pursuant to the order of the Senate made earlier this afternoon, we stand adjourned until tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. Were there no such order, we would adjourn until 2 o'clock. The reason we were to adjourn until 8 o'clock in the evening was to permit several—I believe five—committees to meet tomorrow afternoon. We also wanted to give certain honourable senators an opportunity to speak to orders that have been standing in their names for some time.

It has been pointed out to me that for some honourable senators this arrangement causes unnecessary inconvenience, whether or not they are members of one of the committees involved, but they would want to stay because they would want to have their attendance noted during our sitting. In some cases that would cost them another 24 hours' time. If there is no real advantage in sitting at 8 p.m., perhaps it is a good idea to consider rescinding the order we made and to sit, instead, at 2 o'clock. If we sit at 2 p.m. we should keep in mind that we want to give our committees the opportunity to take most of the afternoon for their sittings, so we could adjourn by 2.30 or 3 o'clock.

The honourable senators most directly concerned are those who want to speak to orders standing in their names. I know that Senator Godfrey wishes to do so, and I am sorry he is not in attendance at the moment. I know of no other senator who is specifically planning to speak tomorrow evening.

I would welcome some help. If honourable senators present generally feel it would be better to sit briefly tomorrow, commencing at 2 o'clock, and then allow the committees to sit, and not have a Senate sitting tomorrow evening, I could be talked into it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): There is no objection on this side to giving the required consent for rescinding the order.

However, I will do so on one condition. I should like to be allowed to put a question to Senator Frith which is not related to the question of adjournment. I just want to know if the pension cheques have been mailed today.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice and shall report back at 2 o'clock or 8 o'clock tomorrow, depending on what we decide.

Honourable senators, if the order is rescinded, we should make sure that we make time available on another occasion for Senator Godfrey or any other senator who may have wanted to speak tomorrow evening.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I think that the chairmen and members of committees which are sitting tomorrow would be a little displaced. They might take the opportunity to attempt an evening committee meeting tomorrow to see how that works.

Senator Frith: We hope, of course, that the displacement will not be substantial. Senator Lafond quite rightly takes into account that possibility and, I think, has made an excellent suggestion for adjustment to it.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I just want to point out that this would necessarily cancel the meeting of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration which is scheduled to meet at 11.15 on Thursday morning. However, as I understand it, there is nothing of pressing importance coming before the committee, and the committee meeting could be postponed until the same time next week.

Hon. Joan Neiman: I would just point out to the deputy leader that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has a meeting scheduled for tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock. I do not think we would encounter any problem as far as the Senate sitting is concerned provided that we have a quorum here tomorrow afternoon.

However, that creates a difficulty. I believe that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture is sitting from 2 o'clock until 6 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, and I do not know whether that would, again, require some special dispensation or whether it would affect that committee sitting.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to speak with any authority on the Agriculture Committee since I am only a member. However, it is correct that there is a sitting scheduled for tomorrow between 2 o'clock and 6 o'clock and that there are five groups of witnesses lined up. If the Senate decides to sit at 2 o'clock, arrangements will have to be made to permit that committee to proceed regardless.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on the point raised by Senator Roblin, I do not think there is any difficulty because that committee has the authority to sit while the Senate is sitting.

Of course, the deputy leader always finds himself in the "meat-in-the-sandwich" role between committee chairmen and senators wishing more time in the chamber. Subject to these comments, do I take it that committee chairmen feel they can accommodate this new arrangement?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I ask for unanimous consent to rescind the order made earlier providing for adjournment until 8 o'clock tomorrow evening. If that is granted, I shall then be able to move the adjournment until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the order be rescinded?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as a footnote to that motion, it will be recalled that yesterday Senator Roblin asked us to be sure that the committee had permission to meet today while the Senate is sitting. It was my thinking that we had given that permission, but I was wrong. The committee was given permission to meet on Wednesday, but not today. No one is perfect.

PARLIAMENT

ROYAL ASSENT CEREMONY

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the situation is not getting any better; none of the ministers is doing us the honour of being here today. The Leader of the Government could very well have told us yesterday that we would be deprived of his august presence! Unfortunately, we had prepared a whole series of questions for him.

As far as I am concerned, the only one I might put to the Deputy Leader has to do with the experience we had last night with respect to the Royal Assent ceremony when the Speaker of the House of Commons came to the Senate accompanied by only seven members from the other place.

Fifteen years ago, in June 1967, I had suggested that perhaps we might consider the possibility of changing the procedure for the Royal Assent ceremony and follow our current procedure only in exceptional circumstances such as, for instance, important legislation likely to bring a few people into the gallery and a fair number of members from the other place. This could be replaced by a ceremony held either at Rideau Hall or even in the Chambers of the Speaker of the Senate with only one representative of the government, or of the House of Commons, and one representative of the Senate.

Concerning the experience we had last night and which we have been witnessing for years, I was wondering whether the Government Deputy Leader might not consider in consultation with the Leader and the Speaker of the House of Commons the possibility of taking action on that suggestion, namely to reserve the solemn ceremony of Royal Assent for solemn and exceptional circumstances rather than waste the time of members of the House of Commons who find this little walk to the Senate quite boring. Besides, in many instances when we want to adjourn on a Thursday, some of us are forced to stay here simply to keep up appearances.

Perhaps the Deputy Leader, who is very understanding and very progressive, will want to take action on this suggestion and consider this possibility. I know that the first time I made that suggestion in 1967 I got very unfavourable reactions from some senators who were genuine traditionalists in those days, but I know that they are no longer with us; even Senator Denis is very progressive and I am convinced that he will agree with my suggestion.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Almost!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition and I have talked about that from time to time. The suggestion he has made deserves serious consideration and I will certainly do just that.

[English]

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition has indicated in his very interesting remarks that Madam Speaker was accompanied by seven members of the House of Commons in answer to the summons from the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General. Can he tell me how many of them were ministers of the Crown, who have the responsibility of presenting legislation to Parliament?

Senator Flynn: I did not see one.

Senator McIlraith: That, too, is my impression.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, this is a very interesting point. In this regard, I remember reading the Crossman diaries. Richard Crossman was the Leader of the House of Commons at Westminster during the Labour government back in the 1960s. Royal Assent in the United Kingdom consists of what Senator Flynn has described. One or two cabinet ministers go to see the Queen and a Privy Council meeting is held at which the Queen gives Royal Assent. I recall that on one occasion Mr. Crossman was supposed to go to Balmoral for Royal Assent, which he found inconvenient because there was a Labour Party meeting at the same time.

In any event, our system does not make sense. Generally, we do not even have the Governor General appear in the chamber for Royal Assent. If it is important enough for the Governor General to appear personally in the Senate chamber, then we should have Royal Assent in the chamber in his presence. If we are going to have the Governor General represented by a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, then I think it should be done in the fashion suggested, that is, in the way it is done in the United Kingdom.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I have also read the Crossman diaries and ever since then I have been proposing the same measure as the Leader of the Opposition is proposing. There is no reason why the same procedure should not be used for Royal Assent on routine matters as is used when the Address is presented to His Excellency the Governor General following the Speech from the Throne, thus avoiding difficulties faced not only in this chamber but also in the other chamber. I think that we in this chamber can be proud of our attendance at Royal Assent yesterday because we outnumbered the other chamber by six to one.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I appreciate those comments on the subject. As I said, I will undertake to pursue the matter. I would be glad to receive any other information or views for or against the proposition. It is clearly a non-partisan issue and perhaps we could consult our colleagues in our respective parties to determine whether there is general support for this point of view. That could lead to a meeting with the two Speakers.

CROWSNEST RATES—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have gathered together a substantial amount of material on the Crow rate. I am sure honourable senators have also received a good deal of material on that subject which they can study. I will be glad to try to share with honourable senators any material I have relating to any specific, appropriate question. On the other hand, without wishing to apologize in any way for the fact that I am making a limited offer, I suppose the subject, while it merits some study, will not change between now and next Tuesday.

We may decide to discuss it or have some sort of pre-study of the proposition before we receive any legislation. I put that not as a formal suggestion but as a reason why none of us may feel ready to delve deeply into the Crow announcement until we have studied it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I suppose that is my cue to rise on this issue. I do not know how on earth we can discuss the matter until we know what the government policy is. I have nothing. No statements have been given to me with respect to government policy. I do not even know whether the statement has been made. Until it has been made and until it is presented here, I find myself at a loss to be able to make any intelligent comment on it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am surprised and disappointed that the information I referred to has not been generally received by honourable senators. I had hoped that all honourable senators, and certainly Senator Roblin who has displayed real interest in this subject, would have received some material on their desks. I am sorry that that is not so. It was on that assumption that I made my remarks. I will try to see that that does not happen again.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend. I must say that it is quite impossible to deal with the matter in the present circumstances, although, if I may express a personal opinion, I think it would have been a little more candid of his seat-mate, the leader of the house, to say he would not be here today if he knew last night that that would be the case.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Could the Deputy Leader of the Government enlighten us with respect to when the minister is supposed to make his announcement? My understanding is that the minister, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, is in Winnipeg today to make his announcement pertaining to the Crow. In fact, I felt rather badly that I was not invited.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that the announcement has already been made.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Where?

Senator Frith: In Winnipeg.

Senator Roblin: I should like to ask my honourable friend whether this represents a new policy. Having been a member of a parliamentary body for some years, it is my impression that when such a body is sitting the government announces its policy in Parliament. That does not prevent ministers making announcements elsewhere, whenever they wish, but surely it is a matter of parliamentary courtesy, to say nothing of tradition, that government policy be announced in Parliament when Parliament is sitting. Is there some new policy now that we are to read these announcements in the newspapers?

Senator Frith: I will try to find out, honourable senators. I am rather caught out by the fact that I thought all honourable senators had received some information this morning.

Senator Flynn: Maybe Senator Davey knows something about it. In matters of communication he is usually the first to know, because he is the first to suggest.

Senator Frith: At any rate, honourable senators, considering the fact that I assumed honourable senators had information and the fact that they do not, I think it quite appropriate for Senator Roblin to ask that question, and I will try to find the answer.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Well, honourable senators, isn't this just another example of the sort of questions I have been raising for the last couple of years about breakdowns in distribution? Senator Frith has his copy; I don't. How many others have their copies? How many others do not? Surely they must all go out at the same time from Distribution. They must all be delivered to the post office at the same time. Certainly, there are sufficient messengers in Parliament that this kind of information can be delivered at the right time. It is all very well to say you will look into the matter, but these breakdowns are happening far too often to be comfortable.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, I can only say that I almost hope that the problem is simply a breakdown in distribution, because that should be easily corrected.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CLOSING OF SHOE COVE SATELLITE RECEIVING STATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government concerning the closing of the Shoe Cove satellite receiving station in Newfoundland. I suppose I would be unfair if I did not say I expected an answer in due course.

● (1415)

A decision has been taken in this matter notwithstanding the importance of that facility. The voluminous report on search and rescue indicated the importance of instantaneous weather information and ice conditions data to safe operation in the offshore.

Bearing in mind the number of incidents that have taken place over the past years, one wonders why the government is not improving things instead of worsening them. The government has proposed to eliminate one of the most vital satellite stations existing in Canada. That is the only contact with Churchill, Manitoba, and is the first station relaying weather and ice conditions to fishermen and others.

Notwithstanding that answers were received in the other place, I wonder if the deputy leader would impress on the minister responsible for this decision the importance of that station. The country is in trouble as it is, so the savings will not help in that respect. I want a satisfactory answer as to why the station is being closed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot undertake to give an answer satisfactory to everyone, including even Senator Marshall. I take it from Senator Marshall's remarks that information on this has already been given in the other place, but Senator Marshall does not find that information acceptable. If I understand him, he is asking me to obtain more information than that already given in answer to a question in the other place. Am I right?

Senator Marshall: Yes.

Senator Frith: I shall do that.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, on December 21, 1982, I asked the Leader of the Government a question relating to the Garrison Dam project. Senator Roblin supported my question. I felt that my words were rather strong towards the government.

Senator Robichaud also asked on that date if the Leader of the Government would ascertain whether the position of the International Joint Commission had changed since December 21, 1973, when he was joint chairman of that commission. Senator Robichaud's question was taken as notice, and an answer was given on January 26. However, I feel that my question has not been answered. Therefore, I shall ask it again.

Has the government made representations to the United States Senate regarding its approval of $4 million for the continuation of work on the project?

I am sure I need go no further than refer the deputy leader to my comments and those of Senator Roblin on December 21 last.

If nothing is done to bring this to the attention of the government, I feel that nothing will be done until another urgent matter is raised, possibly next month.

Would the deputy leader ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to make representations to the appropriate minister, not only so that our concerns may be made known to the United States Senate but also in an attempt to put a halt to this project?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall draw Senator Guay's comments to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He will see, when he reads them, that Senator Guay is asking him to make representations to the cabinet so that it, in turn, will make representations to the United States Senate.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

DISTRIBUTION OF PENSION CHEQUES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Flynn asked me if I knew what had happened to the cheques that should flow from the passage of Bill C-133, and I undertook to find out.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): They left this morning.

Senator Frith: No. I was told this morning that after Bill C-133, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (No. 2), received Royal Assent the pension cheques were delivered by the Department of Supply and Services to the Canada Post Corporation.

The Canada Post Corporation processed them immediately and took the necessary steps to distribute them across Canada. I understand that some pensioners in the Ottawa area have received their pension cheques in the mail today. Assurance has been given by Canada Post that every effort has been made to deliver as quickly as possible the cheques going to other parts of Canada. By 7.45 last evening, all the cheques had been delivered to Canada Post by the Department of Supply and Services.

Senator Flynn: Very efficient indeed!

Senator Frith: Canada Post took about two hours to process them, after which they were ready for distribution across Canada.

I agree with Senator Flynn that that is very impressive efficiency.

Senator Flynn: I imagine they were already printed.

Senator Frith: I would imagine so, although remembering the miracles that computers can produce, I think it may be that they were not printed but were set up for printing. I can only imagine; I do not know.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

KIRBY TASK FORCE REPORT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on January 26 Senator Marshall asked about the status of the Kirby task force report.

The report of the task force on the Atlantic fisheries is currently under consideration by cabinet. It is expected that the report will be released in the near future.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that all orders stand and that the inquiries also stand. Because of the objectives we discussed yesterday, I believe that Senator Godfrey will forgo speaking on his motion today. Am I correct that all the orders stand?

Hon. John M. Macdonald: That is correct.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should warn you that I will be speaking on my motion on Tuesday evening.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will remember that yesterday we decided to sit this afternoon at 2 o'clock, with the desire to adjourn early because we have an exceptionally large number of committees meeting this afternoon and we want to give them as much time as possible.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 8, 1983, at 8 p.m.

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-131, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Document entitled "Employment Impact of Selected Government Expenditures" dated October 1982, being a reply to Senator Asselin's question of January 25, 1983.

He said: Honourable senators, I have a document which Senator Asselin requested some time ago. Since it is rather lengthy, I suggest that it not be printed as an appendix to Hansard but that it be tabled at this time. It is a list concerning the government job creation programs.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I did not ask for it; you said you would table it.

Senator Olson: My understanding is that Senator Asselin requested this information. I am reluctant to have it printed as an appendix to Hansard because it is so long. However, I am willing to table it at this time if Senator Asselin so wishes.

Senator Asselin: It will be helpful when I make my next speech.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. Last week, the Minister of Transport, Mr. Pepin, made an important statement in Western Canada concerning grain transportation and it had loud repercussions throughout Eastern Canada and especially in Quebec. The farm organizations in Quebec strongly object to the introduction of such a program as set up by the Government and the Minister. The Quebec government and the official opposition as represented by its agricultural critic also object to the implementation of such a program.

Would the Minister tell us whether previous consultations were held with the provinces about that new program and under what circumstances? Also, if the Government must respond to the substantial criticisms raised by the Quebec farmers, in what way will it do so?

[English]

● (2010)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure whether there were the formal and direct consultations with the Government of Quebec to which my honourable friend has alluded. However, I am sure that there were sufficient consultations and that every provincial government was aware of the very long and detailed consultations respecting, first, the Gilson inquiry and, following that, a number of task force reports with respect to the overall policy. I am sure that those matters were well-known to the Government of Quebec and, indeed, that they made their views known with respect to them.

I would also add that the Minister of Transport has stated on a number of occasions that the policy statement is so large and complex, involving such a wide range of interests throughout the country, that, under the circumstances, he believes he has reached a compromise position which makes the whole thing workable and, indeed, takes into account the interests of all the people involved. Perhaps no one received 100 per cent of what they wanted in the policy, but most of those involved have, in fact, had their interests taken into account and some accommodation of those interests was included in the final policy.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: When this program and the report were made public, the minister's statement gave rise to a great many questions across the country, not only in eastern Canada but in western Canada as well, and we have seen how Mr. Pepin, the minister, was received by western farmers' representatives. He will get the same reception when he comes to Quebec.

In view of the fact that this decision has raised a general outcry and that farm organizations need to know more about it, would it not be in Canada's interest for the government, through its Minister of Agriculture, to call a federal-provincial conference in order to clear up potential problems and suggest a solution acceptable to all parties?

● (2015)

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, several meetings have been held involving a number of federal ministers, including the Minister of Agriculture, with interested parties in Quebec and elsewhere. I believe that the compromises to accommodate those interests have brought us to a solution which has, in fact, accommodated those interests to some extent.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Since at least 17 Liberal members from Quebec were against the implementation of this new program only last week, does it mean that they are now toeing the party line and supporting this policy and the Minister of Transport's program?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not quite sure that I understand the question.

[Senator Asselin.]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You would rather not understand it.

Senator Olson: If he is arguing that there were approximately 17 members who had a different view and who are now supporting the Minister of Transport, I would have to canvass the Quebec members to find out.

Senator Asselin: You already know that.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board? Have we heard the last word on this policy from the government, or is the government still open to representations and possible changes in the policy announced by his colleague, the Minister of Transport?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, the announcement made by the Minister of Transport is, of course, the policy of the government. It is intended to be a firm policy.

Senator Murray: Intended to be!

Senator Argue: Obviously, legislation will be introduced. It will go to a committee of the other place and, I presume, before that committee representations will be made. I presume the committee will give its customary consideration to those representations, and there may or may not be amendments to the bill as presented to that committee. I guess we will have to wait and see.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? I noticed that the minister did not refer to the Senate Agriculture Committee. Does he not think it would be a good idea if that committee studied the subject matter of the bill at the same time as the committee of the other place?

Senator Argue: I think the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture functions very well.

Senator Flynn: Especially when you were chairman.

Senator Asselin: Answer the question.

Senator Argue: I am sure that the Agriculture Committee is very competent to consider the proposition that has been put before us this evening, and it may well take that course.

Senator Asselin: Are you ready to recommend it?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I follow up on this interesting introduction of the problem of the Crow rate by asking a couple of questions? I do not intend to pass judgment on the government's policy as stated this evening because there will probably be another opportunity to do so.

In the scheme produced there are considerable variations from the recommendations made by Dr. Gilson who studied this on the government's behalf. I am anxious to know the basis upon which these changes were calculated because they are extremely important. For example, Dr. Gilson suggested that by 1992 farmers would be paying 3.3 times the current

Crow rate. In the recommendation Mr. Pepin made to the western agricultural community, it turns out that it will be 5.56 times. That is a considerable increase and, undoubtedly, there must be a good reason for it. Could the minister deal with that subject?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can briefly. Of course, all those calculations are based on certain assumptions. The assumption of the level of inflation, for example, is one of them. In the policy that was announced there will be no increase in the statutory rate for the balance of this crop year. There could be a maximum increase of 3 per cent, providing that that is not more than 50 per cent of the actual inflation in railway costs for the three years following this year. The government's six-and-five anti-inflation program, along with the rest of the economy, seems to be so successful that it may not reach that point. Therefore, those assumptions have to be taken into account.

After the current crop year, plus three further years, with the formula that I have just described, it is possible that the increase could go to 6 per cent, providing that there is again an increase of 6 per cent in railway costs which are attributed to inflation in the years beyond 1986 and 1987. All of those things must be taken into account, as is always the case, when projections are made. Therefore, the aggregate increase depends on the level of inflation for the years that I just described.

Senator Roblin: I am quite sure, honourable senators, that Dr. Gilson did take those factors into account, because he dealt with the question of the share of inflationary cost increases that the farmers would be asked to pick up. That is what the minister is talking about. Evidently the minister does not have all that much confidence in the 6 per cent, or he would have a lower figure in his own proposal. Dr. Gilson suggested that the farmers pick up 4.5 per cent after 1987. The government has increased that by one-third to 6 per cent. Why was that done, particularly in view of the minister's reference to the six-and-five situation?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can obtain an explanation as to why that particular amendment was made. That was not the only amendment that was made to Dr. Gilson's report. Indeed, Dr. Gilson did make another recommendation that was somewhat different from the so-called financial package that was offered when he went into his inquiry. For example, he recommended several hundred million dollars more. Indeed, the Minister of Finance committed the federal treasury to an additional $400 million, so there were some adjustments on both sides of the benefit insofar as the whole package is concerned. I think my friend will probably recognize that, with an additional amount of money, perhaps some of the other numbers could be changed too.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate what the minister is saying, but I would point out to him that the increase to 5.56 times that is estimated for 1992 is made after all these other grants and provisions that the government has been making have been taken into account. If those were left out and we were left with the gross figure, it would not be five times; it would be ten times. I think that is the way the farmer would be inclined to look at it, because these other advantages, while they may be real enough, are not reflected in any direct way. Therefore, I warn my friend that there may be a little problem with that.

I am not trying to tell him, however, that Dr. Gilson is right or that he is right. I am simply trying to get him to tell us why the changes were made and what the rationale for the difference is. I appreciate that that information may not be available tonight, so I leave the matter and ask the minister to report when he feels he can.

Honourable senators, there is another point on which I would like to have some explanation. The proposal of the government places a lid of 31.1 million tonnes on the amount of export grain that will qualify for the revised Crow consideration. After the 31.1 million tonnes has been reached, as I understand it, the full economic cost of moving the grain will then be charged and that will all be put into a blended price. That becomes an exceedingly important issue. Therefore, I think it would be interesting for the house to know the government's forecasts over the period to 1992 with respect to the increase in the exports of grain. I am quite sure that such figures have been compiled. I understand that they are estimates only, but it would be highly significant when trying to assess the impact of these changes with respect to the farmers themselves.

Can the minister undertake to give us the estimated metric tonnages to be exported between now and 1992?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it would also be well to include in this exchange that the 31.1 million tonnes is some 4 or 5 million tonnes higher than the figure for the highest export year that we have ever had. Therefore, there is still a significant amount of room—four million or five million tonnes over the best year that we have had in terms of the total tonnage hauled to export position. Of course, all of that does, in fact, become part of the new statutory rate.

• (2025)

If the honourable senator wants projections of the potential amounts that could be shipped after we reach 31 million tonnes, more or less, within the time frame, then perhaps the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board has that information with him. He is certainly in a better position to obtain it than I am. I would ask him, therefore, to answer this evening if he has this excellent information ready.

Senator Roblin: If he has it available, I shall congratulate him. I will not hold it against him if he wishes to reflect upon the question.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That used to be called a lateral pass.

Senator Roblin: I recommend it; it is a good ploy.

The volume of exports, as the minister has been fond of telling us, has been increasing much more rapidly than anyone would have anticipated three or four years ago—from 20 million tonnes to something like 25 million or 26 million tonnes at the moment. If this keeps up, I think we will hit our 31.1 million tonnes much sooner than might otherwise have been thought several years ago. I shall wait for my answer.

Now that I have been directed to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, perhaps there is one matter he could look into. Both he and I have a very deep and profound association and interest in the port of Churchill in the province of Manitoba. I notice from the government's policy statement issued the other day that they appear to be reducing, by about one-third, the amount of money earmarked for rail line improvements. I was going to ask the government what effect that will have on branch lines in western Canada and which towns will be affected by it, but I will reserve that question for the future.

However, there was nothing in the statement that I saw that mentioned the future of the port of Churchill and what fate the government may have in store for it. I am afraid that Churchill has been hung out to dry, twisting in the breeze, because its sole lifeline to any sort of economic justification has been the export of wheat.

The line to Churchill will not take hopper cars, and boxcars will be museum pieces before long. There will be nothing but hopper cars left, and it is unlikely that those will be sent to Churchill without a full load for very long.

I want the minister to tell us whether the government is prepared to make any statement about the future of that line to Churchill. Will it be brought up to standard so it can take the hopper cars that are going to be in universal use for the transportation of grain. Can the minister shed any light on this problem?

The town of Churchill has certainly fallen upon hard times recently, and, if the movement of grain through that port is to continue on existing lines, the future does not appear very bright. I would ask the minister if he can shed a ray of light and, perhaps, a ray of hope on this problem.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the level of use of Churchill in the year that has just concluded was higher than in the previous year. It may not be fully satisfactory to everyone, but it is a very major improvement, and it was a fairly good year.

As far as I know, no decision has been made in this policy that would in any way suggest a diminution of the role of the port of Churchill. If my memory serves me correctly, a study has been undertaken to determine what may be necessary to bring that line up to standard, or to a standard that could handle the hopper cars.

Of course, as the honourable senator well knows, one of the main difficulties is the permafrost, and what may be necessary modifications in technology or techniques to handle the permafrost and to construct a line that, in fact, is solid enough to take the hopper cars. But I shall be very happy to look at whether any part of this policy would in any way detract from the future continued use of the port of Churchill, and see if I can bring the honourable senator some information. As far as I know, and I believe I am correct, no decision at all has been contamplated that would in any way tend to diminish the use of Churchill.

Senator Roblin: I would like to point out to my honourable friend that no decision is a decision. If there is no decision to do anything about the future of Churchill, then I think we can see that its future is limited. It will wither on the vine. There has to be a positive decision.

At the present time I am not advocating one way or the other what the decision should be, because I have reason to believe it is not an easy problem, but what is required is a decision. If the decision is to rebuild that line, it is going to make a lot of people happy. If the decision is to do nothing, and let it go the way it is, a lot of people will have to conclude that that cannot be helpful to the future of Churchill.

Therefore, I say to the minister that there is no policy decision in the statement, as I read it. I think that is a policy decision in itself, and I want to know more if he can give it to me.

Senator Argue: I do not think it is a policy decision to downgrade Churchill, so we disagree on that point. The question of handling the permafrost is an inquiry that has gone on, and I believe the indications are that a positive conclusion will be reached. However, the decision on Churchill is one that has to be taken on the merits of that situation rather than one based on the current announcement relative to the Gilson report.

I, for one, believe that the port of Churchill serves a very useful function. I believe it is of value to Canada. To keep that northern port open is important for many reasons, one of which would be our external affairs policy, namely, to make use of and occupy all of the various parts of this great territory.

As I say, I shall look into the particular question that the honourable senator has asked. If I can help with a reply, I shall certainly do so.

Senator Roblin: What the minister has said is reminiscent of what he said on the same subject a year ago. Nothing has happened since then. What I am asking is that he use his undoubted influence in policy-making circles to get us a reasonably prompt answer. If he can do nothing else the next time we meet, perhaps he will tell us when he thinks a policy decision might be made.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. I honestly believe it is not only a matter of keeping the port of Churchill open, but also a matter of making better use of this port. I am not too concerned with permafrost because I was told early in the spring last year that the heavy cars are too much for the rail system, but that we could use the box cars. In that case I am wondering why we could not double up, as far as freight trains are concerned, using the old cars rather than the new cars. In that way we could still probably bring into Churchill a fantastic amount over and above what we have brought in in the past. We could probably do that while we are waiting for the outcome of the study just referred to. In this way western Canadians—particularly those in Manitoba and Saskatchewan—would benefit from the extra loadings that would take place in Churchill.

Senator Argue: Well, the ordinary box cars are certainly suitable for that line. They are being phased out over the years, but there are many of them in the system and they will be around for a long time to come. They are, therefore, certainly available for the continued use of Churchill.

• (2035)

The Wheat Board itself is supportive of Churchill. It is the only organization doing business there. If it were not for the Government of Canada and the Canadian Wheat Board Churchill would die very quickly, because so far the provincial governments have not been able to give the kind of asssistance and support in using Churchill that would help that port. Over the years there has been talk of using the port for shipping potash, coal and other products, but, although there are possibilities for so using that port, other governments need to become involved and to support Churchill, not leaving it exclusively to the federal government to do so.

As I have indicated, the main element in the use of Churchill as a port is the Canadian Wheat Board; but another major element is the customers of the Canadian Wheat Board. Obviously, they must be prepared to take grain out of that port in substantial quantities or it cannot continue to function. There are customers who like Churchill and are prepared to use the port, but their number is limited.

As a great supporter of Churchill, Senator Guay will agree, I think, that the port of Churchill is well worth maintaining, and I can assure him that there will be many of us helping to maintain it.

Senator Guay: I thank the minister for his answer. If I may ask him a supplementary, can he tell me whether there has been any discussion between the federal government and provincial governments with respect to the importation of goods through the port of Churchill? For instance, at one time certain of the western provinces used to import, through Churchill, liquor from Scotland; in fact, it came in in great quantities. Has the federal government discussed with the provincial governments, then, the possible use of Churchill as a port of entry for imported liquor and other imported goods during the summer months?

Senator Argue: There has been contact from time to time between my office and the provincial governments. Every time there is a meeting of the Hudson's Bay Route Association the representatives of the various governments are present. Certainly, in the past we have had discussions about the use of the port of Churchill. I understand that you are correct in saying that a few years ago a quantity of liquor was imported through Churchill. However, for whatever reason, that particular trade through Churchill was discontinued. I am not aware what the situation is there now in that respect. However, we have had discussions with provincial governments and I would take it from Senator Guay's question that he thinks those discussions should be continued, and I agree with him.

Senator Roblin: I am not sure that I should intervene, but I should like to tell my honourable friend that in connection with the movement of liquor through the port of Churchill, at least in respect of supplies to the Province of Manitoba, it was slightly uneconomic.

That is the problem in respect of most movements through Churchill, except for grain. Grain is the only commodity I am aware of that has an economic advantage if the port of Churchill is used. Other commodities, whether coming or going, do not satisfy that criterion, unless you happen to live in a restricted tributary area.

Senator Argue: I can certainly understand the economics involved. I was not assigning any blame for what has happened in respect of other commodities. I was simply saying that Churchill is an economic port in relation to the price received by the Canadian Wheat Board for grain. At least, that has certainly been the pattern over the years. I suppose that if one added up all the costs of maintaining the lines it might not be economic when compared to some other ports, but solely with regard to the price of grain through Churchill it is economic and usually obtains a premium over Thunder Bay.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—SALES TO EASTERN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, because the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board is so forthcoming and enlightening this evening—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What do you mean "this evening"? He is always enlightening!

Senator Haidasz: Yes, he has been enlightening on previous occasions as well. This evening, however, I should like to ask the minister whether the Canadian Wheat Board has made any grain sales to any eastern European countries so far this year. If so, what were the terms and what were the government guarantees?

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Cash on the barrel!

• (2040)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable Senators, there have been a number of sales made to eastern European countries, the most recent being the sale of 1 million tonnes almost exclusively of feed grains to East Germany. There was a credit guarantee provided in that arrangement. All of the guarantees for credit by the Canadian government are at commercial rates of interest and carry no subsidy whatsoever. I believe that is a policy all senators would support. Our competitors, such as the United States, do not follow exclusively a policy of having interest charges at commercial rates of interest. They have a so-called blended credit program with a major subsidy element.

I am sure the honourable senator is particularly interested in Poland. There have been sales made to that country. I believe I have the details among the information on my desk. I know there have been a couple of sales made recently, but affecting very small quantities of grain and on cash terms.

Senator Haidasz: Can the minister tell us whether any grain sale agreement has been made between the Canadian Wheat Board and the Government of Poland since December 31, 1982? As Poland's wheat sale agreement with Canada has already expired, and since Poland is now experiencing a shortage of grain, can the minister tell us whether any progress has been made in a wheat or grain sale to Poland?

Senator Argue: The short answer is no, that no agreement has been reached. Discussions have been held and consideration has been given to what our policy should be. As the honourable senator well knows, there are outstanding large amounts of credit due from Poland to Canada. Poland owes other nations considerable sums, and I believe there have been discussions among the various creditors regarding the outstanding credit. The Canadian policy, in a definitive sense, has not yet been determined, and when that happens undoubtedly an announcement will be made.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUEBEC—CONSTRUCTION OF F-18A AIRCRAFT—ALLOTMENT OF CONTRACTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Asselin on January 26, 1983, concerning the payment of compensation to the Province of Quebec for losses incurred as a result of the implementation of the CF-18 program. I wish to say at the outset that I do not agree with the way that sentence is structured. However, I have a reply.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Then why do you reply?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You may not agree with the question—

Senator Olson: It is a rather lengthy answer.

Senator Asselin: Then read it.

Senator Olson: The issue of the distribution of the economic benefits flowing from the CF-18 program has been of concern to the government for some time. When the CF-18 contract was negotiated, the proportion of the Canadian aviation industry located in the province of Quebec was approximately 48 per cent; and it is this figure that our projections were based upon in terms of the economic spin-offs from the total program to be allocated to Quebec.

As to the question of the payment of compensation for perceived shortfalls in the province of Quebec, may I reiterate what the Minister of National Defence said in the other place on January 24, 1983, in response to a question on this matter from the Honourable Roch La Salle:

Senator Asselin: He is a good member.

Senator Olson: Well, that is a little commercial that I do not believe belongs in the answer to the question. The Minister of National Defence said:

> I do not think the CF-18 battle is lost. I think we can still win the war, that is, ensure that Quebec gets the percentage that reflects its position in Canada's aviation industry, and that is exactly what we intend to do.

It is important to remember that the CF-18 program is a long-term program, running until 1995. While it is true that Quebec is lagging behind at the present time in terms of its share of economic benefits, the Minister of National Defence remains confident that over the period of the program we will achieve our target of $1.5 billion in economic spin-offs for Quebec. The challenge is now squarely before the Quebec aviation industry. They must take up the challenge and actively pursue activity associated with the CF-18 program.

[Later:]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: I would like clarification of the answer the Leader of the Government has given to Senator Asselin's question on the allotment of contracts for the construction of the F-18A.

If I understood the answer correctly, 48 per cent of the contracts for the construction of the F-18A is still to be maintained by the Government of Canada as far as Quebec is concerned. Do I understand correctly that the figure of 48 per cent is still to be maintained?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps it would be better if Senator Tremblay read the answer tomorrow. As a matter of fact, I could send him a copy this evening, but I will repeat what the Minister of National Defence said:

> I do not think the CF-18 battle is lost. I think we can still win the war, that is, ensure that Quebec gets the percentage that reflects its position in Canada's aviation industry, and that is exactly what we intend to do.

Senator Asselin: Your Quebec caucus does not agree with you.

Senator Tremblay: The same minister has evaluated that proportion of Quebec's industrial participation in the realization of the F-18A project as a whole as being 48 per cent of all contracts involved in the project.

I want to know if what the Leader of the Government has read means that the 48 per cent figure is to be maintained. I would like to have clarification on that. If it is not maintained—

Senator Asselin: It is not.

Senator Tremblay: —then what is the definition of proper participation?

Senator Olson: The answer is very explicit. What the honourable senator is asking me to do is put that reply into different words. I do not think I can improve on the words already contained in the reply, which is a direct quotation from the Minister of National Defence.

He goes on to say:

> The challenge is now squarely before the Quebec aviation industry. They must take up the challenge and actively pursue activity associated with the CF-18 program.

The answer to the question is clearly stated. I do not think I would add anything to it if I were to put it in different words.

Senator Tremblay: I have a supplementary question to complete this exchange.

The same minister defined—and I do not know if it was a year and a half ago or two years ago—the normal participation of Quebec industry as representing 48 per cent of all contracts in Canada. If I heard correctly, that 48 per cent was mentioned at the beginning of the reply to the question, but perhaps I am wrong. In any event, I thought I heard mention of the 48 per cent.

• (2050)

What is the new definition of that normal, decent, correct participation by Quebec's industry? We have an open-ended definition now: it might be 25 per cent; it might be 10 per cent; it might be 30 per cent. At one time it was defined in strict terms as being 48 per cent. I want to know what the next definition will be.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there has been no change in the definition, and there has been no change in the numbers; however, there are three things that go together. The reply I gave this evening states, in part:

> the proportion of the Canadian aviation industry located in the Province of Quebec was approximately 48 per cent;

The reply further states:

> I think we can still win the war, that is, ensure that Quebec gets the percentage that reflects its position in Canada's aviation industry—

That is clear.

The reply goes on to state—and I have to repeat this for the third time so that Senator Tremblay will understand the reply—that the industry in all parts of the country will have to take up the challenge and actively pursue activity with respect to the CF-18 program.

Senator Tremblay: So it is no longer 48 per cent.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Guay on February 1, 1983, concerning Canadian representations to the United States Senate about the Garrison diversion project. The reply is relatively long. I am prepared to read it or to have it incorporated in Hansard as if it had been read.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I would agree with that, but would the minister indicate this evening whether or not there is representation from the cabinet in this particular regard?

Senator Olson: If I have to answer questions, I might as well read the reply since it is not that long.

Honourable senators, I have made representations on behalf of Senator Guay to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the question of the Garrison diversion project.

He has informed me that no formal representations have been made to either the United States Senate or to the United States Administration since the tabling of the Reagan budget proposals which call for $22 million to be appropriated in the 1984 fiscal year for construction of the Garrison project even though the proposal will contain a stipulation that no moneys will be spent on features affecting waters flowing into Canada.

This funding proposal will have to be passed by Congress. Given last year's initial defeat of a $4 million appropriation, it is quite possible that Congress will reduce drastically or eliminate the appropriation for Garrison this year.

Canadian authorities are naturally concerned and are now reviewing their Garrison strategy for 1983 with the Province of Manitoba. The technique of sending an all-party delegation to the U.S. Senate was used with some effect last year and will certainly be considered again. The U.S. Administration and Congress are well aware of the long-standing Canadian position on Garrison, and we expect them to fully respect their commitment not to construct any feature of Garrison which would adversely affect waters flowing into Canada.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I appreciate the answer given; yet, at the same time, I must say that I am rather disappointed, because I have felt right along, since December of last year, that some representation would have been made and therefore that $22 million probably would not have been approved by the United States Senate. The Americans keep saying that irrespective of any amount of money they are spending—whether it is the $4 million they spent in the fall or the $22 million they have approved, and previously they spent a considerable amount of money—there will be no water flowing into Canada or that will affect Canada.

I feel that that is a misconception and a misunderstanding, because it is just like building the dam, building the whole thing, and eventually the gate will open and we will have it in full force. The money they are spending would have no meaning whatever, unless one can look at the overall plan, the expenditure of $192 million, knowing that eventually that water will come into Canada.

Since I have been in the Senate, an amount of money has been spent annually to build the Garrison, and particularly this year, in 1982-83, almost $30 million will be spent, yet they say to us that no water will affect Canada. I would like to suggest that possibly no water will affect Canada now but the overall plan will, and that is what the people of Manitoba and Saskatchewan are concerned with, notwithstanding the fact that Senator Robichaud mentioned that he was Chairman of the International Joint Commission in connection with the commitment by both governments.

Therefore, I believe it should be given some consideration and that there should be some understanding before any further money is spent by the United States whereby we know it will affect Canada. It is time that representations at cabinet level should be made to the American government and the American Senate to emphasize our concern—not only the concern of those of us who are in Ottawa but also of those of us who are from Manitoba and Saskatchewan—knowing the effect it will have in years to come.

● (2100)

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: I am not sure if the Leader of the Government is going to answer Senator Guay's question.

Senator Olson: I am going to. Senator Guay has expressed his opinion concerning the answer. I listened extremely carefully but did not detect another question.

Senator Guay: I can put a supplementary question. Will the Leader of the Government make representations to the cabinet on our behalf requesting the Government of Canada to make representations once again—and soon—to the American government outlining our concern regarding the continuation of money being spent on the Garrison dam project on the United States side which will eventually harm Canada's fresh water supply?

Senator Olson: I will relay those representations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DISABILITY PENSIONS, WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE, CIVILIAN WAR ALLOWANCE—RECIPIENTS—BREAKDOWN BY PROVINCE

Question No. 90 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

To the end of October, 1982, what is the breakdown by province of the numbers of recipients of disability pensions, war veterans and civilian war allowances including those numbers published in the last Annual Report of the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Reply by the Minister of Veterans Affairs:

	At March 31, 1982*		At October 31, 1982
	WVA	CWA	CPC
Newfoundland	2,322	2,988	1,809
Prince Edward Island	1,408	34	1,824
Nova Scotia	8,300	516	9,595
New Brunswick	6,321	77	6,169
Quebec	11,069	197	15,916
Ontario	29,751	245	46,647
Manitoba	4,378	10	9,803
Saskatchewan	3,626	9	5,562
Alberta	5,256	24	10,318
British Columbia	12,875	215	22,430
Outside Canada	1,154	29	6,309
TOTAL	86,460	4,344	136,382

* A comparable breakdown of War Veterans Allowance and Civilian War Allowance is not available for October 31, 1982. During the transition to a computerized delivery system for these allowances, accurate totals by province are available only at the end of the fiscal year.

 CPC includes disability pensions, survivors' pensions and compassionate pensions.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved the second reading of Bill C-131, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-131 is a measure to amend the Old Age Security Act. The bill is part of the government's six-and-five restraint program, a program that I suggest to honourable senators has been extremely successful.

Governor Bouey appeared before the National Finance Committee in December and told us that at that time the inflation rate in Canada had fallen below 10 per cent, and indeed, taken on a basis comparable to the method used in the United States, was probably closer to 8.5 per cent.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Don't start that again!

Senator Everett: This does not equal the reduced rate of inflation achieved by the United States, but there is no question that the policies of restraint initiated by this government have been successful.

Senator Flynn: Especially with 1.5 million unemployed.

Senator Everett: There are unemployed in the country; that is one of the unhappy consequences.

Senator Flynn: That is the main reason.

Senator Everett: The fact of the matter is that the policy of restraint followed by this government has been successful in reducing the rate of inflation in Canada.

Senator Flynn: If everybody stopped working, you would also reduce the rate of inflation.

Senator Everett: There are many people working. Indeed, the effect of government policy will be non-inflationary growth and one in which most people will be working.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No such luck!

Senator Everett: In any event, it was necessary, to bring under control the incomes of those not governed by the market place. That is what necessitated the six-and-five restraint program. One should remember with respect to that program that if it is successful, and it appears that it will be, the restraint will not be costly to those who are restrained.

Honourable senators will forgive me if I review for a moment the Old Age Security Act so that we can understand the effect of the amendments. There are three elements to the act: old age security; the guaranteed income supplement; and the spouse's allowance.

Old age security is the basic part of the Old Age Security Act. A person is eligible for it at the age of 65. The basic pension was set at $100 per month in 1973 and has been escalated since 1968. In 1972 the pension was fully indexed to the consumer price index. In 1973 the index was changed again from being computed annually to being computed quarterly. Honourable senators will be aware that in October 1982 the old age security payment was $246.92 per month.

The second part of the Old Age Security Act is the guaranteed income supplement. The guaranteed income supplement is payable if a person's income or a couple's income falls below a particular floor. According to the release of the Department of National Health and Welfare in January 1983 that floor is $6,075 in annual income for a single person, $9,360 combined income for married persons, and for a married couple with one spouse not on pension the combined income can be $15,160. In October 1982 the guaranteed income supplement for a married couple was $191.42 per month each, and for a single person, which would include a person whose spouse was not a pensioner, it was $247.98 per month. Since 1973 the guaranteed income supplement has been indexed quarterly to the full increase in the consumer price index. It is interesting to note that 53 per cent of all pensioners receive a partial or full supplement under the guaranteed income supplement.

The third element of the Old Age Security Act is the spouse's allowance. To be eligible for this allowance one must be between 60 and 64, and married and living with a pensioner under the old age security plan. The amount payable is equal to the sum of the old age security payment and the guaranteed income supplement payable to a married couple. In October 1982 the spouse's allowance amounted to $438.04 per month. I might mention that due to recent amendments that allowance is now payable, after a spouse's death, to age 65 or until the survivor remarries.

Honourable senators, I would like to deal briefly with the effect of the amendments in the bill that is before you. The old age security payment will be limited to an increase of 6 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984. That increase will be applied for the first year at a rate of 1.5 per cent per quarter to the December 1982 payment and for the second year at the rate of 1.25 per cent per quarter to the December 1983 payment. It will affect the 47 per cent of the pensioners who have income that is above the floors that I have just mentioned.

The estimate of the effect of it is as follows: In December 1982 a pensioner under the Old Age Security Act receiving the old age security pension would have received $246.92. In the fourth quarter of 1983 the capped amount will be $261.47. If that amount had not been capped and had been fully indexed, as it was prior to this act, the amount would have been $264.66, a difference of roughly less than $3 per month.

As far as the 53 per cent of pensioners who are on the guaranteed income supplement are concerned, the government has articulated a principle. They state that no guaranteed income supplement recipient will suffer a decrease in benefits under this act. As a result, the guaranteed income supplement is, first, fully indexed to the consumer price index and, in addition to that, an additional amount of indexing is applied to offset the loss due to the cap on the old age security. So it should be plain to honourable senators that those 53 per cent of pensioners who receive the guaranteed income supplement will be as fully indexed for what they receive as they would have been had this act not been passed.

I might mention that there is also a special provision in this act for couples only one of whom is on the old age security pension. That couple, one of whom is on the pension and the other of whom is not, can receive an additional income equal to the amount of the old age security and still receive the guaranteed income supplement. The effect of capping of the old age security would, of course, be to apply the cap to that income allowance, thereby lowering the amount of additional income that that couple could receive and still receive the guaranteed income supplement. For that purpose, and that purpose alone, the old age security amount is not capped.

Honourable senators will be aware that it was hoped by the government that this act would take effect before the January payment. Of course, January went by and the payment came due before the act was passed. What the government has decided to do is make the payment as though there was full indexation for the month of January. Then in February, with the act passed, the amount will be the amount that would have been in effect for the first quarter. The government will not recover the additional payment that was made in January. I can illustrate this for honourable senators by pointing out that in December 1982 the old age security payment was $246.92. In January 1983, which comes under full indexation with the additional cost being met by the government, the payment will rise to $251.12, but in February 1983 the capped amount will take effect and the pension will drop to $250.62.

Honourable senators, I believe this is a sound bill. I think it will have a positive effect on inflation in this country. What is interesting is that the legislation does the least amount of damage to those who receive the guaranteed income supplement. The 47 per cent of those pensioners who receive only the old age security are those who, by definition, are receiving incomes greater than the floors that I mentioned. I remind honourable senators that those floors are: $6,075 for a single person; $9,360 for a married couple where both are on pension; and $15,160 for those who are married with one spouse not on pension. The other 53 per cent who are drawing the guaranteed income supplement are not affected by this bill. Their pensions and supplements are fully indexed. One should remember that if inflation is brought below the six-and-five—there is every indication that this will happen in Canada—then even those who are on old age security will not be affected.

• (2110)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, would my honourable friend tell us, if he can, the amount of money the government expects to save in 1983 as a result of the implementation of this legislation.

Senator Everett: It will take me a few minutes to find that figure. If I could have the opportunity to look for it while the debate continues, I will intervene when I find it.

The government is not as concerned about the amount of money it saves as much as it wishes to create an additional condition of restraint in its attempt to overcome inflation.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Everett. It seems to me that we are talking about people who, in many cases, have very low incomes. If we are saying that we can take away a small portion of the income of someone who is earning less than $7,000 a year, and then saying that the money to be saved is not that important but we hope the rate of inflation is coming down—as seems to be indicated—then I am afraid I fail to see the point of this legislation. It seems to me that we are taking a small amount of money away from people who have the lowest incomes in the country, the only purpose of which is to make the point that we have a six-and-five environment, and then saying they will not be affected all that much because the rate of inflation is coming down.

I seem to be making a comment in the process of asking my question, but could Senator Everett enlighten me as to the actual purpose of taking money away from the poorest people in the country?

Senator Everett: The government was endeavouring, as one of its main policies, to bring down the rate of inflation in Canada. Part of the method of achieving that was to have a tight money policy which had its effect on the rate of inflation. As far as market wages are concerned, many of them have dropped below six-and-five. Many companies in Canada are granting no increases. The government was faced with the fact that there are a number of people working in Canada who are not subject to market pressures. These employees could demand increases. If they were successful, they could create a two-tiered rate of increase in pay in the country. This is something the government could not afford to ignore if, indeed, it wanted to successfully fight inflation. Therefore, it developed the concept of the six-and-five to bring under control those wages and salaries over which it had control.

Then you are faced with the problem of which groups should be controlled. If the government makes an exception for one group, then another group will say that they ought to be excused from the restraint, and before you know it your restraint program has failed. That has been the history of restraint programs. There have been exceptions, and every time the exceptions are acceded to there are more exceptions, and, finally, the program breaks down altogether.

[Senator Everett.]

The problem the government faces with the restraint program is that it has to apply it to everyone and, politically, that is very difficult to do. I am sure the government does not like applying the six-and-five restraint to some people, but if it wants to lick inflation it has to do that.

What it has done to the 47 per cent of pensioners who are drawing old age security pensions, and who have incomes above the floors that I mentioned, is not to lower their incomes but to restrain increases in their pensions to 6 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984.

Senator Stollery asked why the government holds as hostage the lowest paid people. Of course, they have not done that. The 53 per cent of the people who are drawing the guaranteed income supplement have the lowest incomes. I tried to make it clear that they are not affected at all. As far as they are concerned it is as though this act were not passed. I think the government has been eminently fair in trying to deal with the lower income people in the application of this measure while not allowing the restraint program to be chipped away bit by bit.

I was as ready as anybody in this chamber to criticize the government, but when I read the bill and the accompanying material, I came to the conclusion that it was good policy and, more importantly, equitable.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Stollery: I have a supplementary question. I fully understand the question of the supplement. I believe it was originally conceived in 1965 to assist people who would not qualify for the Canada Pension Plan. It was found that some people were so poor that they could not do away with the supplement. It was supposed to go down as people got their CPP, and the reason we continued with the supplement was because people were so poor that we could not take away the supplement, even though it was meant to be taken away when it was first instituted.

My point may not have been well made, but I am thinking of someone, an old age pensioner in 1983, who started working in 1928, went through the great depression, earned a very small income, or had no income, from approximately 1930 until 1947, lived in very difficult circumstances, who stopped working in the 1960s or early 1970s, and whose meagre savings were then eroded by the great inflation of the 1970s. The savings of such people were eroded more than the savings of anyone else because they had no way of increasing them. Here we are, in 1983, saying to those people, who had the most difficult time of any generation in this century, that, for reasons that are almost tantamount to penalties, they must suffer. We are talking about people who are, for the most part, earning a small income—just enough to not get the supplement. We are saying that it is this famous business of equity: everyone has to suffer, so they have to suffer. They did not have a means by which to make a living from 1930 to 1947. Then, when they did have a few years in the work force and had accumulated some money, the value of that money was eroded in the great inflation of the 1970s. We are saying to those who have never had much of a defence that we want to make them suffer as much as everyone else suffers. Frankly, honourable senators, I find that unacceptable.

Senator Everett: I am not sure whether the honourable senator was asking a question or whether he was making a speech, but I want to mention just one thing; that is, I think the honourable senator has missed the point. He has made a ringing speech about the position in society of some people. I think we could have a discussion about that and he might very well find me on his side. I doubt if I would take a different attitude. It seems to me, however, that what the government has done has been to protect, as far as it is able, the very people the honourable senator is concerned about.

With respect to those who are drawing the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement—which he states is not very much, and I do not think I would disagree with him—the government is saying that, for those people, the act does not apply. It seems to me that that is the important point. Perhaps he and I can agree that the amount that is being paid to them is too low. I am sure that if we got Senator Croll involved in the debate he would agree, as would many other senators. The government, however, has taken those people who are very low on the totem pole—that is, the 53 per cent who are drawing the guaranteed income supplement—and has said that the act does not apply to them; that they are fully indexed.

Honourable senators, I should like to answer Senator Roblin's question about the saving to the government in this program. The estimated after-tax savings, as a result of limiting indexation of the basic pension, amount to $49 million over the next two years.

Senator Roblin: Thank you.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, may I ask of Senator Everett a question of fact? As many pensioners did, I received a cheque in January. From what I read in the pamphlet which was sent out at the same time, in January the cheque was computed on the existing system, which means that we are supposed to have received full indexation in January. Is that right? I ask the question because the numbers mentioned in the pamphlet and the numbers on the cheque do not correspond to that assumption. Am I right in assuming that the January cheque was computed or established on the basis of full indexation?

Senator Everett: Yes, honourable senators, that is correct. The January cheque was paid on the basis of full indexation, but the February and March cheques will return to the capped amount that would have existed in January, February and March had the act been passed prior to the end of January.

Senator Tremblay: May I ask Senator Everett, then, to make sure that my reading of the pamphlet was correct and that on the January cheque we were supposed to have received full indexation? If I am right, the difference between the December cheque and the January cheque was only around $4 on the basis of an amount of approximately $250. I believe that indexation was at the rate of something like 9 or 10 per cent. I did not understand the numbers which were mentioned in the pamphlet. May I ask Senator Everett to make sure that the January cheque was in fact established on the basis of full indexation?

Senator Everett: My understanding, honourable senators, is that the December cheque was in the amount of $246.92, and the January cheque $251.12.

Senator Tremblay: How, then, do you reconcile that with full indexation at 10 per cent?

Senator Everett: Does the honourable senator want me to find out how that was calculated?

Senator Tremblay: The difference between the two cheques is $5.

Senator Everett: That is correct, yes, it is just under $5.

Senator Tremblay: Ten per cent of $246 would be $24.60.

Senator Everett: Yes, but we must then take one-twelfth of that, Senator Tremblay.

Senator Tremblay: That is the explanation, just one-twelfth of that?

Senator Everett: I cannot give the honourable senator the exact formula on which it was calculated. I could get it for him, but I would think that, if he is using a rough calculation of 10 per cent, then 8.333 per cent would have to be applied to that amount.

Senator Tremblay: My concern is for the people who will receive that pamphlet.

Senator Everett: Perhaps I could just change that, senator. It is actually calculated every quarter, and the rate remains the same for the three months of that quarter. Therefore, if one starts at $246 and the rate of 10 per cent is applied to the December payment, the one would take 2.5 per cent of $246. Two per cent would be $4.80. I would think one would come out pretty close to the difference between $246.92 and $251.12, if the rate used was 10 per cent. I do not know what rate was applied; that is what I would have to find out.

Senator Tremblay: I thank Senator Everett for that answer. I asked the question because I have heard the same question asked by people who care about a few dollars. We do not care, I suppose, but for many of those people who received their pension cheques even a few dollars are important.

I will not, at this time, discuss the question raised by Senator Stollery. I do not think that the pamphlet is well presented. I think it needs some explanation; it is worth looking at, just so that those people understand what is going on.

Senator Everett: Your point is well taken, senator, and I will pass it on to those responsible in the government.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I apologize to Senator Everett because I was out of the chamber and did not hear all of his explanation. I appreciated, however, his explanation with respect to the threshold. Am I correct in thinking that, if pensioners are receiving from private income $500 a month, they then receive this $250, or whatever it is, of the pension, to bring it up to approximately $750, and that they are the ones who will be affected by the capping? Is that the level of the threshold?

• (2130)

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I am not quite sure I understood Senator Thompson's question, but I will try to answer what I understood it to be.

The old age security pension in December was $246.92. Therefore, if both spouses were receiving that pension, they would be receiving a little less than $500 per month. Were their combined income less than $9,360 in the year, they would start to draw the guaranteed income supplement which would tend to raise that income towards that threshold. The threshold would consist of $9,360 plus $6,000, which would be roughly $15,360 for a married couple. For a single person the amount is $6,075 plus pension.

In the case of a married couple where one is on pension and one is not, and the one who is not on pension is not receiving a spouse's allowance, the threshold is $15,160.

Hon. Jack Marshall: The honourable senator mentioned a situation where one spouse is over 65 and the other is under 65. Let us say the man is over 65 and receiving the old age pension; his wife may be 60 and also entitled to the pension.

However, if during the period that this bill will be in effect, the gentleman over 65 receiving a pension dies and leaves a wife aged, say, 55 or below 60, she is not entitled to continue to collect that pension. Will the government look after that widow who will have to resort to welfare or some other means of income? The government is leaving out those people.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I am not terribly conversant with that point, but while I was reading the material I came to the conclusion that that has been a matter of concern to the government. I suppose it is a matter which would come up in the course of the review. All I can say is that Senator Marshall raises a good point, and I will pass it along.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I would refer to an article in yesterday's Toronto Star by Robert Jackson. The author appears to be erroneous in this particular statement. He suggests:

> The pensioners who will be worst off will be those who have just over $500 a month of private income and are not eligible for the GIS supplement. They will have a monthly total income of about $750. The implication of the capping legislation is that this paltry sum is enough to live on. And yet, it will clearly border on the poverty line.

Is the honourable senator telling me that the threshold would be $14,600?

Senator Everett: Perhaps it would be useful if I read into the record the brochure issued by Health and Welfare Canada entitled: "January 1983 Increases in Old Age Security Benefits and Spouse's Allowance." In part, it states:

> If you are not now receiving a supplement, you may be eligible for a full or partial payment:
> if you are single, separated, widowed or divorced and your yearly income apart from the Old Age pension is less than $6075.00;
> if you are married, and you and your spouse are both receiving the pension, and your combined yearly income apart from the Old Age pension is less the $9360.00;
> if you are married, and your spouse is not a pensioner and is not eligible for a Spouse's Allowance, and your combined yearly income apart from the Old Age pension is less that $15,160.00.
> If you are married and your husband or wife is between 60 and 65 years of age, you may be eligible for a supplement and your husband or wife for a Spouse's Allowance if your combined yearly income is less that $13,395.00 and your spouse can meet the residence requirements.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

KIRBY TASK FORCE REPORT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Would the leader tell me what the current status of the Kirby Task Force report is, or, more importantly, the current status of the recommendations of the Kirby task force report? There have been bits and pieces of it leaked over the past few months, and the public has no way of knowing the accuracy of those leaks. Some suggestions have been made regarding the nationalization of the east coast fishing industry, which is quite frightening to many people, and nothing has been done to allay those fears.

There is also the ongoing and major problem of unemployment. Fish plants have been closing down on a fairly regular basis in isolated areas of Newfoundland. That, in effect, means that entire sections of the province close down. I mention Ramea as an example. When the fish plant closed down there, everything stopped.

So, I wonder if the leader could tell us what the status of those recommendations is, when they will be revealed to the public, and when some action will be taken on them.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the current status of the Kirby Task Force report is that it is under consideration by the ministers directly involved, as well as other members of the cabinet.

• (1410)

I would like to be more specific as to when the report will be released. I answered a question some time ago to the effect that ordinarily the government is asked immediately a report is released as to which recommendations they accept, or reject, or modify. Certainly, that is expected with this report as well.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You have not made up your mind.

Senator Olson: There are a number of very important considerations respecting not only the Kirby task force's recommendations with respect to the east coast fisheries but also other representations that have been made by people who are vitally concerned with that matter. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would want the government to consider very carefully the ramifications that are involved for various interests that do not completely coincide with other interests. In any event, I shall try to obtain more precise information as to when the report will be made public. That answers the first question.

Hon. Lowell Murray: It is leaking all over the place already.

Senator Olson: Well, that is leaking.

The other question concerns whether the government has determined a policy, along with the necessary funding, to respond to some of the very severe conditions within that industry.

Insofar as the leaking, or the alleged leaking, is concerned, some of it may be leaks and some of it may be speculation on what may or may not be in the report.

Senator Murray: The staff is giving interviews about it, for heaven's sake!

Senator Olson: There is nothing new about that. It happens with all of them. I am sure that Senator Doody particularly would want the government to consider these recommendations from the task force and other people in a highly responsible way so that there will be a policy for the alleviation of those severe economic conditions as soon as possible.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I listened intently to what the minister was saying, but I am really no further ahead now than I was when I stood up a few moments ago to ask the question.

The fact that the government is concerned about the east coast fishing industry is certainly great solace to those people who are directly affected. I am sure that the people in Ramea Island, Burin and all the other towns where plants have closed down, resulting in people being out of work with their boats tied up or pulled up, would be very gratified, indeed, to know that the Government of Canada is interested in and concerned about their plight. That really adds nothing to or subtracts anything from the situation there.

What we would like to know is whether the Kirby task force report is an acceptable document. Is the Government of Canada so concerned with its contents that it cannot release it to the public? Is it prepared to continue letting out this series of dribs and drabs, some of which may be speculation, some of which may be based on some facts, and some of which, obviously, is based on nightmares, such as the nationalization of the industry on the east coast—one great crown corporation looking after all the plants?

[Senator Olson.]

Honourable senators, the problem is that nobody really knows what is going on down there. Apparently, the Government of Canada is still in the same position, although that report has been in its hands for many months. Is there some plan to do something soon—either to renounce the report, to accept the report, to accept parts of it or, at least, reveal the contents of the report to the people who are directly concerned? The government's interest is noted, but the people who are directly involved in making a livelihood from the fishing industry really should be considered in this context. I ask the minister to please release the report.

Senator Olson: I will take notice of that representation, but I think it should be pointed out at this time that the government was aware more than a year ago of the severe economic difficulties—whatever the cause may have been—within the whole structure of the Atlantic fisheries, and that they have taken some action along the way to find a policy and a plan that is acceptable to a wide range of people within that industry, as I explained a minute ago. Indeed, there was some very positive action taken for the fishing season that began on January 1, 1982. My honourable friend will recall that, along with the funding necessary at that time.

• (1415)

I am quite sure my honourable friend would not want the government to make a decision regarding a long term policy, bearing in mind the importance of that, without having a plan that has a reasonably high level of acceptability among the people.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Release it, then. You will have the benefit of public opinion. You do not know what to do with it.

Senator Doody: The honourable minister tells us, quite properly, that the fishing industry on the east coast has been in serious trouble for several years and that the government has been aware of that.

Months ago the government appointed a commission to look into the matter, and the commission has reported back. Presumably, some of the contents of that commission's report are printable and publishable, even if they are not to the taste of the administration.

Is it not within the realm of reasonable expectations that the general public involved, and who have been involved for several years, as the minister himself says, should have the right to look at the contents of that report; or is it so abysmal that the government dare not put it forward?

Senator Olson: It certainly is doing so, but I do not want to repeat what I said some weeks ago when I was asked about it two or three days after the report was received by the government, nor do I want to repeat what I said about two weeks ago.

It still remains a fact that the government is expected to respond to that set of recommendations along with other recommendations. I am sure my honourable friend will be one of the first to ask, "Where is the government's green paper or white paper with respect to that?" We want to be in a position to respond positively.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I will try to approach this matter from another angle because, obviously, we are getting nowhere from this one.

If the minister is so concerned about the interests of those involved in the fishing industry on the east coast of Canada, has he taken steps, as yet, to consult with them on the contents of the Kirby report and the recommendations of either the Kirby report or the other parties involved who were mentioned by the minister a few moments ago?

Has the Government of Canada consulted with the governments of the four Atlantic provinces to date? If not, does it intend to do so before it implements its action plan? Has the Government of Canada consulted with the fishing industry along the same lines, or does it intend to do so? Has the Government of Canada consulted with the unions involved, or does it intend to do so?

Will the report be published and issued? Will the recommendations be announced or acted upon in isolation from the interested parties I have just mentioned?

Senator Olson: Senator Doody knows as well as I do that every one of the entities he mentioned was consulted in depth during the Kirby inquiry.

Senator Doody: I think the consultation the minister refers to was during the course of the preparation of the report and not in the course of the implementation of the recommendations. Is the minister now telling us that the consultation process is finished as far as the Government of Canada and the east coast interests are concerned relative to the fishing industry?

Will the governments of the four Atlantic provinces be consulted before recommendations are acted upon or before the action plan is put forward, or has the Government of Canada decided, in its wisdom, to formulate its own action plan and put it forward irrespective of the opinions of the four Atlantic governments?

Senator Olson: No. This government acts in a highly responsible way. The facts are that the consultative process in an industry as important and complex as the Atlantic fishing industry will go on. Even after a policy is announced, sometimes consultations continue during the implementation of that policy. That is the stance this government has always taken.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I hate to impose on the time of the chamber, but this is a matter of vital concern to a great many people in the eastern part of Canada and to the country as a whole.

What the minister is telling us now is that the governments involved, the industry and the unions will be consulted before, during and after the action plan is put into place. The document will be released. By then, of course, the government will have formulated its plan. The minister tells us that that is why it has not been released to date—the government is busily rushing around trying to put together an action plan; and that may be commendable, although it is certainly taking one hell of a long while. Once that action plan is in place, the other interests will be consulted—after the fact, during the fact and before the fact. Really, however, that will not influence the decision of the Government of Canada in this respect. The input from these concerns is already there. It was put there when the Kirby hearings were on.

• (1420)

Senator Olson: In answer, I will say that all of the scenarios that Senator Doody has tried to outline are inaccurate.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am not surprised at that, because I am acting in total isolation on this matter. I am fishing—if you will excuse the expression—trying to get some information on the deal. I was granted an interview by the CBC in St. John's on several occasions. They showed me parts of the report and asked questions of me on other parts of it. I was not in any position, however, to comment on it because it had not been released. They told me that all I had to do was leave a brown envelope in any corridor in Ottawa, go back and check it out in the morning, and part of the report would be in it. I hesitate to do that because, as the honourable minister said, this is a responsible government which is very concerned about the interests of the people on the east coast.

I ask him, in the interests of freedom of information, but, more importantly, in the interests of the industry, livelihood and traditions of the people down there, for God's sake do something about the report—throw it out, discard it, publish it, act on it, but do something about it. Months are drifting by and the misery down there is getting worse all the time.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a repetition of what was said earlier, and I think that at that time I gave a responsible answer.

Senator Doody: If there are no supplementary questions in that regard, honourable senators—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Start fishing on the other side of the boat!

Senator Doody: —I will try an attack on some other area. The honourable minister who is now the Leader of the Government in the Senate was, only a few months ago, the economic czar of all of the economies. During that time, he took a tour of the east coast to consult with the various governments. They told him exactly what they thought the problems were on the east coast. The problems are worse, honourable senators; nothing has happened to change that.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—ALLEGED MISCALCULATION IN 1982 FORECAST

Hon. C. William Doody: On a different subject, the predicted unemployment statistics of the Government of Canada that were revealed on April 22, 1982, projected an unemployment rate of 9.2 per cent. This information was supplied by the then Minister of Finance, who has since been elevated to a more important and prestigious portfolio—one where, hopefully, his accuracy in predicting future events will not embroil us in foreign affairs to the same sad extent it did in financial affairs.

In any event, the estimate was way out. Unemployment averaged 11 per cent during 1982, a difference of 1.8 per cent, representing 200,000 Canadians. The minister may be tired of hearing us talk about the unemployment rates and asking what can be done to try to help these people, but I wonder whether he could tell us exactly what impact that 1.8 per cent error in calculation has had upon the revenue and expenditure figures of the Government of Canada. How far backwards have we gone in terms of our cash needs and our deficit position because of that one miscalculation in the projections of the Minister of Finance of the day?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not a miscalculation, on the basis of the economic indicators that were available at that time. What has happened, of course, is that there has been a deterioration in a number of factors that have led into those economic indicators since April.

If the honourable senator is serious about wanting to know the other figures in terms of revenue and other problems, I will try to obtain that information for him. I do not think, however, that it would be wise for him to assume that this government or any other government can make projections on indicators that exist at any given time. If those indicators change—and some of them change or are influenced by factors over which we have no control—then any responsible person also changes his predictions.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

PENSIONS—RECOMMENDATIONS OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE RE BILL C-133

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is now two weeks since the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science made its recommendations concerning Bill C-133, an act affecting supplementary retirement benefits. What action has the government taken in these past two weeks?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not believe any action has been taken. Furthermore, I do not believe that any action on those recommendations was promised at the time they were presented to this chamber.

● (1425)

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I do not believe the committee asked for a promise from the government; it made recommendations to the government, and I would point out that the second recommendation, dealing with the threshold, is becoming more important as the end of the month draws near. I ask the government if they place the same urgency on the mailing of the cheques this month as they did last month, and will they take action before the end of the month?

Senator Olson: The government remains committed to the hope that pension cheques of all kinds will be mailed on time, so that people who expect them on a certain day in the month will receive them on that date. That is just as valid now as it was when I indicated to this chamber that that was one of our motivations for having the bill passed in time.

With regard to bringing in another bill dealing with some of the recommendations that were made—and I can only repeat myself—there was no commitment that this was going to be done in February, March or at any particular time.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You do not take it seriously.

Senator Olson: Yes, we do take it seriously. Consultations and recommendations to the government are always taken very seriously.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government.

In connection with the threshold recommendation, when the minister appeared before the committee he took this issue very seriously. He said he would consult with his colleagues in the cabinet on it. It is for that reason that Senator Phillips and I are interested in knowing the outcome of the discussions the minister presumably had with the cabinet.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in reply to that question I simply have to say that I am not aware that any action has been taken since two or three weeks ago, or however long ago it was.

SPORT

LOTTERIES—STATUS OF DISPUTE BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): A very popular minister!

Senator Nurgitz: I wonder if the minister could tell us when he will release the Kirby report!

My serious question, honourable senators, for the moment, is as to whether the minister could make the Senate aware of the present status of the court dispute between the federal government—in essence, the minister's own department—and the Quebec provincial government, in connection with lotteries.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, I do not have anything further to report on the status of the issue referred to that is now before the courts. Indeed, I think it would be improper for me to make any comment on the subject of court action at this time.

I can say that we are hopeful that action will shortly be taken in the other place to pass the sports pool bill, and that we may expect it here in the Senate soon thereafter; but I have no further statement to make on the matter that is before the courts.

Senator Nurgitz: I certainly did not wish to embroil the minister in any impropriety, and I appreciate the delicacy of his reply. There was, however, a hearing in the province of Quebec and a judgment was rendered. Am I correct in assuming that the judgment was against the federal government; in other words, that it was in favour of the Province of Quebec?

Senator Perrault: I prefer to say that the judge presiding was not in favour of the federal position.

Senator Nurgitz: That is the answer I was seeking. Can the minister advise us about that? Has it been disclosed yet whether an appeal will be taken by the federal government?

Senator Perrault: That decision has not been taken as yet, honourable senators.

Senator Nurgitz: But I take it that it is being considered at present.

Senator Perrault: Several options are being considered, honourable senators. The fact remains, however, that there is a commitment to provide a certain level of funding for the Calgary Winter Olympics. That commitment will be kept, and impressive progress is being made with regard to making certain that that event proceeds on schedule.

The legal disagreement that the federal government has with the Province of Quebec with respect to this matter in no way affects the basic federal commitment to Calgary. I want to reiterate that.

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: While I am dealing with the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport, I should like to say that I noticed a very flattering article in the Ottawa Citizen, accompanied by a photograph of the minister wearing what appears to be a Superman sweater.

Hon. C. William Doody: The clothes don't make the man!

• (1430)

Senator Nurgitz: The Ottawa Citizen had an extensive interview with the minister, in the course of which he is quoted as having said—

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Jealousy will get you nowhere.

Senator Nurgitz: —that a good deal of federal government money had been invested in certain sports that should not have received the kind of attention they had, and that "there are certain areas where Canadians have a natural excellence"—I think those were his words—and that perhaps that is where we should be devoting more of our effort and, I suspect, our resources. Can the minister tell us which sports will receive the added support and which sports we have, in effect, been wasting our time on?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, that is a valid and good question.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Congratulations.

Senator Perrault: May I be frank and share with the Senate a challenge that we as Canadians face? May I say in a preliminary way that, happily, sport and fitness and associated matters transcend party differences—I say, happily.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Agreed.

Senator Perrault: In the last Winter Olympics at Lake Placid we finished in twelfth place just behind Liechtenstein. I believe there is a determination on the part of Canadians to improve considerably that performance not only at Sarajevo next year but certainly at the time of the Calgary Olympics.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: We are tentatively targeting Canada's position for the Calgary Winter Olympics at third place. We hope that we can achieve that placing. It will take the deployment of additional resources, not necessarily all from the taxpayers but as well from the private sector and other sources. I believe it would be intolerable to have Canada place twelfth or thirteenth in Calgary. There are many undeveloped competitive skills in this country which can and should be developed. Should resources permit, there should be more federally-designated training centres established. I do not believe they should all be in central Canada or western Canada or any single area. For example, designated training facilities for cross-country skiing could be established in Newfoundland or in Labrador, as well as in other areas of Canada. I believe there are opportunities to establish facilities of other types in many parts of the country.

We hope to have, in addition to our "normal" program over the next few months and years, a special program to improve our excellence in winter sports, where Canadians have been doing particularly well recently.

I wish to emphasize, however, that we do not anticipate any major cutbacks in the present level of funding for the sports now being supported in part by federal resources. It must be said, however, that in connection with a few sports, where we have invested a considerable amount of money over the years, we have not achieved significant success. There is one sport—I shall not name it because I know that the participants in it strive mightily to excel—where we are still in forty-second place in the world, despite all of the money we have spent on that particular sport, and one may well ask the question, "Are Canadians really suited to excel in this particular activity?" But there are certainly sports in which we have done extremely well. I met with the Canadian ski team last week in Sarajevo. There is a high level of morale and I anticipate that before the season is over we shall win many medals in that sport.

So the answer is, no, we are not going to have drastic cutbacks for any sport. Like any responsible government would do, we are reassessing the levels of funding now being directed to certain sports. In the forthcoming fiscal year, certain sports may be getting slightly more than last year and others slightly less. In part, the level of funding will depend on whether or not the sports in question are involved in world competition or in national or North American competition during the next few months; but I anticipate no Draconian slashbacks in funding for any sport. And we are determined to improve the standard of coaching in this country. In the ultimate, we want to ensure that people in every section of Canada have decent access to proper training and coaching. Youngsters, indeed, people of all ages, wherever they live in this country, deserve a fair opportunity to develop their athletic skills.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (1435)

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am almost sorry I asked.

An Hon. Senator: Aren't we all?

Senator Steuart: Why don't you leave well enough alone? We are thinking of having a leadership race at the next winter games.

Senator Flynn: Your turn is coming.

Senator Nurgitz: I should leave well enough alone.

I would still like an answer to the question I asked 20 minutes ago: What sports will receive the added attention? If the minister is reluctant to mention those sports which will receive less attention, perhaps he could tell us the sports that will receive added attention, and I will figure out the answer myself.

Senator Perrault: The answer is this: The differences, in my view, will be marginal. For example, last year certain sports received extra amounts because they were in certain additional competitions. That does not mean that these sports will receive exactly the same amounts of money in the forthcoming fiscal year, but the differences will be quite marginal and insignificant.

When I say that we are going to put greater emphasis on training Canadians to do well in winter events—not only in hockey, but in alpine skiing, luge and all the officially designated Olympic winter sports—that does not mean that money will come from the existing programs of sports funding. We are hoping to obtain additional amounts of money to enable us to give special emphasis to winter sports development. So winter sports, in preparation for the Olympics, may receive more emphasis over the next few months and, indeed, over the next four or five years, but that will not be at the sacrifice of the existing funding levels for the sports we now help.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think you finish with a bronze, Nate.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, will the minister outline to the chamber his philosophy on sports?

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on! You are asking for a speech.

Senator Thompson: To paraphrase the poet, is the minister's philosophy: It does not matter whether you won or lost, but how you played the game?

Senator Perrault: I will not go into my philosophy.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Why not?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: Senator Thompson's question brings to mind a question asked by him a few weeks ago about the state of boxing in this country. We have worked out the draft of a plan in conjunction with certain provincial advisers. It is now under discussion, and I hope to have an announcement very soon about at least one possible approach to improving the standards of ring safety in this country, to make sure that those people who participate in boxing endeavours in this nation do not place their life in danger when they climb between the ropes.

Senator Flynn: But you are talking about shadow boxing.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Everett for the second reading of Bill C-131, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act (No. 2).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, last evening when the sponsor of this bill spoke to his motion, he reminded me of a similar situation in which I often find myself in my practice. During the past 30 years I have had to lecture a good many children of two, three and four years of age on the fact that candy is bad for their teeth and for their general health. I do not think I have had a very high success rate in convincing them of that fact, nor do I think the Honourable Senator Everett had any more success last night in convincing the senior citizens of this country that this bill is a good measure on their behalf. I would suggest that the next time a task such as this arises, the honourable senator let one of the cabinet ministers sponsor the bill. After all, it would not interfere with the honourable senator's excellent reputation, and since nobody believes a member of this cabinet, they cannot destroy theirs.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It was to give the appearance of objectivity.

Senator Phillips: Senator Everett seems to feel that in implementing the six-and-five program there can be no measure with exemptions. However, the honourable senator conveniently overlooked the 11.2 per cent increase to the Bank of Canada retired employees; he overlooked certain exemptions to Air Canada, and, of course, the CBC was one of the first to be exempted from the six-and-five ruling.

• (1440)

Senator Everett last night brought forth a favourite theory of his that we should adopt the American method of calculating inflation. Honourable senators, I cannot get excited about that because I think of the method used to calculate the cost of a weekly basket of groceries. When the figure reached around $265, the government decided to lop off $250 and started in again at $15. It was nice to be able to say, "A basket of groceries only costs $80 now, instead of $265," but, honourable senators, it still took a very healthy slice out of the take-home pay of the average salary earner.

It does not really matter how you calculate it, Senator Everett, inflation still hurts. It not only hurts our seniors; it hurts our working people and it hurts our unemployed.

The calculations Senator Everett gave last evening were based on the rate of inflation for the last month. I really have no basic objection to that, but I should like the honourable senator to give us an undertaking, an assurance, that those figures will continue as they are or will even improve over the next two years. If he can give us that assurance, I will be happy to accept his calculations. If not, then in my remarks I shall use the figures given by the minister in the other place in November.

Honourable senators, this is the second part of the Trudeau trinity: the three pieces of legislation that were to attack the children, the retired public servants and the recipients of the old age security—all in the name of "six-and-five".

With respect to Bill C-133, the Senate displayed a rare bit of dissatisfaction. A rare event, it was nonetheless pleasing to see. Since that time, however, the whip and the deputy government leader have been busy. I doubt that we will see the same amount of dissatisfaction openly expressed on this occasion.

Last evening Senator Stollery voiced his concern with the legislation, and it was not very long afterwards that I noticed the government leader over at the senator's desk sitting with him and explaining the facts of life to the honourable senator. I noticed the honourable senator here earlier, but apparently he has now left. I presume he will be here when the vote is taken.

Senator Flynn: I think the Honourable Senator Stollery has just returned.

Senator Phillips: Oh, yes; he is back. That's great. I am glad to see that he still has both arms intact.

This legislation reminds me of Robin Hood, but in reverse. It seems rather strange to me that legislation should be in reverse, but, honourable senators—and I am sure the Honourable Senator Everett will appreciate this more than I do—there seems to be something wrong with the transmission of this government; apparently, it is locked in reverse and nothing they do seems to be able to put it into first gear, second gear or drive.

This is the second measure of the Trudeau trinity that was brought in under closure. I fail to understand the determination of the government to deal with this legislation. The debate in the other place was cut off after five days. Surely, honourable senators, citizens who have contributed so much to Canada should be entitled to more than five days' consideration.

Apparently, there is no urgency to deal with the unemployed. Last October there was a grand announcement by the government to the effect of implementing make-work projects. Since October the government has created 4,200 jobs under that program. That has never been discussed in Parliament, and yet there are 2,135,000 Canadians looking for work, either part-time or full-time employment. Some of those people are able to obtain only four or five hours of work a week, but there has been no discussion in Parliament about those people or their circumstances. No, this measure has priority.

Why is this measure so urgent, honourable senators, when the situation of the unemployed seems to be so unimportant?

Last week the Minister of Finance said he did not have time to call a conference of the federal Minister of Finance and the provincial finance ministers. Nevertheless, he has had time to direct the Minister of National Health and Welfare in this matter and to supervise the President of the Treasury Board on the other legislation. Why has he had no time to deal with the economy?

Parliament could be dealing with the Crowsnest Pass rate or the Kirby report, but those matters are not introduced to Parliament. Oh, no. This measure, this abominable measure, must receive priority. Again I ask you why this matter is so urgent, when the other matters are not even to be discussed in Parliament.

Honourable senators, there are moments when I have sympathy for the members of the party opposite. Fortunately, however, my sympathy for a Grit never lasts too long. I place my sympathy where it belongs—with the victims of this legislation and of the Trudeau trinity.

Perhaps the government supporters would like to know against whom they are voting when they support this legislation. I question whether they realize just whom they are offending or how many people they are offending when they pass this legislation. It is not only the senior citizens who will be offended by this legislation, honourable senators: it is their children and their grandchildren who will be offended. So it is not a measure which should just be rubberstamped and cast aside in a hurry.

I am perhaps being a bit unfair when I call this "Liberal" legislation. In my years on Parliament Hill—and there have been more than I care to mention—I have known many fine members of the Liberal Party who were proud of the principles advocated by the Liberal Party of old. But I ask honourable senators what has happened to the Liberal Party. All those principles that were the basis of the grand old party have now gone through the parliamentary shredder. Who has taken over the Liberal Party, I wonder. Who has usurped control of the party and discarded those principles of what was once a great party of Canada?

I am never much of an optimist in respect of the Liberals, but I still like to retain just a faint hope that, when Trudeau, Lalonde, Gray, Olson, and about one or two dozen other cabinet ministers go, the party will return to its tradition of equity and fair play.

Honourable senators, the reduction of the old age security benefits contained in Bill C-131 affects 1.2 million Canadians. That may be a source of satisfaction to senators such as Senators Davey, Frith and Pitfield, who originated the program, but I believe that most Canadians will be shocked by the realization that this government has selected one group to target in on.

● (1450)

The Canadians being assaulted by this bill are those to whom Senator Stollery referred last evening. They are those who went through World War I, the Depression, World War II, and now another depression. They have worked hard, contributed to the growth of the country through the payment of taxes and have helped to develop Canada. Now the government says to them, "We are in a depression. It's your fault. You did it again. We are going to cut back on your security benefits."

Honourable senators, is it just possible that the Minister of National Health and Welfare pushed the wrong button on the Liberal computer and made a very grave error? I think so.

While the senior citizens were making their contributions through taxes, they kept thinking that the money derived from those taxes would be available for them to draw on some day if they lived long enough. I am sure all honourable senators have heard that hope expressed many times, but now that they have survived and are drawing benefits in their grey years of life, they now have to worry about the government's action and the intention of the government concerning old age security benefits.

Meanwhile, the Minister of National Health and Welfare keeps saying that Canadians are in an economic crisis and that they need stability. Honourable senators, I find this a very odd way to provide economic stability for our senior citizens. That, honourable senators, I would describe as a "Lalonde-ism".

During the last election campaign in the maritime provinces Liberal candidates, joined by a number of Liberal senators, promised a $35-a-month increase in old age security benefits. I wonder why that election promise has not received priority. Why is there not an increase in the old age security benefits as promised by a number of Liberal candidates and senators? I ask the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, to which this bill will be referred, what happened to the promises he made on numerous occasions during the last election campaign. I am sure he will want to explain to the members of the committee just what happened to that promise. I hope it still applies and that this measure will be short-lived.

I mentioned earlier that there would be some discrepancy between my figures and those used by Senator Everett last evening. I believe I explained that I would be using the 11.2 figure, which is based on one year's experience, rather than the one-month figure used by Senator Everett.

This measure will cost the average recipient of old age security $290 by 1984, and will cost him that for every subsequent year of his retirement. For a married couple drawing old age security benefits, this measure will cost them $580 per annum for every subsequent year of their retirement.

Honourable senators, I consider this to be an insult, but it is an even worse insult for the government to keep saying, "We are doing this to provide economic stability." Surely, honourable senators, there must be another way of providing that economic stability.

[Senator Phillips.]

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: May I seek your indulgence and ask you to repeat those figures?

Senator Phillips: This measure will cost the average recipient of old age security $290 at the end of 1984, and will cost a married couple receiving OAS $580. You can find those figures in the report of the committee of the other place. They were provided by the minister, and that is where I got them from.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

Senator Phillips: Some unfortunate retired public servants will be hit twice. The retired public servant, under the provisions of Bill C-133, receives an average reduction of $800 per annum at the end of two years. Now, if we add the $580 to that, we find that the retired public servant is being taxed $1,380 per annum for the rest of his retirement.

The threshold principle is recognized. Single persons with an income of $6,075 per annum will still receive full indexation. Married couples with an income of less than $9,360 per annum will not be affected. I ask honourable senators why there is a distinction between Bill C-131 and Bill C-133. Why is the threshold principle included in this bill but ignored in the other?

Earlier, in Question Period, I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question about that and he was very emphatic that it would not be placed in the previously passed bill. Despite recommendations of a Senate committee, the government will not give that any consideration.

Now, let us not get the idea, honourable senators, that all pensioners are protected by GIS/OAS. There are 25,000 single retired individuals with incomes of between $9,000 and $10,000 per annum, and there are 25,000 married couples who have an income of $15,000 to $16,000 per annum. Those people, honourable senators, are the ones who are bearing the brunt of the six-and-five legislation as outlined in this bill.

The average recipient of GIS/OAS receives $25 per day. That is to buy food, to pay rent, utility bills, heating bills, and for all other necessities of life. In the name of controlling inflation we have to restrict that, but, honourable senators, let us compare that with the salary to be paid to the Chairman of the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada. He is to receive $800 a day, plus travelling expenses, and then there is the dandy little clause that says that if he leaves Toronto he is to receive $125 a day over and above the $800.

An Hon. Senator: It's worth it!

Senator Phillips: If the citizens of Toronto were offered $125 a day to leave Toronto, there would be a mass exodus from that city.

Hon. C. William Doody: They would probably settle for the bus fare.

Senator Phillips: One can hardly blame them for that.

Honourable senators, there is some lack of knowledge that needs to be explained. We have so many consultants hired by the government at $400 or $500 a day that the Auditor

General says he cannot find out what half of them are doing. He does not even know who they are. We also have many advertising agency executives receiving, in all likelihood, greater salaries. The federal government spends $200 million a year on so-called advocacy advertising. Never mind things like that because they are not important. It is those old age pensions that are causing inflation. It is the pensioners doing it again.

• (1500)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Don't forget Mirabel.

Senator Phillips: Let's not forget Mirabel.

An Hon. Senator: Don't forget the Kirby report.

Senator Doody: Incidentally, how much did that cost?

Senator Phillips: It is a very interesting question.

Senator Doody: Obviously, whatever it cost, it is not fit to publish.

Senator Phillips: I expect the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will want to tell us that when he replies.

The cutbacks are in the wrong area. I suggest it is time to concentrate on the non-essential things. I know it costs a lot of money to train wild geese to fly east to west instead of north to south, but we can get along without the wild geese in the government advertisements and we can provide old age security at its present level.

The Prime Minister went to Thailand in January and with one scratch of the pen he gave away an amount almost identical to what is being saved by this legislation.

Honourable senators, let us be reaslistic. Let us cut out the six-and-five nonsense as it applies to this bill, and let us apply the six-and-five, and even more than the six-and-five, to some of the government expenditures.

It is interesting to note that this is not the first time that the Liberal government has used old age security in order to fight inflation. Indexation in a formal way began in 1968 but it had a limit of 2 per cent per annum, which was, if I recall correctly, adequate because inflation was not rampant in those days. In 1971, the government decided that it could no longer afford the 2 per cent indexation, so pensions were frozen. They were frozen to fight inflation—the very thing that this legislation is supposed to do. I did not work because inflation has increased considerably since then. I do not see that it will work on this occasion.

It is also interesting to note that those who are now being taxed by having their old age security reduced paid throughout their lifetime a surtax for old age security. Corporations paid a surtax on their profits from 1951 to, I believe, 1972. The money was to pay for old age security. Until 1972 there was a 3 per cent federal excise tax that was paid by these various people. Again, the money was to be used to pay for old age security.

When introducing this bill in the other place, the Minister of National Health and Welfare expressed concern about equal benefits accruing to old age recipients from income tax exemptions. She spent considerable time on that and seemed very perturbed that a person with a low income received the same exemptions as those with an above average income. I fail to see why that should concern the minister because the Prime Minister receives the same income tax exemption as an unemployed labourer and nobody is suggesting that that be changed. Why does the minister have this particular concern with the tax exemptions of the retired?

Honourable senators, part of the reason we have this legislation before us is that the Minister of National Health and Welfare refused to stand up in the House of Commons or anywhere else to protect the people she is supposed to protect under her portfolio.

There is a struggle going on within the ranks of the Liberal Party concerning universality. The majority of the cabinet favour removing that principle. I believe that we should get some indication of the government's intention concerning universality of old age security, either in this debate or in committee. If this legislation passes here and in the other place without any great argument, the government will feel encouraged—perhaps even justified—to put further restrictions on old age security, which is something that would not be acceptable to me.

There are many alternatives to this legislation. The amount of money saved by the government is not that great—a very small percentage of the total budget. An amount of 15 cents per month from each taxpayer in Canada would allow old age security pensions to be fully indexed so that our retired senior citizens can enjoy the benefits. I cannot imagine a taxpayer in Canada objecting to paying 15 cents a month.

There are a number of other changes which could be made. For example, we need not give the same priority to crown corporations such as Petro-Canada. They received a subsidy of $517 million last year, and $630 million was used to buy service stations for them. Every time a Canadian fills his gas tank he is paying five cents per gallon as the Canadian ownership charge. A decision must be made soon regarding the Canadian ownership charge because the amount of money required by Petro-Canada has now been collected and the government has shown no indication of removing the tax. Why not take that tax and utilize it to pay for the full indexation of old age security, supplementary retirement benefits and family allowances? It would do far more good there. Again, I emphasize that we are placing our priorities in the wrong order.

In closing, I should like to quote someone who is often quoted in this chamber. At the Liberal policy convention in November 1982, the Prime Minister was reported as saying—I will have to trust the newspaper reports because I was not there; for some reason I did not get invited—on that occasion:

> When conditions change, Liberals adapt. When old solutions fail, Liberals think anew. Above all else when economic adversity strikes, Liberals act.

Honourable senators, here is your chance to act, to think anew and to adapt. We have tried these measures before with old age security. We have tried them with the wage and price controls, and they did not work. Reject this bill and move to other priorities and more logical solutions.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, as Senator Everett said, the bill makes provision for the very poor. They can draw their old age security. They can qualify for the guaranteed income supplement and, in some cases, the spouse's allowance. The government is not holding as hostage the lowest paid people, but it is being unfair to about one million other people.

● (1510)

I accept Senator Everett's figures, and realize he is doing a very good job of equating the figures. On the other hand, I differ from him because I am equating the human figures. I do not want to appear more concerned than he is.

Senator Flynn: It is easy.

Senator Croll: Senator Everett was a member of the committee on poverty. He has a feeling for the poor. He and Senator Cook were the two millionaires on the committee. We did not count their money. They both went carefully through the recommendations, and they both signed the report.

Hon. Eric Cook: Senator Croll exaggerates.

Senator Croll: I have always had a very special feeling for both of those people.

Senator Everett understands the problem, but I have a different interpretation. Senator Everett said that the money saved was not the chief concern; the fitting into the six-and-five mould was the chief concern.

It does not make any difference whether Senator Everett's figures are right as far as the amount of money that will be lost is concerned. I oppose this bill if any man drawing the old age pension loses even a nickel, and I will tell you why in a few minutes.

The six-and-five program has met with considerable success, but it is hard for me to believe that retirees, old age pensioners and family allowance recipients could not have been spared what has been inflicted upon them. I believe they could be exempted.

I do not enjoy standing up and opposing my party. I am a loyal Liberal; I am a loyal rebel in the ordinary sense.

This bill has a special affinity for me. As a young man practising law, I played an active role in politics. Along came this old age pension problem. I was in there screaming that we must pass legislation concerning old age security. We passed it. My reward was that the next year I was elected mayor. They must have thought there was some merit in my stance. I have always been thankful for that. That legislation has always held a special meaning for me, and I will try to convey to you what that special meaning is.

The bill was rejected by the Senate of that day on two occasions. It is interesting to consider the reasons why it was so rejected. First, it was considered to be ruinously expensive for the poor provinces; second, the subject matter was assigned, under the Constitution, to the provinces; and third, it was thought the legislation was premature because there was no federal-provincial agreement. How things have not changed in 50 years!

On reading the Debates of the Senate of that time, I note that some senators went a little further and said that the act could be socially destructive, and the then Leader of the Government in the Senate rejected the bill because it relieved the child of a natural and civil obligation because it would constitute a "dole" as they had in Great Britain. That was 50 years ago.

The point I want to make to this chamber is that legislation laid the foundation for our future social services and policies of this country. Recipients were subject to a means test. They had to be 70 years or older and fulfil the residence requirements. The plan was to be administered by individual provinces that chose to participate and pay 50 per cent. From the beginning there was considerable demand for an increase in pension, and it was increased gradually. The chief objection was the means test. People felt it was meanly applied, and it was.

Twenty years later, in 1952, the government decided to appoint a committee of the House of Commons to study pensions. I was a member of that committee. The committee recommended universality, and the government adopted that recommendation and made it law. That was the cornerstone of our social system. Universality is the foundation of the retirement planning of every worker in this country; that is all he has with the exception of the Canada Pension Plan, which does not give him much. To interfere with that, to me, is unbecoming, whether we have a six-and-five program or a seven-and-eight program. The purpose is to build on top of the legislation; it is untouchable.

We have continued to increase the payments made under the old age pension plan. We have introduced the guaranteed income supplement which has never been fully adequate, but I will not argue that point. It has been very helpful to the old.

This chamber authorized a study on aging, which took us three years. We recommended that the age limit be reduced, year by year, from age 70 to 65, and that something be added. The Honourable Allan MacEachen was then the minister responsible, and he added a supplement. The original idea came from this chamber.

Now, 30 years after accepting the recommendation of universality, we are asked to take action that I never expected to be proposed by a Liberal government. I am opposed to cutting benefits received by anyone. There are only two things you can do to a benefit—you either freeze it or you raise it, but you never cut it. I am against cutting.

Senior citizens with little or no income will not be affected by the bill; I have told you that. The amount of loss to others is not great—somebody said it would be $300, and another said it would be $190. That does not make any difference. It is basically wrong. It has been pointed out that in other countries social security is being reduced. Honourable senators, I am not a supporter of President Reagan of the United States or Chancellor Helmut Kohl of Germany. I am a Canadian and I want things handled in the Canadian way. Surely this country, with its boundless resources, is rich enough to work its way out of the economic doldrums without exacting an added toll from our older people. They have earned a little security in our society, and, believe me, it is little enough. Let us not, for heaven's sake, make things any worse for them than they are already.

● (1520)

Honourable senators, I quite accept that the way out of this recessionary period is going to be difficult and expensive. No one in his right mind thinks that there is an easy way out. To do it on the backs of the pensioners, however, is simply out of the question.

Put in terms of dollars, what would be saved by putting our old people in the six-and-five straitjacket would not amount to a hill of beans. It is not going to bail out Massey-Ferguson; it is not going to build 100 miles of railway; it is not going to bail out Chrysler; and it will not pay for much in the way of public works.

Honourable senators, I have been a card-carrying Liberal for something like 60 years. I cannot believe that anyone, least of all a Liberal administration, could even think of imposing the six-and-five formula on our old age pensioners. In these difficult times there are many groups in our society that can bear greater or lesser burdens, depending on their means, and these groups include organized labour, industry, farmers, the public sector, and so on. Our old age pensioners, however, are definitely not of such a group. They have no accumulation of savings, write-offs or perks such as those the other groups enjoy to help them through the bad days we are experiencing. There is no fat on our old age pensioners, honourable senators. They are down to the bone now. Too many of them are living below the poverty level, and it would be unthinkable to let continuing inflation further erode their already inadequate pensions.

The fact is that this country is not going to nickel-and-dime its way out of the recession—and, believe me, nickels and dimes are all we would get from the old age pensioners. Let us not lose all sense of decency for a few nickels and dimes. This country has a moral contract with its old people. They make up the most defenceless sector of our society. No powerful union fights for them; they have no organized lobby. Every other group has its vocal defenders—scratch one and listen to the howls. Well, honourable senators, I am howling for the old age pensioners.

Honourable senators, I mentioned earlier my chief objection to this bill. Universality made this pension the foundation for individual retirement planning. That is all these working people now have. Fifty-three per cent of the working people of this country have the GIS plus the pension plan and must, thereafter, make provision for themselves. It can be seen, then, how people have lived with the hope that they could build on this old age pension security. For the government to interfere with it in any way will give these people a feeling of insecurity.

The one thing they must have is absolute confidence that their pensions will be there tomorrow, the day after and the day after that. We cannot—we must not—break faith with them. Heaven knows, we are doing little enough for them as it is. I have been campaigning as hard as I can in favour of doing more for our pensioners. Let us not, in all conscience, do less.

Honourable senators, so long as one item of the benefit is being cut, I cannot support this bill. This bill lacks what we have always had in the Liberal Party, and that is compassion. The Liberal Party, through years and years of hard times, has impressed upon the people of this country its desire to help in every possible way.

I have seen and met many young people armed with these sharp pencils who can always tell you how to save. "Well, here, cut social security; that is one way to save." I will just say that sharp pencils and dull minds do not go well together.

There is not one other country in the world which pays its people of a certain age so much money. That has become part of our culture. It is part of our strength, and we ought to preserve it.

As far as I am concerned, honourable senators, I cannot support this bill.

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: I will relieve honourable senators immediately of any anxiety regarding my position on this bill. I propose to vote against it. However, I should like to say a word or two about it.

Honourable senators, we live in parlous times. We see, in this country, a deficit in the order of billions of dollars. We see people coming forward urging that, for the sake of the economy, we spend more money, that we should have an even greater deficit. They say, "Thirty billion dollars is not enough; let us have more. Spend your money!" Where it comes from, I do not know.

A person of my age can remember the day, in this country, when the deficit was measured in millions of dollars. As a young politician, I travelled across the country and was told by university students that we must get rid of that man Diefenbaker. I was told then that any man who runs the country with the result that the deficit climbs into the millions is certainly not the right man for the job. Today I pick up my newspaper and find that, even now, they say that Mr. Diefenbaker had no ability in looking after money. Perhaps that is so; I do not know. But I do know this: he was rich in ability compared to some of those who are in positions of authority today.

Honourable senators, I merely wanted to say this: I looked at this bill and wondered how I could answer the Liberal position that we, as opposition members, are inconsistent because, on the one hand, we say that you, the Liberals, spend too much money and have policies that cost too much; and, on the other hand, when you try to limit costs, as you propose to do in this bill, the opposition rises to its feet and says this should not be done. Well, I was impressed by what Senator Phillips and Senator Croll had to say. One thing in particular that each of them said made me stop and think. In the first place, whether or not it is inconsistent to say that we should vote against a measure which is going to cost the government less money, with which I am inclined to agree, the minute you apply such a cut to the portion of our population that is least able to bear it, then I no longer can agree with you.

● (1530)

Senator Phillips, in particular, spoke about the salaries that were to be paid to the members of the royal commission on the economy of Canada. The government says that we must save money because we are spending too much and our deficits are too high, yet at the same time the very people who preach economy make an extravagant gesture such as that with regard to this royal commission. I say to myself that, even if I did not have the feeling I do with regard to old age pensioners, I would recognize the arguments coming from the other side of the house as hypocritical, since one only has to read what is being paid to the members of that commission to realize that the people who are prepared to justify it are not greatly concerned at what they are doing.

I am not going to talk politics or about the Prime Minister very much, but I cannot help referring to what the Prime Minister said with regard to justifying the emoluments that are being allowed to the persons heading this commission. He said, "Oh well, one must always bear in mind that McCarthy & McCarthy have to pay their overhead, and that a large portion of what is being paid to the commission will be diverted to that firm." The answer to him on that should have been, "Who gives a damn about McCarthy & McCarthy?"

We feel for the old age pensioners, but we do not feel for people of that calibre. Just think about it. Mr. Macdonald, a former Liberal cabinet minister, a touted potential leader of the Liberal Party and a potential candidate to be prime minister of this country, will be paid for doing an outside job greatly in excess of what we now pay the Prime Minister. He will get, at $800 a day, if he only works five days a week, something like $200,000 a year, while we pay our Prime Minister something like $124,000 a year. I am sure you will say to me, "Well, you are assuming this. It is only a daily rate that Mr. Macdonald gets. To get the kind of figure you are suggesting you only assume he is going to work on that number of days."

I do not think an awful lot of Donald Macdonald, I can tell you, but I believe that even he would not have the gall to accept that kind of appointment, with that kind of allowance, unless he did what he deemed to be his level best to justify it. Anyway, if you are being paid on a daily basis, and if you get $800 a day, then I certainly say to you that there is very little incentive to remain idle. As long as we are being paid by the day, the chances are that we will work by the day and that we will work every day.

Do not think that Mr. Macdonald is alone, however. There are other people who are going to benefit. The order in council that sets up the payment to be made to the royal commission establishes a stipend of $750 a day for Michel Robert. I do not know Michel Robert. It says in the document to which I am referring that he is a Montreal lawyer. It also says that he is a Liberal supporter.

Senator Doody: Surprise, surprise!

Senator Donahoe: It mentions another name, also, at $750 a day. This name is Godsoe. I know him, because he comes from the same city I do, and I am perfectly delighted with the great good fortune that has come his way. I surely trust that he will be able to survive on that paltry amount of $750 a day.

Senator Doody: Is he a Tory?

Senator Donahoe: Some of the persons on the commission, however, receive amounts that approach normality. By the order in council they receive only $350 a day. It is interesting to note, and I really do not know what the explanation is, that one member of the commission is not mentioned in connection with salaries. The coincidence is that that person is the only Conservative member, that I know of, on the commission. There may be others—I will not say there are not—but she is a marked member of the commission. There is no pay for her. When a question was asked about what her pay would be, the answer was, "I really don't know, but I am sure she will be paid something." Well, I hope so. I feel that her work as a member of the commission might be frustrated if she found she was not going to receive something.

I merely want to say, with respect to the bill that is before the Senate, that from the point of view of political philosophy I sympathize with those who support the six-and-five approach. I am bound to sympathize with any move that is directed to the saving of money. I cannot accept this particular bill, however, because the burden of the saving, as I have said, is to be placed on the shoulders of those least able to bear it.

Finally, I want to say that any prospect that there might ever have been of my changing my mind, and becoming convinced of the verity and sincerity of those who preach the six-and-five philosophy, is lost completely when I read the story of the appointment of the members of this commission. Do not feel too badly about the commission, however. It only has a three-year mandate, so there is no danger of anybody becoming a millionaire. They may live like millionaires while the commission exists, but they will not end up being millionaires, because even at $192,000 a year, if you multiply that by three, you still do not quite reach a million.

I do not know whether or not this bill we are considering is motivated by a desire to put the government in funds with respect to its expenses in connection with the commission, but I do know that a large proportion of what is not going to be paid to pensioners by virtue of the provisions of this bill will, of necessity, have to be spent on that particular job. It is a job, I may say, that is of very dubious value to the nation. I listened this afternoon to one of the senators from Newfoundland attempting to urge that there be disclosure of a commission report which directly affects the livelihood of the people in both his province and mine. "For the love of God," he said, "disclose it. Do something about it." We now see hundreds of thousands of dollars being expended to produce a message which should be produced by the government of this country.

Don't forget that one must sympathize with the Liberals. They have a number of policies afoot in this country which mean that automatically, when conditions suit it, the cost rises. Oh, we have medical coverage; we have unemployment insurance; we have a wide variety of social benefits; but I have lived long enough to run election campaigns in which I was told that I was something less than proper when I said, "There are dangers in some of the policies that you, as a Liberal Party, are putting forward"; and I was mocked and laughed at. But I have now seen the day arrive when the very policies that were used to deprive some people of an opportunity to take part in the government of the country, and were used to provide that right for a certain group of people, have come back to knock on their door and to tell them that those who said there were dangers inherent in the policies were not gloom bringers, were not people who tried to suck sunshine out of a cucumber, or people who were mean, narrow and selfish—that is the way they were depicted—but were people who saw a reason for what they said.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to say much more in connection with this bill. I do not know that what I have said is of great value to anyone but me, but I had the desire to stand on my feet in this chamber and say all of the things I have said in order that those in my province who are interested in what takes place in this chamber will not say that I voted against a measure which the government brought forward in an attempt to save money, to attempt to curb the deficit, to attempt to control the economy. I do not want people to say that I voted against that kind of bill, but that I voted against this bill because those who have proposed it are the victims of their own policies, to begin with, and, secondly, they are not serious about attempting to solve the economic problems of this country. They use the Donald Macdonald commission as a means of pushing aside and escaping the blame for the conditions which exist in this country. That is all it is.

So I shall vote against this bill for those reasons. I shall vote against it because the people who promote it are not sincere in what they say. I shall vote against it because the bill does the very thing that Senator Croll says it does: it demonstrates that the spirit of equity and fairness that used to dominate the Liberal Party no longer exists. And when Senator Croll asks the question, "What has happened to the Liberal Party? Why do I have to stand on the floor of this house and suffer, to take the position that I do take because the government of the day insists on bringing in bills that are entirely inconsistent with the philosophy which made the Liberal Party the government?" my only answer is: Well, perhaps your party has fallen on evil days; perhaps it has fallen into the wrong hands; perhaps it is led by people who are not genuine Liberals. Perhaps some of you on the other side of the house who like to take your lessons and vote as you are directed are looking to the wrong source when you seek to know what you should do. If some of you followed your own natural, generous instincts, if some of you were logical and realistic, as I know you to be, then perhaps this vote and many other votes in this Senate would come out very differently from the overwhelming way in which we see them develop.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I had no intention whatsoever of joining in this debate, as you will hear enough from me later; but I feel that I should rise on the point raised by Senator Donahoe, namely, Mr. Macdonald's fee of $800 per day.

As honourable senators know, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is a most effective committee, highly regarded and respected. One of the reasons for that is because we have excellent professional assistance. We have a lawyer from the largest law firm in Montreal—a firm that corresponds in that city to McCarthy & McCarthy in Toronto—who goes through the tax bills for us and gives us excellent advice. Last spring I took it upon myself to find out how much we were paying that lawyer per day, and it was $850. I then inquired around Toronto, including my old law firm, to see whether or not that was reasonable, and I discovered that it was. So all I am saying—and there has been no objection from the Conservative members of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to paying our lawyer $850—is that we are getting Mr. Macdonald cheap at $800 per day.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, notwithstanding the comments just made by Senator Godfrey, I see no one on the government side supporting the bill, except for the bill's sponsor. Yesterday, Senator Croll asked one question, and Senator Stollery made his position quite clear. Last week, when we were discussing the bill about capping indexation of public service pensions, Senator Thompson, and even Senator Thériault, expressed their disapproval. Granted, on third reading Senator Thériault managed to find a reason to toe the party line. In any case, I see only Senator Everett, and when I was listening to him yesterday, I thought it was rather amusing that he should have been chosen on the government side to introduce this legislation. Senator Everett is a finance expert, chairman of our Committee on National Finance and a technician, and I thought it was rather amusing that in his speech yesterday he used almost exclusively technical arguments, which, however, were less than convincing. In fact, it would be interesting to see whether anyone on the Liberal side would be able to produce some really convincing arguments in support of this bill.

First of all, I would like to comment on Senator Everett's introduction, in which he explains that the bill is part of the 6-and-5 program. I have previously had an opportunity to express my doubts and my disagreement with this view, because I feel that the 6-and-5 policy is concerned with wages and nothing else. To extend it to public service pensions, as was proposed last week, or to old age security benefits which we are discussing today, I think an entirely different set of arguments should be used. The aim is to restrain wage increases, and that is a matter of economics. But Senator Everett told us that it was part of the policy which to date "has been extremely successful".

If that is true, why is this particular bill being tabled? We do not need it. If the program has been successful, why add this particular measure? You can hardly label as successful a measure that has not even been adopted. The 6-and-5 program was adopted, but to talk about success when a bill has not yet been given effective force of law is rather stupid.

Then he added another argument, his favourite one on inflation rates. He told us that Mr. Bouey appeared before the committee in December and told us that if the inflation rate in Canada were calculated in the same way as the United States, it would be even lower, and he said 10 per cent. However, I checked what Mr. Bouey said to the committee on National Finance; he said that it would be 3 or 4 per cent less, if the inflation rate in Canada were calculated in the same way as in the United States. If we have an inflation rate of 10 per cent, and we subtract 3 or 4 per cent, then we get 6 per cent, so that this legislation is entirely unnecessary. If we are really down to 6 per cent, forget the legislation and let us just change the way we calculate inflation. We do not need legislation that seems to be persecuting the poor. There was a whole series of arguments like that.

Further on, Senator Everett told us:

• (1550)

[English]

> The government is not as concerned about the amount of money it saves as much as it wishes to create an additional condition of restraint in its attempt to overcome inflation.

[Translation]

It is all done with mirrors. They just want to say that they are doing something extraordinary, but in fact, whatever they would have us believe, they are making people pay who can least afford to.

I agree that the bill provides for people who receive the guaranteed income supplement, but those who are barely above the poverty line are going to suffer.

Another statement by Senator Everett, which I think is too transparent for words, appears on page 5322:

[English]

> Then you are faced with the problem of which groups should be controlled. If the government makes an exception for one group, then another group will say that they ought to be excused from the restraint, and before you know it your restraint program has failed.

[Translation]

Well, it is common knowledge that a lot of groups are not going to be affected: people getting Canada Pension Plan benefits, veterans, CBC employees and many others. With so many exceptions, why did they have to hit on Old Age Security? I cannot accept that.

This morning, Le Devoir published an article by Paule des Rivières, under the heading: "Poverty more widespread". I shall quote a few paragraphs of interest, without leaving out anything that might support the arguments of those who are going to vote in favour of the bill later on, I promise:

> On the other hand, the situation of families where the head of the family is 65 years or over improved during the last decade, but has remained unchanged since 1980. Elderly couples without children who are mainly dependent on government pensions are in fairly serious trouble, according to the Canadian Council on Social Development, in a book providing basic data on poverty in Canada which was made public yesterday. The author is Mr. David Ross, an Ottawa economist.

Further on:

> Among people living on their own, women over 65 are the worst off.

This bill is going to affect the people mentioned in this report, without really making a substantial cut in Government expenditures and without making a meaningful contribution to the 6-and-5 program, which, in my opinion, should only apply to wages and prices. As far as inflation is concerned—and Senator Everett touched on the subject yesterday—the high interest rates we have been using for years to fight inflation have only led to an endless number of bankruptcies and the high rate of unemployment we are saddled with today. The former President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Johnston, who is now Minister of State for Economic Development, said not long ago that it was perhaps just as well that these lost jobs should disappear because they would eventually be replaced by other jobs.

I do not doubt it, but meanwhile, the government's job creation policies are only creating temporary jobs which are far less valuable than the jobs that no longer exist. In any case, this government's policy is a total mess. This particular measure will not have the expected results. It is only punishing people who need security. The arguments put forward by Senator Croll, Senator Stollery, and by others such as Senator Thompson last week and also by my very good friend, Senator Thériault, should convince the Senate that this bill should be voted down.

[English]

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Everett speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, first, I would like to correct an impression that was made or attempted to be made during the speeches we have just heard, and that is that somehow the income of pensioners under the old age security program will be cut. That is not the case.

Senator Flynn: We know very well that it is.

Senator Everett: You may know it very well, sir, but the impression was left that the benefits had to be reduced—

Senator Flynn: They will be.

Senator Everett: —and that an old age pensioner will receive less than he or she had before. That is not so.

Senator Flynn: Yes it is, in relation to the cost of living.

Senator Everett: The increases are to be held to 6 per cent in 1983 and a further 5 per cent in 1984. That does not mean that there will be a reduction in benefits, but that there will be an increase in benefits. Senator Phillips had some figures on the reduction between full indexation and the capped rate after two years of the program for a single person. I believe he said that the reduction for a single person would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $290 and for a married person in the neighbourhood of $500-odd. The figures I have indicate that the difference ranges from 50 cents per month from January to March 1983 up to $3.43 in October and December 1984. I will not take the average between the two because that might be misleading, but let us take $3, which is a little on the high side. The amount would be $36 per year and $72 over the two years for a single pensioner, and for a married pensioner it would be $144 per year. Based on $3, those would be the figures, and I think they are a little on the high side. I do wish to correct the impression that—

Senator Phillips: I apologize for interrupting the honourable senator. According to the figures he gave last evening, I believe the $3 per month would apply at the end of 1983, not 1984 as he just stated. Am I correct in that?

• (1600)

Senator Everett: At the end of 1983 the amount is $2.92, and in 1984 it is $3.32. Obviously, the 5 per cent is a lower increase in the second year than the 6 per cent is in the first year. However, there is still a substantial difference between our figures, and I do want to correct the impression that the old age security pension cannot increase.

But what is really important here? What is the real issue? It is that we reduce inflation so that the thresholds are not necessary at all. If we can lower inflation below 6 per cent in 1983 and below 5 per cent in 1984, then no pensioner at all will be harmed by this legislation. That is the important thing.

It seems to me that of all the people in the economy the old age pensioners have the greatest stake in the success of the six-and-five program. Senator Stollery was talking about somebody who had endured the depression and gone through the Second World War and had put away savings, and had then watched those savings eroding over the last few years of inflation. Surely, what is important to such people is for us to lick inflation in this economy.

I contend that the six-and-five program is working. Inflation is down. It may disappoint Senator Flynn that it is not up, that he cannot cry about rates of 15 per cent and 20 per cent. The fact of the matter is that in December of 1982 compared to December of 1981 the annual rate of inflation was reduced to 9.3 per cent. If we compare that to the American figure, as Senator Flynn says, it is likely 3 to 4 per cent under that. But what is even more dramatic is that the monthly difference between December 1982 and November 1982 is one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Senator Flynn asks, "Why persecute the pensioners unnecessarily?" Has it occurred to him that if we can reduce inflation, pensioners will not be persecuted at all? And that is what is really important.

What is even more important is that the lowest-income people, those who are least able to protect themselves, are protected by this bill. The opposition, the people who speak against the bill, choose conveniently to ignore that fact. Let me reiterate it. Everyone who draws the guaranteed income supplement will not be affected by this bill.

Senator Flynn: We all know that. I have said that myself. Don't build a straw man.

Senator Everett: It is not a straw man. It is what the bill says.

Senator Flynn: And that is what I have said too.

Senator Everett: The guaranteed income supplement is indexed for inflation. Moreover, the difference between the fully indexed amount and the capped amount of the old age security payment is indexed for those who are on the guaranteed income supplement. Let me reiterate that what that means is that the people who are drawing the guaranteed income supplement will not be affected by this bill at all.

Who are those people? They are the people whose incomes are below certain thresholds. Single persons must be making less than $9,080 per year; the combined incomes of married couples must be less than $15,375 per year; married couples, one of whom is not drawing old age security pension, must be making less than $18,165 a year.

Certainly, it is a pity that the government has to apply restraint. However, I make no apologies for the fact that this government entered upon a restraint policy to reduce inflation. The Conservatives, when they were in power, endorsed exactly the same policy and defended it. They defended the action of the Bank of Canada. They reappointed the Governor. They were in favour of that policy.

Nobody has said it is an easy road. It is a tough policy and people are hurt. But they are hurt worse by inflation that increases year after year after year. That is what harms people even more.

Whether under a Conservative government or a Liberal government, we could not have avoided the pain. There was no way to avoid the pain. Either we had to accept inflation, which would have worsened egregiously, or we had to take action to reduce that inflation and, in doing so, pay a price.

Senator Croll has said that he is howling for the old age pensioners. He says we cannot and must not break faith with them. Well, I contend that within the anti-inflation policy of the government we have gone as far as humanly possible not to break faith. Those who are drawing the old age security pension will have increases of 6 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984. If we bring inflation down, the ceilings will have no effect whatsoever. Those who are drawing the guaranteed income supplement with incomes below the thresholds that I mentioned are fully protected and are not affected by this bill.

If hard measures have to be taken to beat inflation, honourable senators, I cannot think of any way that could be fairer than that provided by this bill.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: It is all done with mirrors.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Everett, seconded by the Honourable Senator Godfrey, that this bill be read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT

BILL C-672, TO CHANGE THE NAME OF THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF DAUPHIN—SECOND READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-672, to change the name of the electoral district of Dauphin.

He said: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that some objections were raised previously when proposals were made for changes in other constituency names, I will attempt to give as much background information on this proposal as I can to assure honourable senators that it does have wide approval.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That is a good reason.

Senator Molgat: The suggestion is not a brand new one; it is not something that has just come up in the House of Commons this week and has been forwarded here. The proposal was initially made by the member for the constituency, Mr. Laverne Lewycky from the town of Dauphin. He made this proposal in a brief presented to the Electoral Boundaries Commission at its meeting in Dauphin as a result of its initial proposals for new boundaries in Manitoba. I will not read the complete text of his submission at that time, but merely a summary. He states:

> Given Swan River's distance from the riding's other major centre (Dauphin—some one hundred and ten miles), and the need to emphasize its importance with the riding as a whole,
> Given its geographical uniqueness both in and of itself and as a part of the Swan River Valley as a whole,
> Given its historical and socio-economic distinctiveness, as the second largest town in the constituency,
> Given the support of the proposed constituency name change from fellow constituents throughout the riding—

—he asks that the name be changed.

Mr. Lewycky appended to the brief a number of resolutions from town councils and letters from private groups supporting the proposal. That was the first public statement in this regard made to the Electoral Boundaries Commission.

I presume most honourable senators know, but I would point out that Mr. Lewycky is not a member of the same party as I am, so there is no party interest in this matter.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Are you sure?

Senator Asselin: You are from the same province.

Senator Molgat: Yes. I was very pleased that he asked me to make the proposal in this chamber because my old provincial constituency of Ste. Rose is part of the Dauphin constituency. Therefore, I suppose I do have a personal interest in the matter in that regard; I certainly have a personal knowledge of the region.

I would point out that the bill received complete support in the other place from all parties. It was introduced there on Tuesday, February 1, and on Wednesday, February 2, by unanimous consent, the bill was read a second time. It was considered in committee, reported, read a third time and passed. There were certainly no objections raised in the House of Commons with respect to this bill.

The constituency itself was created in 1903, and from the beginning had the name of Dauphin. It is a historical name in many ways from a Manitoba standpoint. The constituency and the town took the name from the lake when it was originally named by the first explorer coming overland to western Canada, Sieur François de La Vérendrye, a notable explorer of western Canada. In 1739 La Vérendrye stood on the shores of the lake he had just discovered and called it Lac Dauphin in recognition of the heir to the throne of France. It is a historical name in that regard.

The region of Swan River, which is now suggested as an addition, is a distinct geographic region. As I have indicated, it is some 110 miles from Dauphin itself and is a separate geographic feature. There is, in Manitoba terms, a mountain between the two areas, and Swan River has a forested region and is a separate geographic and economic unit.

The Swan River portion has not always been appended to the Dauphin constituency. It was previously in The Pas constituency or the Churchill constituency; it has varied. However, it is now part of the Dauphin constituency.

Because of its geographic distinctiveness, it is proposed that the name should be added. Part of the reason for doing it now is that this year the town of Swan River will be celebrating its seventy-fifth anniversary, and the proposal would be to have a scroll presented to the town at the time of the anniversary which, I believe, is in the month of May.

The last point I would make is that, if there were a name change, it would make things a little easier because the provincial constituency also bears the name of Dauphin. We have to speak constantly of Dauphin provincial and Dauphin federal. If there were a distinct name, it would be very clear; when we speak of Dauphin, it would be the provincial constituency, and when we speak of Dauphin-Swan River, it would be the federal constituency.

I commend this bill to the Senate.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, from what we have just heard, we must be aware of the fact that the bill comes well vouched-for by one who is knowledgeable not only in the history of the area but in its configuration as well. All I wish to say is that I think Senator Molgat has done his subject ample justice this afternoon. I am sure that there will be a general disposition in the house to agree to his recommendation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, in view of the judgment made public yesterday or the day before by the Federal Court of Canada, could the sponsor of the bill assure us that the passage of this bill will not directly effect a change in returning officer?

Senator Molgat: I regret that I am unable to answer that question, honourable senators. I shall be happy to find an answer, but, at the moment, I cannot do so.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, until I have an answer I will have to call division.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think the question could very well be put to the Deputy Leader of the Government. Some honourable senators may not be aware of the judgment to which Senator Lafond refers. On previous occasions when the name of a constituency was changed, the government decided that it was a new constituency, and that, therefore, under the provisions of the Elections Act, a new returning officer could be appointed even if the territorial limits of the constituency were not changed. That happened in Ste. Hyacinthe and in two other constituencies on which the Federal Court ruled just a few days ago.

My understanding is that, since the change of government, in 17 other constituencies all of the returning officers who had been appointed by the short-lived Clark government were replaced under the pretext of a change of name. Very often the member for the riding was asking for the change of name only for the purpose of replacing the returning officer. The Federal Court has ruled that the government had no justification, by the mere fact of a change of name, to replace a returning officer, unless there was something about which to reproach him.

Honourable senators, I think what happened in those constituencies was a terrible practice. Therefore, we should ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to find out, first, whether the Minister of Justice is going to accept the judgment of the Federal Court or whether he intends to appeal that judgment; and, secondly, whether, at least in practice, they will not use this pretext of a change of name simply to appoint a new returning officer of the colour of the party in office. I think the deputy leader should inform us with respect to those two matters.

Another point which has usually been raised by Senator Lafond has to do with giving a double name to a riding. I will not object formally, but it seems to me that this is a bad practice and should be used rarely. Perhaps, however, in the present case, in view of the historical and geographical reasons given by the sponsor of the bill, we should be satisfied simply to register a caveat of some kind. When an attempt is made to describe every corner of a constituency, the result is a name that is much too long. This creates complications of all kinds in the printing of the electoral documents, and so on.

I hope that, with respect to the judgment to which Senator Lafond has referred and with respect to the two questions I raised, the Deputy Leader of the Government will give us satisfactory answers before third reading of this bill is sought.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it seems to me that the decision of the Federal Court is in effect until appealed. I am sure that the government would not do anything illegal in the meantime, as would be the case if all we are talking about is a change of the name. I assume that the government will abide by the decision of the Federal Court. In the meantime, whether I can find out between now and third reading debate tomorrow if there will be an appeal of that decision, I do not know.

On the other question, as Senator Flynn has pointed out, we know Senator Lafond's views. All honourable senators have views on it. Mine is that the matter of how constituencies are described for representation in the House of Commons is essentially their business, subject to our passing on our views, but not to the point of refusing the legislation. If the House of Commons wants its areas designated by certain names, it seems to me that we should support its wishes.

I will try to find out what I can on these matters, but I cannot undertake to have an answer by tomorrow. If it is of great importance, of course, we could adjourn third reading of the bill.

Senator Molgat: If I may, honourable senators, in closing the debate I will be brief. I am sorry that I cannot specifically answer that question; as the deputy leader has indicated, he cannot do so either. I tried to make it clear in my presentation of the bill, however, that those uses to which Senator Flynn referred were certainly not the intention or the purpose of the bill. I was aware, from personal discussions prior to presenting the bill, of that concern. That is why I tried to make it clear that the origin of the change of name in this case is different from that which might be feared. I might point out that the member for the constituency in question is a member of the New Democratic Party, not a member of the government party.

On Senator Flynn's point regarding the multiple name, I recognize the difficulty that arises if we extend certain names. While I might personally have preferred to call the constituency Dauphin-Swan River-Ste. Rose, for example, for historical reasons in my case, I did not press that point. I find that, partially because of the provincial constituency also called Dauphin, there is logic to the name "Dauphin-Swan River," so I forgo the addition of Ste. Rose.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

On motion of Senator Molgat, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

On the Order:

> The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 9, 1982, the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on November 26, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C.)

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: When Senator Frith made his speech on Senate reform, I mentioned before moving adjournment of the debate that I would also like to speak on the matter. Subsequently, a joint committee of both chambers was formed to consider Senate reform, which was something of an anti-climax. I am therefore not going to make the comments I intended to make. As far as Order No. 4 is concerned, if other senators wish to take part in the debate, that is all right with me, but, personally, I do not intend to follow up on the adjournment motion I made.

By the same token, as far as Order No. 5 is concerned—the motion put by Honourable Senator Roblin and seconded by myself—I hope that before the end of this session the motion can be put to a vote, so that the committee that will be examining the Senate reform issue will have some idea of the views of honourable senators as to the formula proposed by Senator Roblin. That is what I wanted to say.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I am very sorry but I forgot that Senator Deschatelets told me just before today's session that he intended to make these comments regarding Orders No. 4 and No. 5. If I understand correctly, he agrees to having Order No. 4 stand in his name but he is giving other senators a chance to express their views.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is not what he meant.

Senator Deschatelets: I merely said that I was not going to speak on this item, since a joint committee will be considering this issue.

Senator Frith: If I understood correctly, you intend to let the order stand on the Order Paper?

Senator Flynn: Unless another senator has something to add in this regard.

Senator Frith: But in Senator Deschatelets' name, meanwhile?

Senator Flynn: No. Senator Deschatelets is saying that if no one else wishes to speak on this item, it will be dropped from the Order Paper.

Senator Frith: That was not the impression I got from his comments. I understood that he agreed to let the order stand in his name and that he was giving other senators an opportunity to comment on the issue.

Senator Deschatelets: I have no interest in keeping this order in my name. I prefer to have my name dropped as far as the order on the Order Paper is concerned. If someone else wishes to speak on the subject, he is entirely free to do so. If not, the order is dropped.

Senator Frith: Which means right away?

Senator Deschatelets: Yes.

Senator Frith: So you mean that if no one else is prepared to comment on the issue right now, you are dropping this motion from the Order Paper?

Senator Deschatelets: Yes.

Senator Frith: That is all right with me.

• (1650)

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Rather than have that happen, honourable senators, I would prefer to move the adjournment of this debate. In a few minutes I am going to speak partly on Senate reform, and if I do not cover everything I might speak to this order at a later date.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

REFORM—MOTION RE ELECTION OF MEMBERS—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C.:
> That this House affirms that the federal character of representative and responsible government in Canada will be strengthened if the membership of the Senate is constituted by election rather than by appointment.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Order No. 4 is, therefore, adjourned in the name of Senator Godfrey. As for Order No. 5, Senator Deschatelets has suggested that the motion of Senator Roblin might be put to a vote. This order now stands in the name of Senator Marshall. Under Rule 29, this is certainly a substantive motion. Senator Roblin has the right to close the debate. I believe that we can let the order stand in the name of Senator Marshall until then. As I understand it, all the other orders stand.

Order stands.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF CLAUSES OF CERTAIN BILLS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John M. Godfrey, pursuant to notice of Thursday, April 29, 1982, moved:

> That the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments be authorized to examine the subject matter of clauses of bills introduced in the Senate or the House of Commons, where such clauses may, by express words or otherwise, infringe upon the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House thereof and to invite them to join with this House in the aforementioned action.

He said: Honourable senators, earlier, Senator Croll mentioned that he had taken the first action respecting his interest in old age pensioners some 50 years ago. I had a similar interest in human rights, and I was just a year behind him. It was 49 years ago that I wrote a letter to the papers on this subject, and it was published. I know it was 1934 because it was the year of the hundredth anniversary of the Tolpuddle Martyrs. They were a group of agricultural workers in a small village in south-west England who formed what was really part of the first trade union in that country. They were prosecuted because they committed, under the common law then in existence, a criminal offence in that they were a conspiracy in restraint of trade. They were sentenced to seven years' penal deportation to Australia. Eventually five of them, after they had served their sentence, came and settled in Canada. I might say that a very famous radical member of the House of Commons in England, John Arthur Roebuck, Q.C., defended the Tolpuddle martyrs and he was the uncle of Senator Arthur Roebuck, to whom I shall refer later.

The relevance of the Tolpuddle Martyrs to my present motion is that in 1934 we had something called section 98 in the Criminal Code of Canada. That was passed because of the Winnipeg riots in 1919. Section 98 said that anybody who belonged to an organization which advocated the overthrow of the Government of Canada by force could be sentenced to 20 years in jail. The section was directed really to the members of the Communist Party. In 1926 the Liberal government sponsored and had passed in the House of Commons a bill repealing section 98. The Senate threw the bill out. They used their veto power much more extensively in those days than we do now. In 1927, 1928, 1929 and 1930 the Liberal government introduced and passed through the House of Commons similar bills, and on each occasion the Senate threw them out. In 1931 Tim Buck, the head of the Communist Party in Canada, Sam Carr and six of their cohorts were prosecuted under section 98, which the House of Commons had voted to repeal on five different occasions, and were sentenced to Kingston Penitentiary for five years. Their sole offence was that they were members of the Communist Party. The letter I wrote to the paper said that there wasn't much difference between the way we treated the Communists in Canada in the 1930s, under section 98, and the way the Tolpuddle Martyrs had been treated in England some 100 years before.

In 1936, upon the return of the Liberal government to power, again a bill passed through the House of Commons, and this time the Senate approved the bill and section 98 was repealed.

To continue with the history of human rights in the Senate, in 1947 there was a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons formed to look into the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms. That committee had as its Senate co-chairman Senator Gouin, and as the House of Commons co-chairman, the Honourable J. L. Ilsley. That committee did not complete its work in 1947. It was reconstituted in 1948. I would like to read a few short extracts from their report. They say, at page 209:

> —your Committee would not be justified in recommending, without a great deal of further study, the adoption of recommendations such as those contained in the submission of the Committee for a Bill of Rights, Toronto.

Further down that page they say:

> In making this report your Committee wishes to state its belief that Canadians enjoy a large measure of civil rights and liberties. That they must be maintained is beyond question. But to attempt to define these rights and liberties in statutory language is a task not to be undertaken lightly.

Later again on this page they say:

> If imperfections appear, are recognized and are remedied progress is made towards full realization of the ideal of general observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all envisaged in the Charter of the United Nations.

That completed the work of that committee. In 1950, a special committee of the Senate was formed, not a joint committee, to look into the same subject of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The chairman of that committee was Senator Arthur Roebuck, the nephew of the English M.P. who had defended the Tolpuddle Martyrs. They held eight meetings and examined 30 witnesses; so they went at their job with considerable vigour. I should like to read one paragraph from their report to give honourable senators its flavour:

• (1700)

> Let the Canadian Ship of State embark on her glorious voyage into the future with the rule of law at the helm, liberty at the mast-head, and beauty, culture and happiness on the prow.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: That sounds like Senator Roebuck, to me. They continue:

> Now the practical method for making these ideals effective is to write the provisions protecting human rights into the Canadian Constitution, so that they may be administered in our Courts, and so that they may become binding and obligatory alike upon individuals and upon government.
> The preferable place for such fundamental law is in the Constitution, which at present in Canada is the British North America Act.

Later on they say:

> The enactment of a National Bill of Rights, however, presents difficulties. In Canada, because of her history and the harmonious association of peoples of different races, language and religion, respect for Provincial rights as they have been defined in the past is essential. No informed person with any sense of responsibility would suggest that the Dominion Parliament forcibly invade the Provincial jurisdiction. Concurrence, therefore, is an essential requisite to constitutional progress.

That is rather interesting in view of what has happened recently with respect to patriating our Constitution. Later on they continue:

> For these reasons, your Committee is of opinion that it would be wise to await the time, which we hope is not far distant, when prospective Dominion-Provincial Conferences will have worked out a method for the control within Canada of the Canadian Constitution, and agreement has been reached as to incorporation in the Constitution of a national Bill of Rights.

Later they say:

> Your committee therefore recommends that, as an interim measure, the Canadian Parliament adopt a Declaration of Human Rights to be strictly limited to its own legislative jurisdiction. Such a Declaration would not invade the Provincial legislative authority, but it would nevertheless cover a very wide field. While such a Declaration would not bind the Canadian Parliament or future Canadian Parliaments, it would serve to guide the Canadian Parliament and the Federal Civil Service. It would have application within all the important matters reserved to the Canadian Parliament in Section 91 and in other sections of the British North America Act. It would apply without limitation within the North West Territories.
> A Canadian Declaration of Human Rights could follow in its general lines the Preamble and certain of the articles of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights subject to the reservations expressed by the Canadian Delegates at the United Nations.

Might I say that with that report I believe the Senate more than redeemed its rather sorry record on human rights in the 1920s when it threw out the repeal of section 98; and, of course, some 10 or 11 years later we had Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights, which stemmed from the recommendations made in that report.

Shortly after I was appointed to the Senate, I became convinced that this subject of human rights—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Tell us how it happened that you were appointed.

Senator Godfrey: I could tell the same story I have been telling for years and get a good laugh.

I recall making a proposal at a meeting of the Liberal caucus, but it did not stir up much interest. However, I was on the committee, which has been referred to as the Goldenberg-Lamontagne committee, which brought in a report on Senate reform. Technically, it was dated November 1980, but actually the substance of the report was finished in September of that year. I should like to read one paragraph from that report. It is headed "Standing Committee on Human Rights", and states:

> We recommend the establishment of a Standing Committee on Human Rights. Even if such rights are embodied in a charter of human rights entrenched in the Constitution, what happens to them in practice will need to be carefully watched, not only to see that the charter is, in fact, effective, but also to suggest remedies for deficiencies that experience may reveal. If there is to be no entrenched charter, the committee might be still more necessary. In any event, it would be its duty to monitor continuously the whole human rights situation; examine and report on the human rights aspects or implications of any legislation brought before Parliament;—

Notice that. To continue:

> —review the annual reports of the Human Rights Commission; and provide a forum for discussion of the whole subject.

After that report had been decided on, but before it became public, I travelled to Canberra, Australia with a delegation from the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments for the Commonwealth Conference of Delegated Legislation Committees which was held at the end of September 1980. The first paper that was delivered to that conference was by Professor Gordon Reid who is one of the leading experts in Australia on this subject. He had experience as an officer serving in the Australian House of Representatives, as Professor of Politics at the University of Western Australia, and as Professor of Political Science at the Australian National University in Canberra. I might say that we are having the second conference in Ottawa, commencing on April 11. The first two days of that conference will be held in this chamber, and I am delighted to say that I have received word that Professor Reid will be attending.

I should like to read from the transcript of the proceedings of that conference. I shall read an extract from Professor Reid's paper, contained in volume 3. Professor Reid says, at page 28:

> In June 1978, the Senate reinforced the above initiative with another. Under the heading "The Scrutiny of Bills" it asked the same Committee on Constitutional and Legal Affairs to examine and report on:
> > The desirability and practicability of referring all legislation introduced into Parliament to a committee of the Senate for the purpose of it examining the legislation, and reporting to the Senate as to whether there are provisions in the Bills . . . which . . . in effect, endanger the liberty of the subject.

Later on he says:

> And the second report, on the scrutiny of bills supported the long standing proposition of early inquiries into the field—for example Lord Hewart, The Committee on Ministers' Powers and the Senate Select Committee on Standing Committees—for:
> > The creation of a parliamentary committee—in this case a joint committee of 8 members—to examine the clauses of all bills introduced into the Parliament, to look for these particular qualities.
> The report continues:
> > Many bills come before Parliament with provisions that: significantly interfere with personal rights and liberties.

Later on he says:

> —logic is not the fuel of political action. The Parliament waited 12 months to receive the outcome of the Executive Government's "careful consideration" of the recommendations. On 22 November 1979 the Senate was told that the Committee's proposals were "unacceptable" to the Executive Government because they would:
> > (1) . . . amount to injecting a new element into the legislative process . . . which . . . will distort, and may lengthen, the present arrangements.
> > (2) . . . there are already ample opportunities for the examination of legislation that comes before the Parliament to ensure that what might be objectionable is revealed.

I might interject at this point and say that that sounds very familiar. To continue:

> The alleged "ample opportunities" for examination of bills were—> > departmental inquiries;
> > the work of parliamentary counsel; the unofficial backbench party committee of parliament; and > > the existing methods of the Senate and the House of Representatives in passing legislation, which motivated the Committee's call for change.
> Finally, the Executive's response stated:

> The Government does not see the need to impose further restrictions on the legislative process. Adequate opportunities are given under existing procedures to ensure protection of personal rights and liberties. The proposal could only serve to frustrate the legislative program without compensating benefits.

Again, that sounds familiar. To continue:

> It is evident that these two reports touched a very sensitive nerve in the Executive's part of the body politic in Australia. In the light of that reaction, we should ask ourselves more frequently: Why is it that the Executive Government in this abundant land is so dogmatic and unyielding in its resistance to proposals that elected personnel should have a greater say, formally, in the shaping of original statute law—

• (1710)

Of course, I can ask the same question here.

Also, I would like to refer to comments made upon the paper by Senator Missen. Senator Missen is from Victoria and is an outstanding senator in Australia. He was the chairman of their Regulations and Ordinance Committee and the man behind this proposal. He is now chairman of the committee that was recently formed. He had this to say:

> I strongly support what Professor Reid has just said in regard to the need to scrutinise legislation in the course of its going through the Parliament. The Senate Standing Committee on Constitutional and Legal Affairs, in recommending that both the delegation of powers and also other provisions in Bills which conflict with civil liberties and the rights of the citizen ought to be dealt with by a committee of the Parliament, had in mind that what is happening at the moment in, I think, all parliaments and particularly in ours, and that is that the debate in the Parliament is on the major issue of Bills. Questions of improper entry and search and some particular provision which is restrictive or changes an onus of proof are matters which are overlooked in the course of a debate in parliament.
> It is all right to say that one achieves the result and that members of parliament ought to look at these things, but they do not do so. Therefore, we made the recommendation for the establishment of a joint committee of the two houses of parliament. As Professor Reid points out in his paper, that recommendation has been rejected by the Government. Professor Reid suggests that we should go on to set up a Senate committee to do these various things. We suggested that it should be a joint committee because most of the Bills start in the lower house of the Parliament. It is invidious for a Senate committee to scrutinise the detailed terms of a Bill which is still awaiting debate in the House of Representatives, perhaps have another go at the Bill when it comes before the Senate and criticise it publicly before it even reaches the House of Representatives where it perhaps will be amended. We, as a committee, regarded the idea of a Senate committee doing this as very much the second best. It ought to be done by a committee of both Houses as both Houses have equal responsibility in the passage of legislation.

Later on Senator Missen said:

> Clearly, many provisions go into a number of Bills through oversight and an inability to attract attention.

I would like to refer now to the Australian Law Reform Commission Report of January 1982. It was not until some time in April that I discovered what had happened to this proposal. It says at page 22 of the report:

> Senate watchdog. Meanwhile, the Australian Senate in the last quarter accepted a motion by the Government Senator, Senator Alan Missen, (Lib, Vic), to establish a Senate committee to scrutinise Federal Bills for breaches of civil liberties. The motion was carried 35:21 after a number of Government Senators crossed the floor to support Senator Missen despite the Government joint parties attitude against the committee. The Opposition Senators supported the proposal, which was opposed by the Federal Attorney-General.
> Just prior to the passage of the resolution establishing the committee, Senator Missen claimed that Bills passed through the Parliament during 1980 had contained at least 79 provisions which appeared to infringe civil rights or to give Ministers and public servants excessive administrative power.

In Australia the government is represented in the Senate by 31 supporters and the opposition by 33. So, if the government received only 21 votes, then at least 10 members of the government switched or did not vote. Before I was aware of what had happened in Australia and what action they had actually taken I wrote a letter to Senator Perrault on February 23, 1982. I apologize for taking up so much of the chamber's time to read most of the letter but I think it is pertinent.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Table it.

Senator Godfrey: No. This letter is familiar to some honourable senators, as copies went to all committee chairmen, including Senator Bonnell, deputy chairmen and Senators Lafond, Flynn, Frith, Roblin and Petten. The letter begins:

> In the speech that Senator Stanbury gave in the Senate last week on Senate Reform, he pointed out that there were areas in which the Senate could increase its effectiveness without any constitutional or legislative change. He made the same point in a speech he delivered in the Senate on October 25, 1978.
> I have, since I was appointed to the Senate, become a firm believer that the main justification for the Senate in its present form is the work of the Senate Standing and Special Committees. I also believe that the work of the Committees could be improved if they were more co-ordinated and if, in certain areas, they pursued common objectives. With that in mind, I have proposed in the past that meetings of Comittee Chairmen should be held from time to time so that these matters could be discussed and, where practicable and desirable, policies established. The only co-ordination at the present time appears to be the allocation of time for meetings of Committees which is supervised by Senator Lafond. This in my opinion is not enough.

I believe there should be discussions at meetings of Committee Chairmen and decisions made after each recess, and from time to time thereafter, as to which, if any, bills which have originated in the House of Commons should be pre-studied by the appropriate Committee under the so-called Hayden formula.

It is interesting to note that the committee of 1947 actually studied the subject matter of a House of Commons private member's bill the purpose of which was to re-institute section 98, which means that the so-called Hayden formula actually dates back to that year. My letter continues:

Before doing so, there should be general agreement as to the type of bills that should be pre-studied, and the actual process that should be followed to originate and carry out a pre-study. Recent discussions in a Committee on this subject revealed both unfamiliarity with the process and a wide divergence of views amongst Senators as to when it should be used. While I have been a member of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee for the last couple of years, which committee is constantly pre-studying bills, I am only generally familiar with the reasons for but not the details of the process by which a decision is made by it to pre-study a bill. All I know is that the Chairman announces to the Committee that there will be a pre-study of a certain bill and that it always appears to me to make sense to do so. Such pre-study seems to me to be more effective in achieving desirable amendments to bills than waiting until a bill formally reaches the Senate. A briefing of Committee Chairmen on the whole question of pre-studying of bills by Senator Hayden, and a discussion of the subject, would in my opinion be very helpful.

I would point out that I gave a short speech on this very subject last week in which I indicated that if a bill is urgent and has to pass the Senate in short order we should adopt the pre-study route, so that it can be considered by a Senate committee before it actually reaches the Senate. Even yesterday when Senator Argue was talking about a bill, he completely overlooked the possibility that it might be pre-studied by the Senate committee where even amendments could be recommended. Senator Argue confined his remarks to the bill's being referred to the House of Commons committee, saying that amendments would be proposed before that committee, thus completely overlooking a possible role for the Senate in suggesting amendments. I come back to my letter:

One area in which the Senate has been criticized is whether or not it is properly performing its function to represent the regions. I can recall long discussions on this subject in the Senate Committee on the Constitution, chaired by Senator Stanbury, in 1978. One of the conclusions we reached informally was that the Senate Committees should all adopt a policy that whenever a bill or a subject was being considered that affected Provinces, the Provincial Governments always be asked if they wished to make representations to the Committee. This again is an area which should be discussed by Committee Chairmen and a policy adopted.

Honourable senators, I would interject at this point that during the meeting to which I am referring, the committee chairmen did not have time to get around to this letter except to deal with one small point. So, to keep this subject alive, I proposed a motion in June. Previous to that, Senator Frith co-operated in trying to arrange another meeting of committee chairmen, but it had to be postponed. So it was obvious that we were not going to meet again until the fall. I therefore proposed this motion on June 22:

● (1720)

That whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a Committee of the Senate in which a province or provinces have a special interest, then as a general policy, the government of such province or provinces where practicable, shall be asked by the Committee as to whether or not they wish to make written and/or verbal representations to the Committee, and any province that replies in the affirmative shall be given a reasonable opportunity to do so.

I need not remind honourable senators that there had been previously considerable resistance from some committee chairmen to follow what I proposed in that motion, although everyone agrees that one of the main functions of the Senate is that we should represent the regions. However, to complete the picture, the committee chairmen did meet in the fall and because there then seemed to be general acceptance of that principle by the committee chairmen I withdrew that motion as being unnecessary.

That, honourable senators, is a typical example of how we can improve the function and operation of the Senate without having to change its structure.

The question of human rights is an area in which the Senate should act as a watchdog with respect to proposed legislation. I agreed with something that the Honourable Otto Lang said in a letter to me, and I referred to that in a speech I gave on the Constitution on December 3, 1981. Let me quote what Mr. Lang said:

As I observed government in action I came to conclude that in far too many cases simple neglect or too little attention would leave an individual deprived of rights where a legislature really did not intend and would not want to support that result.

In essence, he is saying exactly what I quoted Senator Missen as having said.

I go on in my letter to say:

Certain researchers from the Library of Parliament could assist the work of Committees generally by being assigned the task of studying all bills with a view to seeing whether there is a specific regional interest or human rights question involved, and alerting the appropriate Committee Chairman.

As I pointed out, I was not aware of the disposition and what action had been taken in Australia when I wrote that. When I did become aware of it, I proposed specific action, which I will refer to later.

Continuing my letter:

> As Co-chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, I have a particular interest in the subject of Regulations. In our Committee Report on reform of the process by which regulations are enacted, dated July 17, 1980, we made the following observations:
> "The confining of subordinate law to its proper sphere, and the regularisation of its use will be impossible of accomplishment if Parliament continues in the habit of giving larger and vaguer grants of law making power to the executive in skeletal statutes many of which are devoid of any clear enunciation of policy."

Later we said:

> "Insufficient attention is paid to enabling clauses in Bills before Parliament. They should be the subject of searching scrutiny during the Committee stage. The Regulatory Review Committee is well placed to undertake such scrutiny as it sees week by week the consequences of the powers so readily granted by Parliament in the past. Your Committee, therefore, further recommends that the Regulatory Review Committee be charged with the duty and responsibility of examining and reporting upon all powers in Bills to make subordinate law or to issue, make or establish other instruments. Its reports should be made to the appropriate Standing Committees of the Houses having the committee stages of the Bills."
> The whole subject of Parliamentary Reform and the consideration of these recommendations is under active consideration by the Hon. Yvon Pinard at the present time. Our Committee, however, decided not to wait for this lengthy process to be concluded. We have instructed our Committee Counsel to consider in all new bills the enabling clauses which permit the enactment of regulations. Where he has critical comments with respect to same, they are passed on to the Chairman of the Committee which is, or will be, considering the bill. This is an example of the practical implementation of a proposed reform without waiting for formal authorization. A policy on the enabling clauses of a bill is another area which could be fruitfully discussed by Committee Chairmen.

I might just comment at this point that members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will remember that we were considering in that committee a bill implementing an international tax treaty which was the fifth such bill that had been presented to the Senate. Previous to that four had already been passed, commencing in 1975, and all had contained a most objectionable clause with respect to disallowance of motions, which nobody had noticed. It had been completely overlooked. Our committee drew that to the attention of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and they proposed an amendment to the bill being considered.

We then discovered that the same type of objectionable clause was contained in an energy bill—one of the famous bills in the omnibus bill that involved the ringing of the bells.

If I may, I will just refer to a letter in which I drew that to Mr. Lalonde's attention. The letter is dated March 31, 1982, and it reads as follows:

> I have today signed a letter as Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments re the above. In that letter it is stated, "We note also that the proposed section 65.27 requires disallowance by both Houses before an Order to which it relates is to 'stand revoked'. The Committee stands firmly by its recommendation that either House should be able to effect disallowance."

And I go on, later in the letter, to say:

> Might I suggest that similar amendments should be made to your Bill?

In reply to that letter Mr. Lalonde sent me a letter dated May 21, 1982. To say that I was surprised at his letter is putting it rather mildly. Perhaps I had better read the letter I wrote to Mr. Lalonde on May 27 in answer to his. I said:

> I have received your letter of May 21 in which you conclude that you "do not at this time see any need to put forward amendments to the proposed negative resolution procedures set out in the energy legislation." I was somewhat surprised, to put it mildly, in view of the fact that on May 17 you gave notice of motion to amend the clauses of Bill C-102 dealing with the negative resolutions in a manner which substantially met the objections in principle raised by the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce when considering Bill S-24.
> May I say that I prefer the reasonable and sensible approach of your adviser who drafted the notice of motion of May 17 to the irrelevant arguments of the adviser who drafted your letter of May 21.

Honourable senators, I have a great deal of admiration and respect for Mr. Lalonde. He would not propose amendments to a bill without considering them personally. However, I am certain that in a busy minister's schedule there are certain occasions when he does not have the actual time to read all of the letters he signs. Obviously, some bureaucrat in his department, without consulting Mr. Lalonde in any way, decided to write that letter of May 21 rejecting the suggestions that had been made by our committee. Unfortunately, Mr. Lalonde did not read that letter but simply signed it. He did so four days after he had already proposed the amendments we wanted. The point that is relevant, I think, is that it was not Mr. Lalonde who wrote that letter; it was somebody in his department.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: He signed it, though.

Senator Godfrey: Yes, he signed it and he has to bear some responsibility for signing it. I am sure, however, that had he known what that letter contained he would not have signed it just four days after the position he took in proposing the amendments on May 17.

I raise the point only to indicate that it is relevant to say that ministers are not necessarily making these decisions when they apparently turn down recommendations from Senate committees. These rejections are often made by some bureaucrat in the department, and I will have another example of that later.

Honourable senators, it is obvious that I will be quite a long while yet. If honourable senators would prefer, I could stop now and continue tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Choose the best point at which it is convenient for you to break.

Senator Godfrey: I believe this is actually a good point at which to break off, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment, Senator Bonnell, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, has asked me to announce that the committee will be meeting tomorrow at 9:15 a.m. to consider Bill C-131, recently referred to that committee. The Minister of National Health and Welfare will be appearing before the committee then.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I hope that the chairman of the committee has arranged to have the staff telephone the members of the committee this evening—certainly those who are not in the chamber now; otherwise they may not receive notice until it is too late. If that could be arranged, that would be helpful.

Senator Frith: Yes, that can be arranged.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if the deputy leader can give us an indication as to what he expects will be before the Senate tomorrow afternoon. Will there be any bills sent over from the House of Commons, or will we be dealing strictly with domestic items?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not anticipate any bills coming over from the other place tomorrow. They will be proceeding tomorrow with the third reading of Bill C-132, with a vote planned to take place at 6 p.m. That is the only legislation they will deal with this week, to my knowledge.

With respect to other business before the Senate tomorrow, if the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science reports Bill C-131, we shall give further consideration to that bill. We shall also have the continuation of the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey.

There is a possibility that Senator Murray will proceed with the consideration of the Fourth Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages, but I believe he is required to be out of town tomorrow and may not be able to proceed here.

In summary, honourable senators, that means that there is the possibility of further consideration of Bill C-131, Question Period, and further debate on Senator Godfrey's motion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): If the committee reports Bill C-131 tomorrow afternoon, is it your intention to give it third reading tomorrow?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: Is it not sufficient to have third reading on Tuesday next?

Senator Frith: My information, honourable senators, is that it would be possible to deal with it and meet the printing exigencies regarding cheques by Monday, February 14, but if third reading can be given to the bill tomorrow that will be preferable. However, it is not something that must be done tomorrow in the sense that any processes will start on that day or on Friday.

The information I have from the officials in the department is that it would be helpful if they knew the bill was going to receive third reading and Royal Assent by Monday. That being the case, we would prefer third reading on Thursday, but we can consider that further tomorrow because we will need leave of the Senate if the committee does report the bill to the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Another problem of printing cheques.

RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

NOTICE OF JOINT COMMITTEE MEETING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I remind the members of the Joint Committee on the Restaurant of Parliament that there will be a short meeting in my quarters immediately after the Senate adjourns today.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 10, 1983

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 10, 1983

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to which was referred Bill C-131, intituled "An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act (No. 2)", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, February 9, 1983, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Chairman

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, rule 78(4) states:

> When a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

I believe that Senator Everett will be asking for leave to move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

If the Senate agrees to that, there is agreement that it be placed on the order paper after Order No. 2, which is the second reading of the private bill standing in the name of Senator Asselin.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We are prepared to give leave, but I should like to add a word or two to what the deputy leader has said.

It would be useful if the bill were to receive Royal Assent today, but I understand the Commons does not like the idea of being disturbed when there is an order for allocation of time—

Senator Frith: Time allocation.

Senator Flynn: Yes, time allocation—closure in disguise.

Therefore, even if we dispose of third reading today, the bill will not receive Royal Assent today. We could, of course, sit tomorrow, but I do not really think that is necessary.

I wanted to draw this fact to the attention of the Senate because of what I said last week in regard to changing the procedure surrounding Royal Assent. Unless we are determined to maintain a very impressive ceremony, problems such as the one that faces us now should lead senators to consider seriously my suggestion of a simplified procedure.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have two comments to make on what the Leader of the Opposition has said.

First, we are finding that the new rules in the other place affect our proceedings on Royal Assent. For example, if we were to have third reading of this bill today, we would normally adjourn until Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock and have Royal Assent at 9.45, but the other place does not now sit in the evenings, and, therefore, we will have to sit on Tuesday afternoon if we are to have Royal Assent, which would accommodate the legislative and administrative program relating to this bill.

For that reason, honourable senators, I take the opportunity—and I will say a little more about this when the motion is presented—to advise honourable senators that I will, in a few moments, be moving that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The members of committees can figure out why the sitting will be at 4 o'clock. We want to avoid disturbing committee meetings planned on the assumption that we would be sitting at 8 o'clock. I shall say a word or two more about that later.

I agree with the other point raised by Senator Flynn, and I am studying the question, as he requested. We will be conferring with him when we have studied some of the material. I agree that problems respecting Royal Assent often turn on the ability of the other place to send over a delegation, as is illustrated here. So we should consider whether it is really necessary to have Royal Assent, in all cases, take place in the present formal way rather than just on special occasions.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, as to the last point about Royal Assent, I must say that after our discussion I asked the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament to prepare a paper on the whole subject, going back into the history and how this is done in the United Kingdom. At that time I was told this would take about three weeks.

So, we will have a double check—the research paper against what Senator Frith reports.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Is this a point of privilege?

Senator Frith: Yes, and the point of privilege turns on the word "check". I am always glad to have Senator Godfrey vet anything we do in this chamber. This is because we know what a fine-meshed sieve he is, and how careful he is about matters of this kind. He will recall that when this was first raised I invited all honourable senators to participate in the research and discussion, and to give us the benefit of their views on whether or not we should change this procedure.

● (1410)

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I might say that I have no confidence in my own research ability. With regard to sitting at 4 o'clock, I believe there is a committee meeting at that time. If the sole purpose of our meeting at 4 o'clock is for Royal Assent, why would we not meet at 5.30 or 5.45? I know that I have two committee meetings that afternoon.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am quite happy to deal with the matter now rather than at the time the motion is put, and the simple and shortest answer to Senator Godfrey's question is that we are not meeting at 4 o'clock for the sole purpose of Royal Assent.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 15, 1983, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should explain, as the second instalment of what I way saying earlier, that on Tuesday the following committees will be meeting: the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance at 1.30 p.m.; the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs at 1.45 p.m.; the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce at 2 p.m.; the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline at 3 p.m.; and the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs at 3.45 p.m.

For the reasons I have already explained, the Senate will sit at 4 p.m. on Tuesday. We shall have Question Period either at that time or later, but the piece of legislation that we should like to start with is Bill C-132. It is expected that that measure will receive third reading by order of the other place at 5.45 p.m. today. As Senator Flynn has pointed out, we cannot have Royal Assent tonight because at 5.45 the bell will ring for 15 minutes and the House does not want to interrupt the amount of time allowed for the debate pursuant to the time allocation resolution. So my suggestion is that we not only sit at 4 o'clock to accommodate these committees, but that we proceed at 4 o'clock, if we can, with second reading of Bill C-132, led off by a government speaker, and proceed with it as we have with Bill C-131.

● (1415)

Hon. Eric Cook: Which bill are you talking about?

Senator Frith: The third of the bills dealing with the six-and-five program. We have passed Bill C-133, and Bill C-131 is on the order paper for third reading today. Bill C-132 deals with family allowances.

Hon. C. William Doody: They have dealt with the old age pensioners, and now for the widows and orphans!

Senator Frith: Thank you, Senator Doody, for spicing up this otherwise dull intervention.

There is one other thing we should do, and that is give the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee the power to meet while the Senate is sitting. I shall ask for leave to revert to motions later in the day when I have the motion in writing.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, would the Deputy Leader of the Government inform us as to whether it is the intention of the house to sit on Tuesday evening next week, as is usual?

Senator Frith: If we have not completed our business by 6 o'clock, then we shall sit on Tuesday evening, beginning at 8 o'clock, in accordance with the rules. I thank Senator Manning for his question because it may have an effect on the attendance of some honourable senators.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA GRAIN ACT

TABLING OF SECTION 15(2) ORDER

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I should explain that I am asking a question in my capacity as Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. A similar question will be asked in the House of Commons.

Ordinarily when our committee runs into some irregularities of any kind we have reported to both houses of Parliament only to find that nothing ever happens. It used to be that I would make a motion approving the report, give a little speech, Senator Frith would adjourn the debate, and that would be it. So I have decided, in my quest for improving and reforming procedures as well as other things in Parliament, that I am going to take a new line in some cases. Instead of reporting to the house, I am going to ask questions which will, at least, involve an answer, which we do not get when the committee makes a report. And I hope that Senator Frith will not rule me out of order.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I do not have that power.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You can try.

Senator Godfrey: Section 15(6) of the Canada Grain Act requires the laying before Parliament of an order made under section 15(2) within 15 days of the making of the order. Under that section an order was made on June 23, 1982, and it should have been laid before both houses of Parliament by July 8, 1982.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Where is it?

Senator Godfrey: That is a good question and the one I am about to ask.

First, however, we wrote a letter to the Department of Agriculture on September 20 inquiring as to the whereabouts of this order. The letter reads in part:

> As your Minister is responsible for the administration of the Act, I will appreciate confirmation of the dates on which the referenced amendment was tabled in the Senate and the House of Commons.

● (1420)

We received a reply on December 29, which reads:

> Thank you for your letter—
> Due to an oversight on our part the referenced Order was not tabled.
> We have now prepared the necessary documentation for Mr. Whelan's signature and we expect that the Order will be tabled when Parliament resumes sitting in mid-January 1983.

Honourable senators, it still has not been tabled in the Senate. My question to the Leader of the Government is: When will the government obey the requirements of the act and table that order?

Senator Flynn: It is above the law.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Godfrey understands that I will have to take that question as notice. I will find out what has happened and try to get an immediate response that would appear to be in compliance with the rules that have been set down.

Senator Flynn: "Appear" is the right word.

Senator Olson: Yes, that is right, senator.

Senator Godfrey has attempted to demonstrate that the rules have not been complied with to date, and I accept that. I think, however, that Senator Godfrey could enhance his own position in getting the answers that he wants to the other questions by putting them now. I thought he said that this is the first of some questions he wants to ask. I presumed—perhaps I should not make those presumptions—that he had a list of other requirements that had not been met completely. If that is so, it would expedite matters if he could let me have the whole list. I will then try to answer them from time to time, since it would seem that, rather than write letters, the joint chairmen will ask questions.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should explain that we decided to follow this procedure only at a committee meeting this morning, which adjourned at a quarter to one.

We have no other questions to ask at this time. I simply wanted to give the warning that this is the first of what may be a number of questions, in cases where we think it appropriate. I assure the honourable senator that, in the future, we will endeavour to give him advance notice of the questions.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like to raise a point of order arising out of the exchange between Senator Godfrey and the government leader in the Senate.

A committee has only the authority given to it by this house, plus any added authority that may be contained in our rules. It has that authority, and that only. If honourable senators listened to the exchange carefully, they will understand that an attempt is being made by the committee to follow a practice different from that of reporting to this house and awaiting a decision of this house, as it is authorized to do by its terms of reference. Allowing a committee to adopt a procedure that will circumvent the reporting to the house, and the consideration by the house of that report, is something that surely must be looked at rather carefully.

It is, of course, quite proper for an individual senator to ask any question he wishes, provided it is otherwise in order. The points that the senator wishes to address may well be dealt with in that way, but he cannot do it as the chairman of the committee. It may be quite proper to ask a question about a certain order or regulation. I have no objection whatever to that. I do, however, raise this question.

I hope the Senate will consider whether the committee is, in fact, trying to avoid reporting to the house and having its decisions or recommendations dealt with by the house, and if that committee is endeavouring to substitute some other procedure that its members, in their wisdom, have seen fit to adopt without the Senate's having decided that it is a proper procedure.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to make several comments on what Senator McIlraith has just said. The primary effort of our committee is to avoid reporting to this house. We negotiate by talking and writing letters to the ministers and their officials. We are successful in that endeavour, in a great number of cases.

Today I rose and said that I was reporting as chairman of the committee. I will not be doing that in future. I am certainly not officially asking the question on behalf of the committee. I am, in an informal way, showing my interest. I will allay the fears of Senator McIlraith by saying that, from now on, when I rise everyone will be aware that I am asking questions on my own behalf. Although I am a joint chairman of the committee, I am not asking those questions on behalf of the committee, but just because of my interest in the matter considered by the committee.

Honourable senators, I am trying to get at a practical solution to a problem. I must say it is rather interesting that, whenever a change is proposed in the Senate, someone gets up to complain that the change is not in accordance with the rules.

In any event, the honourable senator and this house may rest assured that I will bear in mind everything he has said so that, in future, I will so frame my questions that no technical objection can be made to the way I proceed.

• (1425)

Senator McIlraith: The real point is whether you have the right to change the practice or whether the Senate has the right. With respect, I think that that power belongs to the Senate.

SPORT

REGULATION—FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I would like to put a question to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. It is actually a continuation of a question asked yesterday by my colleague, Senator Thompson.

Hon. Martial Asselin: About boxing?

Senator Deschatelets: My question relates to the policy and philosophy the Minister has in mind for regulating sports.

I do not really expect a reply today. However, could the Minister, in due time, explain exactly what the Minister's jurisdiction is regarding the regulation of amateur and professional sport in Canada? The Minister is aware that there are provincially-run commissions in several provinces. In Quebec, for instance, the Néron Commission has been operating for at least two or three years, and it has a very substantial budget. I think we ought to know how the Minister intends to co-operate with provinces that have commissions to regulate amateur and professional sport in Canada, when both levels of government have jurisdiction—I think that is the case—meaning that both the provinces and the Federal Government have jurisdiction over sport.

If that is indeed the case, does the Minister intend to meet with the provinces with a view to setting national standards? If so, I wonder why this has not been done before, since the Minister was appointed, or does he intend to have a meeting with the provincial ministers within the near future?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Deschatelets for his question.

When I assumed responsibility as Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, one of my first meetings was with the provincial ministers responsible for recreation and sport. The meeting was held in the great city of Saskatoon, and it was a good meeting. One of the questions raised was the matter of ring safety.

Shortly before the meeting a very tragic incident had occurred in a boxing ring, of which I am sure Senator Deschatelets is aware, and concern was expressed that in the near future a similar tragedy might occur in Canada due to the fact that not all of the provinces have competent and able boxing commissions. Of course there are good boxing commissions in Canada, one being in the province of Quebec. However, the situation in Canada is that certain provinces do not have boxing commissions. We have had incidents where participants in boxing contests, some of whom have had very little ring experience, have suffered serious physical damage by fighting in jurisdictions where no controls of any kind exist. In my view, and in the view of the provincial ministers, that situation should not continue.

• (1430)

Jurisdiction over boxing, for example, is clearly provincial. It is not within the federal jurisdiction. The position I have stated, as minister, is that we would like to help them in their efforts to ensure the highest standards of ring safety, and I have asked what we can do to help.

We have proceeded on that basis with a very constructive dialogue with the provinces. We are trying to evolve a system by which the federal government can be helpful, can assist, can promote the process of information-sharing from coast to coast.

The advent of the computer and data terminals offers a great opportunity for the provinces to share in information of all sorts—for example, information with respect to boxers. If, for instance, a bout is held in British Columbia, or in Manitoba, and there is a co-operative arrangement involving the federal and provincial governments, that information can be provided to the boxing commissions in the other provinces. Thus, if a promoter signs a fighter to a bout in a particular province, at least that fighter's record will be well known in the province and the data will be easily accessible to the boxing commission of the province because of that computer access.

Senator Deschatelets: And it will be accurate?

Senator Perrault: Yes, it will be as accurate as human beings can make it in programming these computers.

The plan I made reference to yesterday involves a good degree of working co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. It is not an attempt by the federal government to usurp any power. It is an attempt, however, to be as helpful as possible within our jurisdictional limitations.

NATIONAL UNITY

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on December 7, 1982, concerning public opinion polls being conducted by one or more departments of government on the question of western alienation.

The answer, which is quite brief, is simply that the Canadian Unity Information Office (CUIO) regularly subscribes to surveys in western Canada in order to determine in a systematic, accurate and on-going fashion what issues most preoccupy western Canadians.

Results of these surveys are used by the CUIO and other government departments as background information to enhance the development of future policies, strategies and activities.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT

BILL C-672, TO CHANGE THE NAME OF THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF DAUPHIN—THIRD READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the third reading of Bill C-672, to change the name of the electoral district of Dauphin.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Flynn asked me to attempt to find out whether or not the Department of Justice intends to lodge an appeal from the judgment of the Federal Court relating to the question of changing returning officers when a riding's name has been changed, with no other changes being made.

I do not have that information for the Senate today, but I will take his question as notice, as if it had been put during Question Period, and will respond to it in due course.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

POLYVENTREPRISE LTÉE—SECOND READING

Hon. Martial Asselin moved the second reading of Bill S-34, to revive Polyventreprise Ltée and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

The said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to revive Polyventreprise Ltée, which has its chief place of business in the City of Quebec. This company was federally incorporated by letters patent issued on July 20, 1970.

Through inadvertence, the company failed to file the annual returns that all companies are required to submit under the Canada Corporations Act. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs sent notices to the company that it would be dissolved if the returns were not filed. This default on the part of the company was never corrected and the company was accordingly dissolved by a notice in the Canada Gazette on December 4, 1976.

The owners of the company were unaware of the company's dissolution and continued to operate the company as if it had not been dissolved.

The proposed bill would revive the company with retroactive effect to the date on which it was dissolved. This would serve to validate all transactions by the company during the time that it had no legal existence. It will have tremendous legal consequences, because meanwhile, any transactions the company carried out may be invalidated at any time by the courts, because legally, the company no longer exists. Thus, the aim of this Bill would also be to make legal any commercial transactions carried out by the company during the time it was dissolved.

There is also an additional clause to provide for the continuance of the company under the new Canada Business Corporations Act. Under that Act, every company incorporated under the earlier Canada Corporations Act was required to apply for continuance under the new Act prior to December 15, 1980. The additional clause would, in effect, extend that deadline by allowing the company to be continued under the Canada Business Corporations Act within three months after the coming into force of this bill.

This bill, honourable senators, is similar to other bills introduced in the Senate and passed by Parliament in the present session. I am thinking, for instance, of a Bill that was introduced by Senator Leblanc. I raised several objections at the time, because after considering the Bill and hearing witnesses in committee, we found that there had been considerable negligence on the part of the president of the company, who had neglected to apply for continuance and submit the required reports to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I also remember that the president of the company was then living in Germany. He had received at least five notices from the Department to which he did not bother to reply. He actually refused to reply, and that is why a Bill was proposed by other administrators in order to revive the company.

The Bill we are considering today will allow the company to be revived administratively and to be continued under the new Canada Business Corporations Act.

Honourable senators, if the Senate agrees to adopt the second reading stage of this Bill, I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we support the motion for second reading and referral of this bill to the appropriate Senate committee for consideration.

I also congratulate Senator Asselin for his underlining the fact that, as time goes by, it will be less and less likely that we will be receiving these kinds of petitions because of the fact that the new legislation allows what we are now doing by legislative act to be done by administrative act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this Bill be read the third time?

Senator Asselin moved that the Bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-131, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act (No. 2).

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, at the outset allow me to say that, for me, there are some positive aspects to this bill.

The first is that the minister responsible for this legislation appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. I personally have deep respect for her kindness of heart and intelligence. I believe that over the years she has demonstrated her conviction that those who are at the bottom of the economic scale must be helped. I held back from making a judgment as to how I would vote on this bill until I had had an opportunity to hear the explanations the minister gave to the committee this morning.

The second positive aspect is that there is a threshold provision with respect to those whose income is below a certain level. The GIS is going to be indexed. I feel that that is an important aspect. I only regret that there has not been consistency in the three bills which are designed to fight inflation.

Unfortunately, I was not present when Senator Bosa presented the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science last week. However, from reading Hansard, I see that he did so thoroughly and ably. However, there is one matter I wish to draw attention to. It is that he identified me as being the sponsor of the first recommendation; whereas, in fact, I was the sponsor of the second recommendation, which asked that there be a threshold. I believe strongly in that principle and was delighted to hear that, when she appeared before the committee, the minister emphasized that principle and had put it into practice in this legislation. I urged her to attempt to have on her colleague, the Honourable Herb Gray, the same stimulating effect as she had had on me, so that he might place a threshold provision in the other legislation.

The third aspect which has inclined me towards a positive approach is that the greatest beneficial effect of this legislation, not only for senior citizens but for Canadians in general, is to bring down inflation. For our senior citizens, that is the crux of the dilemma they are facing—the inflation rate trend that has persisted over the past several years.

It takes a great deal of courage for this government, for individual members of Parliament in the other place, and for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take this drastic step in an attempt to show the country that they are going to include in the battle against inflation this large group of senior citizens. The government is not asking them to be part of that battle, but is telling them that they are going to be part of the large army of Canadians who will make a great sacrifice in an attempt to bring down inflation.

From questions put by Senator Bosa, I was pleasantly surprised to hear that the six-and-five may not be the cut-off point for pensioners. I am sure that all of us will take heart from that.

I was pleased to hear the minister explain this morning that, from the point of view of cash flow into the government, this measure will not have an anti-inflationary effect, but will have psychological effect that will be evident across the country.

● (1450)

I note that reference was made to two millionaires in this chamber. There are others outside—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Who is the other one?

Senator Thompson: They don't want me to mention their names, but they recognize the seriousness of intent of the government with regard to this matter.

My real concern was with the threshold requirements. I apologize to Senator Everett. I said to him on Tuesday night that it looked as though the Star writer, Robert Jackson, had erred in his statement; but actually, as I re-read that statement, together with that of Senator Everett, I saw that they were agreeing with each other, so that neither had erred.

When questioning the minister I dealt with those who live just above the poverty line and who do not get the GIS. Those who earn an extra $1,000 or so above that level are in a grey area, and are going to suffer greatly. I asked the minister how many there are in that group earning up to $1,000 above the level at which they are excluded from the GIS. I stand to be corrected, but my understanding of what she said was that there are 160,000 in that grey area. They would be making, as Senator Everett pointed out, roughly $15,160 for a married couple with one spouse not on pension; $9,360 for a married couple where both are on pension; and $6,075 for a single person. Honourable senators, I do not intend to wax melodramatic on this, because I know that there is not a senator in this chamber who is unaware that if he had to live in a city on $6,075 a year he would be awfully hard pressed to survive.

When the government says how serious it is about the war on inflation, I cannot help being deeply worried at the idea that the government, in focusing on these 160,000 people just above the GIS, is making an example of victims of inflation, rather than focusing on the healthy citizens with a good income who can survive if their income is slightly reduced—and I put myself in that latter category, as well as every senator in this chamber.

I think the threshold is too low, and on the basis of statements the minister has made in the past, I know that the minister herself recognizes that too many pensions are too low. The minister has fought hard to try to get the private sector and government to work at the inequities that exist across Canada in the field of pensions. In her green paper on this subject the minister recognizes just how tough it is for the older person, living on or below the poverty line.

I asked both the minister and her director general what their definition of the poverty line is. There are several, it appears. There is the definition of the National Welfare Council; there is the definition produced by the group of bishops in Montreal, and others; and, certainly, the threshold level fixed at $15,160 for a married couple and $6,075 for a single person in the cities is unfortunately at the poverty line. In fact, the National Welfare Council has said that it is $500 below for a single person. I find it difficult to think of suggesting that we pick a person living at $500 below the poverty line and say to him, "Look, we are going to enroll you in the battle against the devastations of inflation." Such a person is under restraint from the point of view of his spending. He is under restraint to a very severe extent. I do not think we can honestly say that he is contributing to inflation with the meagre amount he has to live on.

The minister, who is an honest person, admitted that in the context of bringing down inflation this measure, apart from its psychological aspect, is not having any effect. Mind you, I do not want in any way to diminish the need for a psychological effect across Canada, but if we really want to have a dramatic psychological effect, I suggest that we go to such people as blind pensioners, saying to them that they have to tighten their belts more. Thank God, however, we have more humanity, as Liberals and as a government, than to go that far. Indeed, we have gone too far already. I would therefore like to see a higher threshold. Frankly, I cannot but feel that this is an awfully blunt way to ask people across Canada, with their varying incomes, to make a sacrifice.

[Senator Thompson.]

Senator Tremblay made a telling point in this regard. He said that he receives the old age pension. With his usual generous spirit, he said that he will gladly sacrifice the extra $4 to help in the fight against inflation. But he added, "I am concerned about persons in that grey area who just manage to keep going. Should they have the same amount taken from them as is taken from me?"

I agree that that is iniquitous. I asked the minister about using the income tax approach, and she said it was too involved. She said the supplement based on indexing is the right approach. I would have liked to see this tightening done through the income tax act, as was done with regard to children's allowance, because one hopes that income tax is more progressive than the method used in this particular measure.

I helped in years past in promoting a number of projects, such as medical insurance and other measures that have been brought in by the Liberals. I have always liked the universality aspect of them. I always think that to emphasize a point it is not a bad idea to refer to its effect on a particular individual. I hope you will excuse me if I speak about the universality aspect of these measures from the point of view of someone for whose old age pension I am trustee. He is a wonderful character. He is a farm labourer who has worked most of his life on farms in the area where I have a farm. My wife and I were driving to our farm one evening and noticed lights on in an old house we have there. We found that Charlie had moved in as a squatter, with a sense of independence and also the conviction that it was going to be his home from then on. I learned from the community that he was nearing the age when he could get a pension. I recall talking to him about that. He said, "I don't go for any kind of welfare. My welfare is these"—and he held his arms up and proudly displayed a large pair of biceps. I assured him that a pension was his right, that some of the wealthiest people in Canada were getting the pension—although one hoped their income tax took it from them. I pointed out that it was something that he had earned over many years as a farm labourer. For a period of his life prior to moving to that house, he slept in a barn. I explained to him about the universality of the pension, that there would not be questioning by social workers for him to get the pension. Charlie does not pay rent, and he now lives in the country with the dignity he deserves and without the nagging fear of poverty, because of the pension and the GIS he receives. Having seen the effect on Charlie of the universality aspect, I understand exactly Senator Croll's concern about the Liberal government tampering with that universality.

● (1500)

With regard to the GIS, some may feel it dilutes universality, for it is a kind of means test, although of a humane kind, without there being visits by social workers and others. A form is used to fill out how much income one receives, in order to assess how much pension one will get. However, it seems to me that there is a danger that its wider application might be a first move towards diluting the universality aspect of our social legislation. Perhaps we have to examine the concept of universality more closely, but I would hope that in this time of economic difficulty we will not lose sight of the advantages of universality to soothe a certain reactionary mood that may exist in the country. I hope that the government and, indeed, all Canadians are proud of our social legislation, which is among the best in the world, and that we will not tinker with it or change drastically some of the basic principles that exist in medicare and other areas.

Most honourable senators will recognize that I have struggled with the question of how I will vote on this bill. I have tried to examine the legislation carefully. Yesterday I left the chamber hoping that I would be convinced by the minister, who I know is a convincing and humane person. However, I regret that in accordance with my conscience I have to vote against my party and against the government, because solely for a psychological effect, I cannot see how we, as a party or as a government, can take money, even though it is not much, from those in this grey area, those $9,000 and $6,000 income persons, who are struggling to survive. We should set an example by trying to protect that group that is struggling so hard to survive, and we should direct our attention to people such as ourselves who are able and willing to tighten our belts. For that reason, I cannot vote in favour of this legislation.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I listened carefully to what Senator Thompson had to say, and I had thought that his conclusion would be contrary to his saying that he could not vote for this bill. I also listened to the minister this morning and I thought that the senator received satisfactory replies to his questions.

While I had problems concerning the bill that was before us earlier relating to public service pensioners, I find that this bill fulfils my philosophy of looking after people from the point of view of their need. I understand that one might have some qualms about this legislation, and might say that the negative psychological effect that was apparent in this country last June or July, or perhaps a year ago, is probably disappearing and that we should not now be asking senior citizens to make a financial contribution from their pensions. However, the fact of the matter is that inflation was reduced considerably in the last three months of 1982, and it is projected that inflation is now at the level of approximately 6 per cent. Therefore, the effect, in dollars, may not even be the 50 cents mentioned by Senator Thompson, and, of course, it will be much less than what Senator Phillips mentioned yesterday.

I rise to say that I support this bill. Naturally, everyone would like to see our economy in such a state that this kind of legislation would not be required; but we cannot live in dreamland. It is a fact of life that for at least the last year and a half inflation has been the number one problem not only in Canada but in many countries of the industrialized western world.

There is, however, a point that bothers me, and I take advantage of this debate to make this point. I am concerned about the problem of single persons, mostly women, who are living below the poverty line in Canada. The information I have is that there are 750,000 single persons over the age of 65 living below the poverty line, and that poverty line figure has now been determined by the Department of National Health and Welfare to be $6,300 a year. I am told that it would require in the next budget the sum of $250 million merely to bring those people to the level of the poverty line. It is my hope that all honourable senators, members of Parliament, and people in all walks of life will give serious consideration to this matter. We understand that the Minister of Finance is at present discussing the possibility—it has been suggested to him even by private corporations—of increasing the deficit to $30 billion. I accept the fact that there are pros and cons with regard to that, and there always will be. However, at a time when we are talking about the difference between $25 billion and $30 billion, I would hope that no one in government, no one in a position of decision making, would hesitate to add $250 million to a $25 billion or $30 billion deficit with a view to bringing at least some comfort, some hope, to those 750,000 people who are now living in Canada below the poverty line.

• (1510)

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, obviously this bill has engendered a great deal of emotion in a number of participants in this debate. Of course, it is difficult when the government introduces a bill that purports to restrain pensions, because very often the most defenceless people in our society are those who receive pensions. But when we take a look at this bill, it is very easy to overlook the fact that, while it has to be part of a policy of restraint, nonetheless it does try to do as little damage as possible while maintaining and not departing from the policy of restraint.

I wonder if honourable senators are aware of this fact—which I have reiterated in the past but which I feel I should reiterate again—that anybody who is single and makes less than $9,597 per year in October 1983 will not be affected by this bill, nor will a married couple making in total $16,265. Senator Thompson talked about the poverty line and whether those figures are above or below the poverty line. My information is that they are above the poverty line. I have in this briefing book various poverty lines established by various groups. In 1978 the base, for Statistics Canada, for a single person was $7,941 and for a couple $10,413. That figure is somewhat out of date, but the Canadian Council on Social Development, as of 1982, establishes as its threshold for a single person $6,898 and for a couple $11,496. The Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty, Senator Croll's committee, established as its base $7,726 for a single person and $12,876 for a couple. The Metro Toronto Social Planning Council uses the base of $9,045 for a single person and $12,672 for a married couple. The figures I have given are over the poverty line.

Hon. Jack Marshall: What about families of three or four people?

Senator Everett: I only have figures for single people and married couples.

Senator Marshall: You will find that you are a little out when it comes to larger families.

Senator Everett: That would not surprise me, but most pensioners do not have families of three or four.

Senator Marshall: "Most"? You would be surprised.

Senator Everett: Yes, "most", and I think I could defend that point, but let us deal with the figures I have. The figures are $9,597 for a single person and $16,265 for a married couple, and those figures are above the poverty line.

One of the dilemmas the government faced in bringing in this legislation is this question of universality which Senator Thompson mentioned. All those over 65 receive the old age security payment regardless of income. I can just imagine what would happen if they were not subject to the restraint program and they could point to people who were making large incomes or were enjoying great wealth who were not subject to the restraint program. I disagree with Senator Thompson in respect of the principle of universality. I think it is a terrible principle. I would prefer to see those who do not need government support not get it, so that we could give those who do need government support an adequate amount. Indeed, if there were no universality then we would not be having this debate because, in fact, there is an element of non-universality in the old age security system, and that is that the people below those threshold incomes do get the guaranteed income supplement to bring them up. Not everybody receives the guaranteed income supplement. Instead of debating this issue, I would rather we were debating the issue dealing with those who are in need of support receiving support and those who are not in need of support looking after themselves. That is what would appeal to me.

Nonetheless, we have universality and we have to deal with it. The government is faced with a restraint program and with the fact that the old age security pension is paid to everybody regardless of their income and their wealth. Therefore, the government has taken the attitude that those who are drawing the guaranteed income supplement and those who are below the threshold will not come under the restraint of this bill but will be fully indexed in every way possible.

What is really important and what we should keep in mind is that, no matter what we do, we can best benefit those who are drawing pensions by lowering the rate of inflation, because if we lower the rate of inflation below 6 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984 the bill will have no effect at all. That does not mean that the bill is unnecessary, because we have to show that we have the resolve to lick inflation, and the government has shown that resolve. But the real benefit to the pensioner is getting inflation below 6 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984.

We must not give up the concept of helping pensioners through lowering inflation, no matter how much people's heart strings may be pulled. Under the system as it is today, pensioners in the lowest income brackets are being protected and the policy is functioning.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Will the honourable senator accept a question?

Senator Marshall: Come on! The debate is finished.

Senator Bosa: I am asking a question of the Chairman of the National Finance Committee. Did I understand the honourable senator to say that the restraint of the six-and-five program will not be imposed on those pensioners who qualify for the guaranteed income supplement benefit?

Senator Everett: If I understand the honourable senator's question, the bill will not apply at all to somebody who is drawing the guaranteed income supplement.

Senator Bosa: So the six-and-five program will apply uniformly to the old age security pensioners, but the difference will be made up by the guaranteed income supplement; it is not that those pensioners who qualify for the guaranteed income supplement will be exempt from the restraint program?

• (1520)

Senator Everett: The operation of the bill, as I understand it, is that the old age security payment is restrained to a 6 per cent increase in 1983 and a 5 per cent increase in 1984. If somebody is below the income threshold and is drawing the guaranteed income supplement, however, the guaranteed income supplement is not restrained, it is fully indexed. In addition to that, the amount of the restraint of the old age security payment will be added to the guaranteed income supplement, so those people will not be affected by the bill at all.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF CLAUSES OF CERTAIN BILLS—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey:

> That the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments be authorized to examine the subject matter of clauses of bills introduced in the Senate or the House of Commons, where such clauses may, by express words or otherwise, infringe upon the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House thereof and to invite them to join with this House in the aforementioned action.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators may recall that just before I adjourned the debate last evening I read a letter to the Senate which was addressed to Senator Perrault dated February 23. In that letter I suggested that four areas could be studied by committee chairmen: namely, the question of the pre-study of bills; human rights and freedoms; enabling clauses of bills; and the regional function of the Senate. For example, committee chairmen should write to provincial governments with respect to bills in which they had a particular interest, inviting them to testify before or make written representations to the Senate committee considering the bill.

At that meeting of committee chairmen, as I mentioned, there was not enough time to deal with the matters which I raised in the letter, except for one small procedural item to which I have not referred. The meeting adjourned and not one single person present asked whether we were going to consider at a later meeting the questions I raised in my letter. I must say that I felt rather frustrated and depressed when not one single committee chairman present showed the slightest interest in the suggestions I had proposed. I did not know what to do.

A few weeks later, however, I found out about what had been done in the Australian Senate. My spirits somewhat revived, and I resumed my efforts, thinking that the splendid example set by the Australian Senate might have some effect on my fellow senators.

At this point, honourable senators, I should like to read an extract from a brief that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments presented to the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Standing Orders and Procedure. As honourable senators are aware, that was the committee which was considering reform of the House of Commons. On page 9 of this brief it states:

> The Proclamation of the Constitution Act in April has raised a new reason for parliamentary scrutiny of Bills: the need to ensure conformity with the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This is especially important because there is no provision in the Constitution Act for scrutiny of Bills and report to the Houses by the Attorney-General as there is in the case of the Canadian Bill of Rights. The Standing Joint Committee, having the advantage of regular counsel accustomed to scrutinizing delegated legislation under its criteria as to whether or not it is in conformity with the Canadian Bill of Rights, is in a position to take on the scrutiny of Bills in terms of the Charter. The Standing Joint Committee's Senate Co-Chairman has a motion for a reference for such scrutiny before the Senate. It would be infinitely better if the reference were to be made by both Houses.

I might say that it had been agreed between the Honourable Perrin Beatty, who is the joint chairman, and myself, that, from a practical point of view, we should pursue this through the Senate first. If we could get this motion through the Senate, it would not matter, initially, whether it went through the House of Commons; we could proceed to operate on the Senate resolution alone.

I continue reading from the brief:

> We are aware that the suggestion of scrutiny of Bills immediately raises suspicions in the Government and may even cause some members of the Commons House to feel that their functions are to be usurped. What the Standing Joint Committee has always had in mind is technical scrutiny and not policy scrutiny, the scrutiny of a Bill to determine its legal consequences or lack of them and not to criticize the policy that the Bill seeks to implement. We would like to point out that what we suggest is not novel. The Senate of the Commonwealth of Australia has recently appointed a Committee for the Scrutiny of Bills, the terms of reference of which are these:
> (1)(a) That a Standing Committee of the Senate, to be known as the Standing Committee for the Scrutiny of Bills, be appointed to report, in respect of the clauses of Bills introduced into the Senate, and in respect of Acts of the Parliament, whether such Bills or Acts, by express words or otherwise—
> (i) trespass unduly on personal rights and liberties;
> (ii) make rights, liberties and obligations unduly dependent upon insufficiently defined administrative powers or non-reviewable administrative decisions; or
> (iii) inappropriately delegate legislative power or insufficiently subject its exercise to parliamentary scrutiny.
> The Australian Committee has elaborated on these terms of reference as follows:
> The Committee considered the Bills in accordance with the principles defined in paragraph 1(a)(i) to (iii) of the terms of reference set out in this Report. Principles (ii) and (iii), which concern themselves with administrative discretion and legislative powers and scrutiny, are self-explanatory. For the purposes of considering the Bills under the more open-ended principle (i), to establish whether they might trespass unduly on personal rights and liberties, the Committee, while not confining itself to these aspects, had regard to matters such as whether, and in what circumstances, the legislation—
> (a) placed the onus of proof on a defendant in a criminal prosecution;
> (b) conferred a power of entry on to land or premises other than by warrant issued according to law;
> (c) conferred a power of search of the subject, land or premises other than by warrant issued according to law;
> (d) conferred a power to seize goods other than by warrant issued according to law;
> (e) purported to legislate retrospectively;
> (g) affected the liberty of the subject by controls upon freedom of movement, freedom of association, freedom of expression, freedom of religion or freedom of peaceful assembly.

Honourable senators, the next paragraph is very important.

> The Committee wishes to make it clear that, by identifying clauses of Bills as raising questions under one or other of its principles, it does not necessarily have a concluded view that the principle in question is in fact infringed. The Committee regards its role as being to alert the Senate, rather than to perform a function, similar to that undertaken by the Regulations and Ordinances Committee, of recommending to the Senate that action be taken.

Honourable senators, when I read this my enthusiasm was revived. At that point we were about to amend our Constitution; we were going to have a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I went to discuss the matter with Senator Frith. I suggested that this is a practical way in which the Senate can be of assistance. We know that things are put into bills which are overlooked. I suggested that, the minute the Charter of Rights became effective, I would propose that we put a motion to this effect and that we follow the original Australian recommendation, that it be a joint committee. I must say that I thought the Senate would get a little bit of credit for this.

I pointed out that this committee would not be making any decisions as to whether there actually was an infringement of the Charter of Rights. It would merely alert the committees actually considering the bills as to the possibility of that occurring, so that such possible infringement would not be overlooked.

At our meeting, Senator Frith was not, as I recall, exactly receptive. He said he was a little suspicious. He asked how the government could be sure—Senator Frith will correct me if I misquote him, because we had that meeting some months ago—that the committee would confine itself to alerting the committees and that it would not be holding up bills. I said to him that I would draft a notice of motion which would contain the words "draw to the attention of the Senate". Senator Frith then suggested that I write him a letter to explain what I had in mind, which I did.

• (1530)

I shall first quote from a speech I gave in the Senate on May 27, 1982 on another matter, which will again explain one of my reasons. I pointed out that section 29 of the Statutory Instruments Act, which had been passed in 1970, actually amended section 3 of the Canadian Bill of Rights—the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights. It provided that:

> The Minister of Justice shall, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council, examine every regulation transmitted to the Clerk of the Privy Council for registration pursuant to the Statutory Instruments Act and every Bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons, in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this part—

That is, the Bill of Rights.

> —and he shall report any such inconsistency to the House of Commons at the first convenient opportunity.

In that same speech I pointed out that:

> As far as I know, the Minister of Justice has never reported to the House of Commons any regulation as offending the Bill of Rights, and has only once reported a bill, and that was in connection with an amendment that the Senate made to the Feeds Act in 1975. The Minister of Justice reported it as being inconsistent with the Bill of Rights and it was, therefore, turned down.

I will now read three paragraphs from the letter I wrote to Senator Frith dated April 19 before the Constitution was patriated. On the second page I said:

> As you know, the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments examines regulations under 15 Criteria which have been approved by both Houses of Parliament. Criteria 13 is to determine if it "is not in conformity with the Canadian Bill of Rights." Thus, as far as regulations are concerned, not only does the Executive Branch examine them to see whether they infringe on the Canadian Bill of Rights but also the Legislative Branch of our Government through the Statutory Instruments Committee. It seems to me that a committee should also examine bills to see whether or not they infringe the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and as our Committee will be concerned with this as far as regulations are concerned, we have some expertise in this area and would, therefore, be competent to deal in the same area with respect to bills.
> Taking my clue from the stated intentions of the Australian Committee, I have drafted the Motion so that the Joint Committee will not pass judgment upon whether or not there is an infringement, merely it alerts the Senate, and hopefully the Senate and House of Commons Committee considering the bills, as to a possible infringement by drawing their attention to clauses which may infringe. You will recall that the various reports of the Australian Committee start off with the words "The Committee draws the attention of the Senate to clauses of the following Bills which contain provisions which the Committee considers may fall within the principles expressed in paragraph 1(a)(i) to (iii) of the Resolution of the Senate of 19 November 1981."
> I am not suggesting that on a long-term basis what I am proposing should necessarily be followed. There may be better solutions which will be proposed when the whole question of Parliamentary Reform is being considered. In the meantime, if my Motion is accepted it will show that the Senate is taking some initiative, on an interim basis, which may possibly turn out to be the best way in the end.

After sending that letter I gave notice of a motion and I phrased it in order to allay Senator Frith's suspicions that we might go beyond alerting. My original motion stated:

> That the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments be authorized to examine and draw to the attention of the Senate the subject-matter of clauses of Bills—

We used the words "draw to the attention" following exactly the words used in reporting by the Australians. Following that notice of motion, Senator Frith said that he thought it was out of order and might be against the rules. Senator Flynn said: "Why draw it to the attention of the Senate? Why not report to the Senate?" I did not mention in my motion that we should ask for the concurrence of the House of Commons because they have referred the subject-matter of bills to joint committees on many occasions when they have not asked for our concurrence. I wanted action to be taken on it in the Senate and I did not want there to be any suggestion made that we would be holding up bills. While there were many objections, after three different tries at it, the motion was amended and it is finally in its present form which, as far as I am concerned, is perfectly satisfactory, as the debate on the form of my motion adequately explained the purpose. We are simply examining the subject-matter of bills, to alert the committee studying them.

After this motion was proposed, I believe it was Senator Perrault who said to me that the Minister of Justice was very worried about this motion. He said that they thought I was trying to chisel in on the duties of the Department of Justice in examining bills and that that was showing no confidence in the ability of the department to perform that job. Senator Perrault said that that is their job and not really the job of the Senate. I then suggested that Senator Perrault and I have a meeting with Mr. Chrétien, the Minister of Justice. At that meeting I opened the discussion by saying that I had heard that he had some objections to my motion. Mr. Chrétien said he did not know what I was talking about. He said he had never heard about it until that very minute. He said that obviously some official in his department had heard about it. Because of a comment by Senator Perrault, I gathered during the course of our conversation with Mr. Chrétien that it was Senator Frith who had drawn to their attention his concern that—

An Hon. Senator: Oh, oh!

Hon. C. William Doody: Not Senator Frith!

Senator Godfrey: —if we pass this motion it might be used to block government bills and cause delays.

I left the Minister of Justice on the basis that I would interview the bureaucrat who had opposed the motion in connivance with Senator Frith. Mr. Chrétien said that I would be hearing from the official concerned; and several days later he and another gentleman arrived at my office and I did my best to convince them. In fact, I gave them half the speech I am giving this afternoon, but to no effect. Eventually, I told them how angry and annoyed I was, thinking that might change their attitude, because I was hoping they would go back to the Minister of Justice and say that really there is nothing to worry about here. But that did not happen.

I have known Senator Frith for 25 years. We have worked together. I am very fond of him and I have a great deal of respect for him. I think he is doing a terrific job as Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. He is very diplomatic and I believe everyone is very pleased with his performance, so it hurts me to say that as far as his being an innovator or approving of innovations or pressing for new ideas on reform are concerned, I must confess that he has been a disappointment.

I can recall the first inkling I had of this was when we were in opposition and Senator Bosa proposed what I thought was a most sensible motion, that the rules should be amended so that we could abstain from voting, because at that time the opposition was in the majority in the Senate and there might be some bills that we would not want to oppose and yet not vote for. Senator Frith gave a very fiery speech opposing what I thought was just one small step forward to reform our procedures. He was so persuasive that he had it referred back to the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, with the result that it was two years before it was reconsidered, and we now have it in our rules.

• (1540)

I am rather reminded of what Professor Trevor Roper, the great historian at Oxford, said about that institution. Incidentally, this doesn't apply only to Senator Frith, but to other senators as well. Professor Roper said:

> As so often happens, what we call the genius of the place quickly absorbed its would-be reformers.

I think that rather applies to the Senate, too. New senators arrive full of fire and brimstone and with great ideas about reform, and then the genius of the place gets to them.

I was not present when Senator Frith gave his two-part speech on the elected Senate, but I read his speech with a great deal of interest. I must say I was rather incredulous—I think that is the best word to describe my feelings—at his suggestion that, if we do have an elected Senate, that fact should not affect any of the present senators; they should be able to carry on for life, if they are life senators, or carry on until they retire at the age of 75. Personally, I have only four and a half years to go. For that reason perhaps I can be a little more objective on this matter than Senator Frith, who has 16 years to go.

I must confess that in the past, if I wanted to get a laugh when somebody asked me how I got appointed to the Senate, I simply gave the facetious reply that was reported in the paper the other day. But I have given that up. I get a bigger laugh by telling them that Senator Frith gave a speech in which he proposed that we reform the Senate by electing it, as long as it did not affect any of the present senators. Some people who don't laugh sort of look at me and say, "You've got to be kidding!"

In his speech Senator Frith, in giving an example of an elected Senate, mentioned New South Wales to indicate that you could have appointed senators in a transitional period to an elected Senate. I believe somebody pointed out, however, that in Australia the senators in New South Wales had, in effect, been appointed for six years, and half of them were appointed every three years so that when there was a transitional period to a fully elected Senate it was only something like a three-year wait until the election date, and then half were elected so that the former senators were only in office for three years. So that is not really relevant to the suggestion Senator Frith made, where we could have some appointed senators overlapping elected senators for 30 years.

I might also point out that the question of people retiring was considered by the Senate in connection with the provincial supreme court judges in 1960. You may recall that there was no retirement age for the provincial supreme court judges and that there actually had to be a change in our Constitution to provide for that. On that occasion the government improved the pensions of all supreme court judges before the bill was proposed.

I might say that when a similar act affecting the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada was introduced in 1927, all those judges who were over 75 had to retire, and at that point they just received their ordinary pensions. However, in 1930 another act was passed providing that they retired on full salary.

According to Debates of the Senate in 1960 the two leading debaters against the bill for retirement of judges at 75 were Senator Farris and Senator Roebuck. They were both 82 years of age at the time. Senator Farris referred to the "slap-dash resolutions" of the Canadian Bar Association. Since 1935 there had been eight different resolutions of the Canadian Bar Association proposing that supreme court judges retire at 75. So we have a precedent of the Senate approving in 1960 a resolution for a constitutional change which required mandatory retirement.

When I read Senator Frith's speech I noticed that he said that one of the five desirable aspects of Senate reform was that the Senate should be interested in the matter of human rights. With that in mind I wrote Senator Frith a letter, during the Christmas break, saying that I was just delighted to hear that he had been converted at last.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Remember Perry Como? "We get letters. We get letters."

Senator Godfrey: So I said to Senator Frith, "I don't expect any opposition to my motion, because you are now finally converted." Senator Frith tells me that he has a speech tucked away in his desk which he is waiting to use when I have finished making my speech on this motion. In any event, I said, "I presume that you will not be opposing it, and I will then go ahead."

Not having heard from Senator Frith, I asked him, when I returned to Ottawa: "What about my motion? What is your attitude on it?" He said, "Oh, whatever the government decides. I am the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate."

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: I said, "Well, what action are you going to take? If you don't like what I propose, surely you should be proposing something with respect to the role of the Senate on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. After all, we had a Senate committee two and a half years ago saying we should have a committee. What are you proposing?"

"Oh," he said, "I didn't say I was in favour of the Senate taking an active part in human rights. I was really talking about regional interests. I was only reporting what the Lamontagne committee had recommended."

I was a little startled at that. Consequently, I looked back at Senator Frith's speech to refresh my memory. I will now read exactly what Senator Frith did say on December 9, 1982.

[Senator Godfrey.]

> Honourable senators may recall that for a listing of what I considered the desirable functions of the Senate I used those listed in the Lamontagne report. As referred to at page 5111 of Debates of the Senate for December 2, those functions are, first, the legislative function; second, the investigative function; third, the regional function; fourth, the representation of minorities function; and, last, the human rights function.
> I pointed out, honourable senators, that it would be on that basis that I would try to build my model for an elected Canadian Senate, and that I would emphasize particularly the third function, that of representation of regional interests.

Honourable senators, in view of Senator Frith's dedication to doing whatever the government decides should be done, I would remind you of what I said in a speech I made on March 11, 1981, on the Constitution, as reported at page 2011 of Hansard.

> On that subject, I would like to quote Senator Dandurand, when he became government leader in the Senate in 1922, and I remind honourable senators that he remained Liberal leader in the Senate for 20 years:

This is what he said:

> I shun party discipline and the party whip. I invite criticism of the measures of the government, criticism from the right as well as from the left; I feel it is the responsibility of each senator—

Including the government leader in the Senate.

> —to try to improve the legislation that comes before us.

Honourable senators, in case I have given the impression that only a few of us are in favour of this, I should like to refer to a report of a study group of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association on the role of second chambers. The report is reproduced in the October 1982 edition of The Parliamentarian.

I should first point out to you who the members of that study group were. The chairman was Lord Shackleton. The members were Sir Condor Laucke, former President of the Australian Senate; Senator Eugene Forsey, former member of the Canadian Senate; Sir Arnott Cato, President of the Barbados Senate; the Honourable Ram Niwas Mirdha, MP, former Deputy Chairman of the Rajya Sabha, India; Y. A. B. Tun Omar Yoke-Lin Ong, former President of the Senate of Malaysia; and the Honourable N. C. Makombe, President of the Senate of Zimbabwe. I quote from page 201 of The Parliamentarian. Their report states, in its introductory part:

> —there was agreement that in two areas, the early scrutiny of draft Bills, and in the protection of human rights, there is scope for beneficial reform in most countries. Committees of the Upper Chamber are seen as the appropriate instruments for increasing the democratic protection of peoples' liberties.

It so happened that the youngest of the Commonwealth legislatures, that of Zimbabwe, provided an excellent example of the working of such a committee, operating under the umbrella of a constitution which specifically prohibits racial, sexual, religious, and tribal discriminations. In the Upper House in Harare, the Senate Legal Committee examines all Bills, except Money Bills and Constitutional Amendment Bills, to ensure that the provisions do not infringe the entrenched fundamental rights.

I would also refer to page 204 of The Parliamentarian. The report states:

Not surprisingly, we agreed that the most important justification for the existence of an Upper House is the need for a body of experienced people to revise and amend ill-considered, defective, hasty, and even oppressive legislation coming from the House elected by universal suffrage. Numerous instances were given of the changes recommended and later accepted by the ruling Government to legislation which could have harshly impinged on human liberty.

I quote further from page 254, which is a quotation from the paper prepared by Sir Condor Laucke, who is a former President of the Australian Senate and whom I met when I was in Australia two and a half years ago. He said:

—nobody will ever convince me that two sieves are not better than one.

He was talking about the desirability of a lower and an upper house. Senator Frith talked about one sieve, but what I am proposing in this motion is two sieves, that is, that the executive branch will look at bills and see whether or not they infringe the charter, and then the legislative branch will also look at them—I do not mean in an adversarial way, but just to make sure no mistake has been made.

He goes on to say:

The Australian Senate's record as a House of review is impressive and has been of particular significance in the area of the defence of the rights and liberties of the citizen—an area which crosses party lines. A recent development in this area has been the appointment of a Senate committee on the scrutiny of Bills, of which I will have more to say later.

That, of course, is the committee that I have referred to.

At page 260 he says:

The Australian Senate has always been prominent in the protection of the rights and liberties of the citizen, both with respect to legislation and delegated legislation.

Can that be said about the Canadian Senate—that we have been very protective? Later, he says:

The potential of this Scrutiny of Bills Committee for ensuring good legislation, and for protecting the personal rights and liberties of the citizen, is considerable and it promises to be one of the great successes of the Senate's standing committee system—and a manifestation of the real value of Upper Houses.

I would like now to refer to the report of the Canadian Bar Association on the reform of Parliament issued in August 1982. I must say that it is an absolutely first-class document. It makes a lot of sense, and not just in the matters to which I will refer.

At page 24 it states:

—backbenchers from all parties have many common interests in parliamentary reform and resisted any suggestion that the process should be left to the control of party leaders or bureaucrats.

I might mention here that the House of Commons committee dealing with reform did not have as a member a minister, and they did not ask a minister to testify before it. They did not even ask the house leaders to testify. They completely ignored them and said, "We are going to bring in our own report"—which, of course, has since been unanimously adopted.

I now continue with the quotation from the report, which states:

This was put particularly forcefully by one government backbencher:

The enemies of parliamentary reform are the party leaders—all of them;—

So, you are in good company, Senator Frith. It goes on:

—the cabinet, because reform means giving up and sharing power; the people who understand the system and are comfortable with it (this includes most front benchers); those people who think they alone have the right view and will fight for that view against everything. They all make recommendations on reform to further their views of what Parliament should be doing to further their own interests . . . What we should be seeking are rules to guide our political life that are going to provide the maximum benefit to the electorate.

Later on, at page 79, the committee reports states:

There are, of course, significant limits to the role that Parliament can play as a supervisor of public administration. The shortage of parliamentary time and the lack of expertise are limiting factors. Furthermore, the painstaking examination of government activity that is associated with the Statutory Instruments committee or the reports of the Auditor General is not suited to the generalist and partisan approach of most members of the House of Commons. Nevertheless, Parliament is a great engine for accountability; indeed, it is the only significant counterweight we have to the power of the bureaucracy.

That report is stating what Senator Missen from Australia said, which I have already quoted. Parliamentarians are generalists; they just do not have the time to go into all the technical details.

Then, on page 81, the report goes on to say:

> There is a fine balance to be struck here between government demands for efficiency and passage of its legislation and opposition demands for time to debate, consider and propose alternatives.

There is only one correction or suggestion I would make on that comment: This should not only apply to the opposition, but to friends of the government and friends of the government in the Senate. They want to improve legislation, and not in an adversarial way. If they discover some mistake has been made or that something has been overlooked, they want to make a contribution just as much as any member of the opposition does.

I should also like to refer to the January-February edition of Policy Options that is published by the Institute for Research on Public Policy. The institute has published some articles on parliamentary reform. Included in them is an article by Paul Thomas called "Practicable Reforms for Parliament." At page 22 he says:

> Attitudinal change is, to a great extent, a prerequisite for successful institutional reform. Participants in the parliamentary process must recognize that neither the government, the opposition, Parliament as an institution, nor the country benefit in the long-run from present practices. A comprehensive package of reforms should contain a balancing of interests involved in procedural change but the main goal should be to make Parliament a body that the government must listen to and be influenced by more often than in the past.

I would also like to refer to an article by Michael Valpy of the Globe and Mail. When talking about reform in the House of Commons, he said that there "should be an altered psychological environment in which MPs will be able to work, combined with a stronger mandate for them to scrutinize the actions of the executive." This again emphasizes the importance of the attitudinal climate.

I should also say that about two or three weeks ago I ran into Mr. MacGuigan, the present Minister of Justice, in Toronto. He gave a speech there, and I had about five minutes with him. He was not aware of this motion, so I told him what I was proposing. His immediate reaction was to tell me that his department was doing this scrutinizing even though Parliament has not yet passed any legislation to provide for it similar to section 3 of the Bill of Rights that I have referred to. In fact, he said that his department had reported against a proposed bill because it was in contravention of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I pointed out to him that that was fine, that was the function of the executive branch, even though there was not any statutory authority for it yet, but that there should also be input and scrutiny from the legislative branch of government. I must say that he saw the point immediately. He did not commit himself in any way, but he said: "Of course, you have to have the legislative branch check against the executive branch."

[Senator Godfrey.]

• (1600)

Before I go any further, I shall read one other quotation on structural changes versus attitude, and it is from an interview which was given recently by Professor Arthur Lower, the dean of Canadian historians, about the recent reforms in the House of Commons. He was asked:

> How do you feel about the reforms?

To which he replied:

> I would say those changes are relatively unimportant because it is not mechanical changes that are necessary to improve Parliament.

In other words, it is something more than that that is required. There must also be a change of attitude.

Last week I discovered for the first time that Graham Eglington, who had been counsel to our committee, had come across an article that had been written by Professor Mallory around 1971 or 1972 in which he had pointed out that when Mr. Turner, the then Minister of Justice, was introducing the Statutory Instruments Bill in the House of Commons, he wrote a letter to ministers telling them the principles upon which they should be governed in the drafting of regulations. Mr. Perrin Beatty, the joint chairman of the joint committee, wrote to Mr. MacGuigan about it and asked for a copy of Mr. Turner's letter. Mr. MacGuigan replied immediately and enclosed a copy of the letter. That letter is dated December 22, 1971. Our committee had never seen it before.

He also sent along a document which is dated April 1981, entitled: "The Preparation of Legislation". Again, our committee had never seen that document before.

The letter is an excellent one, and, in part, states:

> When bestowing the power to make regulations upon a person or a rule-making authority care should be taken to ensure that the statute is not couched in unnecessarily wide terms. Specifically, certain powers should not be granted.

Then he sets out such powers, one being:

> power to subdelegate regulation-making authority:

Our committee has for years had a running battle with various departments on that question of sub-delegation, and we never knew of the existence of this letter which would have helped us considerably.

Another power is:

> power to make regulations that might trespass unduly on personal rights and liberties;

The very thing that we are talking about today he said they should not do.

Mr. Turner goes on to state:

> Where it is intended to confer a power that exceeds or goes beyond the guidelines set out under paragraph (a), specific Cabinet authority must be obtained.

In other words, althought the contravention of human rights is prohibited, it can, in effect, be permitted as long as the Cabinet agrees.

In the latest document to which I referred the following is set out at page 9:

> Specifically, certain powers are not to be granted unless the Memorandum to the Cabinet requesting the authority for preparation of the legislation by which such a power would be conferred specifically requests authority for the power and contains reasons justifying the power that is sought. These powers include the following:
> (a) power to make regulations that might substantially affect personal rights and liberties;

So, there is a provision in this document that cabinet can authorize regulations that substantially affect rights and liberties.

I must say that I have reached the end of my speech, as you will be delighted to hear, but I have one further reference to make. It is from a recent article on Senate reform. I will not quote what I said, but will quote what Senator Frith said. The article states that:

> —"sober second thought," in John A. Macdonald's words, was debased to the point where "we're just a bunch of pussycats and the House of Commons doesn't worry about us," according to Senator Royce Frith.

Senator Frith: Do you want me to correct that now?

Senator Godfrey: Yes.

Senator Frith: I said that the House of Commons treats us like a bunch of pussycats.

Senator Godfrey: That is probably right, because the next point I was going to make was that I do not think anybody, including Senator Frith, cares what the House of Commons thinks about us. So, I am glad to hear that that has been corrected.

In any event, that may be true and we do act like a bunch of pussycats insofar as our dealings with the government are concerned. I have given two instances where one bureaucrat has, in effect, decided what the Senate should do, and I think it is time we changed.

There will be some kind of structural change, and whether it is going to be an elected Senate or an appointed Senate for a term of years, or partially appointed by the provinces, I do not see why we should sit back and wait for that to happen when, no matter what kind of structural change occurs, it will not change things unless we change our attitudes. We must take upon ourselves, without further delay, the duty to improve things. This is one step in that direction, a step that was in principle approved by a Senate committee two and a half years ago. I hope that the Senate will approve of this motion which, in effect, is to implement the report of that committee.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 15, 1983, at 4 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 15, 1983

The Senate met at 4 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

February 15, 1983

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable W. Z. Estey, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 15th day of February, 1983, at 4.05 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable W. Z. Estey, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Dauphin.

An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act (No. 2).

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

BALTIC HONORARY CONSULS

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, for several years we have had regular visits by the Baltic Honorary Consuls. I should like once again to bring to your attention the presence in our gallery of those three distinguished visitors.

I now introduce to you Dr. Jonas Zmuidzinas, Acting Honorary Consul General of Lithuania, the senior diplomat. Tomorrow the Lithuanians will be celebrating the sixty-fifth anniversary of the proclamation of the independence of Lithuania.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: Next to Dr. Zmuidzinas is Mr. Ilmar Heinsoo, Honorary Consul General of Estonia.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: And next to him is Dr. Edward Upenieks, Honorary Consul General of Latvia.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: All of these gentlemen have offices in Toronto and reside in that city. The resounding applause accorded to each of them expresses the warm welcome of the leaders and members of both sides of this chamber.

May I add that we understand the important role of these consuls, who represent the freedom of their states, which, between the two World Wars, were independent democratic republics. Canada, the United States and several other countries have not, and do not, recognize the brutal Soviet occupation of these Baltic states in 1940 and the subjugation of the Estonians, Latvians and Lithuanians. We wish them the realization of their freedom.

Their people in Canada, numbering over 100,000, are among the finest and the most progressive citizens of our country, to which they have made significant contributions in all walks of life.

The Baltic consuls are in our capital city on the occasion of the Eleventh Baltic Evening, which will be held tomorrow in the Confederation Room and which will also be attended by cabinet ministers, ambassadors and parliamentarians of both houses.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-132, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): For the sponsor to explain the bill, yes.

Motion agreed to.

● (1605)

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Do I understand that the committee is already meeting?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I had hoped that was not so, and I am reassured to see the chairman still in the chamber—perhaps he is just on his way out—hoping to get that cooperation from his fellow senators.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NEWFOUNDLAND

CORNER BROOK—SUGGESTED ILAP DESIGNATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

The leader will recall that I brought up the concern of the people of Newfoundland with regard to the layoff of some 750 personnel at Bowater. A joint consultative committee has been set up, under the sponsorship of the federal government, one of whose objectives is to try to have the whole of the greater Corner Brook area designated under ILAP. That program, as the leader knows, comes under the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and Regional Economic Expansion.

What help can the Leader of the Government give in having prompt action taken for the designation of the greater Corner Brook area under that program, in view of the dilemma the people of that area are facing?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think I should answer directly the operative part of that question, concerning the help the Leader of the Government can give, because I think, and very properly, I believe, that the minister and the members who are looking into the matter will be as expeditious as they can be, and that they are doing a conscientious job towards that end.

Senator Marshall: Well, the minister responsible for the designation of communities under the program is a member of the federal cabinet, and the committee was set up under the sponsorship of the government. Obviously, nothing can be done unless some action is taken by the government. There is no point in appointing a committee to try to arrange designation under ILAP unless such action is taken. If they agree to a committee being set up, the government should agree that the designation should be given. All I am asking the leader to do is to bend every effort to that end. They asked me, along with their M.P., who is from the opposite side, to get help in that area. I am now asking for that help.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think the government and the members of the committee referred to are fully conscious of the task. I am sure they are trying to be as helpful as they can be in expediting measures that will relieve some of the distress afflicting that community.

SPORT

WINTER OLYMPIC GAMES—SITE OF SKIING COMPETITION

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question that I should like to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It would have been directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, had he been present.

My question involves the forthcoming Winter Olympic Games that are to be held in the Calgary area. It has been reported on national television that the ski site that has been chosen is on the eastern side of the Rockies, in an area in which there is no guaranteed snow supply. It would be expected, then that the snow surface required for that level of skiing would be prepared with the help of snow-making equipment at a cost of some $4 million, which is estimated to go up to as high as $20 million, depending on different opinions. The reason given for the choice of the location is that events such as Olympic skiing are not allowed by the Government of Canada to take place in national parks—in this case, Banff National Park. It seems to me that this is a matter of some concern. It is an expensive decision and one that does not necessarily guarantee—

• (1610)

Hon. Martial Asselin: "What's a million"!

Senator Buckwold: They care; that is why we are asking questions.

Senator Asselin: You care; they don't care.

Senator Buckwold: If I could start my ski run again, it seems to me that we are not likely to hold an event such as the Winter Olympic Games in one of our national parks very often in our lifetime, and that some rethinking should be done by the departments concerned—which I presume are Parks Canada and Senator Perrault's department—to take advantage of what I consider to be some of the best skiing areas in the world, only a few miles away.

I ask the Leader of the Government to respond, if at all possible, or to take my question as notice. I would like him to appeal to the government to reconsider this decision, in the interest of all those things they talk about.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Buckwold predicated his question on some opinions in the press respecting snow conditions on the mountain in question. The press has failed to mention, however, that there have been dozens, if not scores, of years when there has been more than an adequate amount of snow in the area to which he has referred. There is, of course, another factor, namely, that for the past six years—we are now into the seventh year—the area on the eastern slopes of the Rockies has experienced substantially below normal snowfall. This is not the first time we have gone through such a cycle, and whether or not anyone can predict with any accuracy that the cycle will continue until 1988 is a matter for speculation. It is quite likely that if the weather patterns of the past are repeated, we might experience a situation by 1986, 1987 or 1988 where there would be an adequate and abundant snowfall in the area suitable for first-class skiing.

The minister responsible for sport has now entered the chamber, but I have some knowledge of that area, having lived there all my life, that perhaps the very competent gentleman has not acquired in the short time he has been responsible for sport. I am, of course, talking about weather conditions, which is the purport of Senator Buckwold's question. I believe that the correct answer is that some of the speculation should be examined more deeply. There have been years—perhaps eight or ten years in succession—when, in the area in question, on the eastern slopes of the Rockies, there have been adequate snowfalls with excellent skiing for long periods, including that period in the year when the Winter Olympics are planned to be held. If any standby action is necessary, then I am sure that the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport will look into it.

Senator Asselin: Is he a good skier?

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Olson: Yes; he does all things well.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): I am excellent on a slippery slope.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government, who answered my original question. It would seem to me that in connection with any prestigious skiing event, when the eyes of the world will be on Canada, we should not take chances on whether or not we have a good snowfall; we should be assured of it. Millions of dollars might have to be expended. It is true that we might have a good snowfall, but we must not take that chance. The Leader of the Government did not really respond to my basic question.

• (1615)

Why would an exception not be made to utilize the very fine facilities which are available already, with a guaranteed snow supply, a few miles to the west?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a matter of judgment. As Senator Buckwold has already pointed out, those facilities exist; they do not have to be constructed. There are additional reasons for having the location closer than the national parks. There are the enormous logistical requirements involved with the large crowds that are expected to view those races. Many things have to be taken into account when considering a particular location.

I repeat that I do not believe we should be second guessing the Olympic Committee with respect to this, even though there are people who can tell us of years when there has not been sufficient snow to conduct first-class ski races in February. No one disputes that. The committee wants to have a standby capability in the event that that happens. The committee must take many things into account in staging such a massive operation and, with the eyes of the world watching, it wants to put on a superior performance.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the leader, when he stands in his place and denigrates the opinions of all the persons upon which Senator Buckwold's question was based, if he includes the opinion of the great Canadian skier, Mr. Ken Read, who is a contender for the World Cup and who, in all likelihood, will be a member of the Canadian Olympic Team. He has said that the selection made for the site of the races is the worst that could possibly have been made.

Senator Olson: I did not denigrate anyone's opinion, including that of Mr. Read.

EMPLOYMENT OF U.S. ATHLETES IN CANADIAN TELEVISION COMMERCIALS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable sentors, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport why the Canadian Ski Federation is using an American skier in Canadian television commercials instead of using people such as Ken Read and Steven Podborski.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): I regret to say that I have not seen the alleged commercials, and, as a result, I am not in a position to offer expert testimony or my opinion.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I am somewhat reluctant to ask it, bearing in mind the snow job he has just done on Senator Buckwold.

International oil prices are declining. It is estimated that the government could lose $3.1 billion in revenues during 1983-84 and 1984-85 if the international oil price declines to $US 25 a barrel.

Will the federal-provincial arrangement on Canadian oil pricing be altered, or will the government maintain the arrangement of 75 per cent of the world price for old oil, despite the possibility of a loss in tax revenues?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the reality is somewhat different in terms of international oil price levels anticipated by all the experts, whether they are in OPEC, Europe or North America. Anyone who is so wise that they believe they could see all of this coming, of course, is using 20-20 hindsight.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is what you did in the election campaign of 1980.

Senator Olson: That is excellent if that is all one has. Today the international oil price is not in the area where it was projected to be when several agreements, including the 75 per cent level, were established. That level was agreed to, by the way. However, there are further concerns with respect to what might happen even with the present price level. Some of the OPEC countries, as you will have noted, are predicting a downward trend in the price, which is supposed to be somewhere around $34 per barrel for a certain quality of crude. The concern is that it may decline even further unless there is an agreed volume and price arrangement among those countries. Indeed, it is broader than simply the OPEC countries as far as that is concerned at this particular time. I think there have been discussions already, with respect to any modification of the agreement that was made, among the provinces, particularly the producing provinces, and the federal government. When an announcement is forthcoming respecting those modifications, I will see that Senator Phillips is one of the first to hear about it.

• (1620)

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, yesterday the chairman of Petro-Canada was flying trial balloons. Mr. Hopper advocated a new energy policy in that the price of the so-called old oil, or conventional oil, be allowed to reach 100 per cent of the world price in order to allow oil companies sufficient funds for exploration. In turn, this would provide additional taxation revenue to the government of approximately $4 billion. That amount would be used to offset the $3.1 million anticipated loss.

Was the chairman of Petro-Canada acting on instructions from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when he advocated the new energy policy and the Canadian oil price reaching world oil price levels?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I did not hear or read the speech that Mr. Hopper made in Toronto yesterday, but I did see the interview that he gave on Canada AM this morning. If Senator Phillips had listened to that interview very carefully he would have noted that Mr. Hopper indicated that he was expressing his own opinion.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

JOB CREATION PROGRAM

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Social Development. I presume that I shall have to lay some groundwork despite the brilliance of the honourable gentleman. In November the Honourable Marc Lalonde, the Minister of Finance, and the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, announced a federal-provincial job creation program to provide 60,000 jobs for unemployment insurance exhaustees. Mr. Axworthy promised that many jobs would be in place by the end of December 1982. In fact, by the government's own figures, a maximum of 4,000 jobs have been created to date. Nevertheless, Mr. Axworthy happily proclaimed a few days ago that the program would now create 80,000 jobs rather than 60,000, 30,000 of which are to be placed by April 1. Unemployment increased by 104,000 during January, yet the government job creation program has, by its own admission, provided only 4,000 new short-term jobs since its inception in November.

My question to the minister is: Does the government have plans to introduce other methods of creating jobs for the 1,598,000 unemployed, that figure being seasonally adjusted?

I am sure that he, in all his wisdom, will agree that there has to be another half a million people who are fed up and sick and tired of going to Manpower offices and not finding anything? Of course, this is not a reflection on the employees in the Manpower offices or the public service because they cannot provide jobs.

• (1625)

Therefore, what are the plans to introduce other methods of putting back to work the approximately 2 million unemployed that this program won't take care of?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, Senator Muir's question concerns one of the most important subjects in Canada today, and that is the state of our economy as it relates to the social and economic development of our work force, particularly those who are unemployed. That is a very high priority for the government.

When Mr. Axworthy announced the NEED program, the program to which the senator is referring, he announced it as a program that would involve the provinces, the municipalities and the private sector in matching funds. For example, the province of Ontario very quickly came forward with $100 million or more of matching funds if the federal government would give that province priority.

Mr. Axworthy has been involved in discussions across Canada with his provincial counterparts to work out those joint federal-provincial programs. That has taken some additional time, but most of the programs are now in place, and a NEED advisory committee with provincial as well as federal representation has been established in most provinces.

Those committees are now going through, in detail, the submissions of their respective provinces, federal and municipal agencies and private sector corporations with respect to actual job activities.

I believe this program will be successful in directly employing tens of thousands of Canadians. The rhythm of it is now well under way. When Mr. Axworthy announced it, he said that he would try to have the program ready to commence at the beginning of January of this year and, indeed, it did. The public service support structure behind it was in place right on time. I believe the committees in the provinces are, in fact, dealing aggressively with their responsibilities.

I am not in a position to give, on behalf of Mr. Axworthy, precise information with respect to jobs now created and jobs expected to be created, but I will be happy to seek that information and bring it to Senator Muir's attention in the next few days.

Finally, in answer to this very serious question, I want to say that the government has not said, and the Minister of Finance has not said, that the rate of unemployment in Canada can be appreciatively dropped over the short term. The world is in a cyclical downturn, and unemployment is generic to all the western industrial countries. We are working on this problem and endeavouring to make the maximum impact we can.

As far as the question of other methods is concerned, it can only be answered when the Minister of Finance presents his budget, as he is expected to do later this spring.

Senator Muir: I thank the honourable gentleman for his response. I am pleased to hear that he is optimistic and that he thinks we will get some people back to work.

He mentioned in his response the Province of Ontario, and what it is doing. Indeed, little Nova Scotia, whose treasury is not quite as large as Ontario's has also implemented a work program.

I am sure the honourable senator will correct me if I am wrong, but I presume these work programs are hindered by the fact that monies are not forthcoming from the central government to the provinces in order to establish jobs as they once were.

As a supplementary question, would the minister elaborate on just what sort of jobs the NEED program is designed to create? Mr. Axworthy seemed so enthused and excited about this when he mentioned that 80,000 jobs would be created. What sort of jobs is the program designed to create? Of what duration will the jobs be, and what societal purpose will they be designed to achieve?

• (1630)

Senator Austin: First, Nova Scotia is, indeed, one of the provinces cooperating in this NEED program and I understand that it has been putting forward its suggestions. Federal government funds are forthcoming. As soon as a committee decision is taken, the funds are available to proceed with the project decided upon. I do not believe I have heard at any time any suggestion of delay on the part of the federal government in supplying the funds.

As to the kinds of projects the NEED program includes, they are of the following character: federal infrastructure projects, provincial infrastructure projects, municipal infrastructure projects—in other words, capital investment in maintenance and repair programs relative to the public property of those three levels of government. In addition, the NEED committee sorts out the kinds of labour-intensive projects submitted by the private sector and is able to put funds into such activities. I do not have the precise details but one of the characteristics is that these projects create as many jobs as possible for a short term, in the range of 18 to 32 weeks. The goal is optimum employment with the funds available. However, I shall bring more precise details to the chamber in terms of expected tenure of employment under the NEED program.

Senator Muir: I thank the honourable gentleman for his answer and ask him: Is the NEED committee to which he has referred a joint federal-provincial committee?

Senator Austin: In each province which has agreed to participate in the program, the committee is a joint federal-provincial committee.

Senator Muir: Are the members of these committees working hard at their mandates? Is there any possible way that the minister can light a fire under the members of these federal-provincial committees so that they will move a little quicker with a little more alacrity to get things moving? Finally, does the Minister of State for Social Development regard as meaningful these jobs of 20-week duration which are designed to qualify people for unemployment insurance? I know that such jobs are of great help to the poor who do not have a thing to do, are living on welfare, losing their homes and having a rough time of it in general, but there is no permanence in these jobs.

Senator Austin: With respect to the honourable senator's first question, perhaps I could assist by telling him how the NEED committee in each participating province is constructed. For example, in the province of British Columbia the committee is chosen from among persons in the private sector who are involved in management and labour and it also consists of one federal and one provincial representative. The committee is largely composed of people from the private sector, people who are close to employment situations, such as businessmen and people in the labour force in general. I have received no indication of anything but a high sense of urgency to review projects that will create employment as rapidly as possible.

With respect to the honourable senator's second question concerning the meaningfulness of labour, I hope that the projects chosen will, indeed, be meaningful. My understanding is that the projects are ones that have been delayed at the federal, provincial or municipal level as a result of the unavailability of funds, but are part of the capital investment and maintenance programs of those governments, and the work would have to be done at some time. So the NEED program is designed to advance the time when this work will be undertaken, thereby employing people who otherwise would not be employed over the next few months. But here, again, I shall make inquiries of the minister, and if there is anything more to add with respect to the characteristics of the work being approved, I shall include that in my response respecting the other items mentioned by the honourable senator.

Senator Muir: I thank the minister for his answer, and his explanation that some of the problems are tied up in committees. There is an old saying that you have to have half a dozen committees to decide what committee you are going to have next. The minister also mentioned that business and union representatives were involved in these committees, and that these people are close to the problem. Would the minister question those concerned in the government as to whether it would be possible to have on those committees a representative of the unemployed. I am quite sure that there could be no one closer to the problem than a person, man or woman, who is unemployed.

Senator Austin: I appreciate the honourable senator's suggestion and I shall certainly pass it on to the minister. May I say, though, that the qualifications for membership on the committee relate to the ability to make a judgment as to optimum labour performance from the funds invested. So whether a person has a job or not, if that person is skilled in this area then, certainly, that person would be qualified. But I shall pass on the observation.

Senator Muir: You are not saying that the person I have described would not be qualified?

Senator Austin: No, I say that those are the qualifications we need, and I recognize that unemployed people will have those qualifications as well.

TRANSPORT

MANITOBA—VIA RAIL SERVICE FROM WINNIPEG TO MINAKI-FARLANE AREA

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I raise with the Leader of the Government a matter which is, perhaps, minor in the overall context of affairs but very important to the people concerned? It has to do with VIA Rail. I do not think there is any statutory basis for VIA Rail, so I am not sure how the minister brings to the attention of the government problems involving this body.

There is an organization called the Winnipeg to Farlane Camping and Recreational Association that has been trying to discuss with VIA Rail the train service between Winnipeg and points east in the Minaki-Farlane area. The complaint is that they cannot get the VIA Rail people to talk to them. They have solicited my interest in their problem so that, at least, they can have a discussion with VIA Rail about the passenger service that concerns them.

There has been voluminous correspondence on the matter and I have read a good deal of it. VIA Rail just does not seem to be reacting in any cooperative way to talk to these people about their problem. I wonder if the minister could undertake to make some inquiries to see whether we could encourage VIA Rail to be a little more forthcoming in the discussions.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I shall make a reference to the Minister of Transport, who, of course, has the responsibility for VIA Rail, and I think that I should await his response. I am not sure, but it seems to me that there is a long history of communications, submissions and various other things with respect to that service.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate the minister's caution, but I think that he could give us an undertaking to ask VIA Rail to at least talk to these people.

Senator Olson: I am sorry if Senator Roblin did not understand me. In my first sentence in response to his question I said that I would make a reference to the Minister of Transport, who is directly responsible.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

SALE OF APARTMENT UNITS TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on January 26, 1983, concerning the possible introduction of new Loan and Trust Companies Acts.

There is presently no such plan on the legislative horizon. However, the government is looking at such aspects as the question of foreign ownership and will eventually bring in amendments to the Loan and Trust companies Acts.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised by Senator Marshall on January 25 concerning job creation proposals submitted by the Department of National Defence for consideration by the government. If it is acceptable to the honourable senator, I would ask that the answer be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister of National Defence informs me that it should be emphasized that, contrary to Senator Marshall's statement, the Department of National Defence did not submit the programmes to the Minister of Employment and Immigration using the premise "whereby certain individuals who have, for example, poor work habits and other disadvantaged youth in our country who could be helped by the service would be recruited into the Canadian army." The recruiting standards to be employed for the Department of National Defence job creation proposals will be those now used by the Primary Reserves, and, for the Regular Force. The Government is currently considering the proposals of the Department of National Defence as part of its total approach directed at job creation. The overall co-ordination of this assessment is, of course, being carried out by the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, Minister of Employment and Immigration, in consultation with the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of Finance.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised by Senator Roblin on February 8 concerning the western transportation initiative and the reasons for limiting increases to farmers to 6 per cent after 1987 instead of the 4.5 per cent ceiling recommended by Dr. Gilson. This answer is rather long and detailed as to some of the calculations involved. With the permission of honourable senators, I ask that it be incorporated in Hansard as if it had been read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, the question of sharing railway cost increases due to inflation in 1986-87 and beyond has posed a difficult problem for the Government.

Given its commitment to pay the Crow benefit annually and to make other major expenditures, the Government considers that grain producers should, in principle, bear all future increases in the cost of transporting grain. The validity of this principle derives from the following considerations:

—Government expenditures in support of grain transportation in 1985-86 are expected to total about $1 billion;

—this amount represents about 15 per cent of the current value of grain exports;

—all other major industrial sectors generally pay fully for the movement of their products;

—the Government cannot continue to increase without limit its expenditures in support of grain transportation if it is to have available the resources to meet the legitimate needs of other sectors of the economy.

The Government decided to share in meeting cost increases through 1985-86 for two reasons. First, it is important to phase in the system of increased charges to grain producers. Second, producers at present face very difficult economic circumstances, particularly because of depressed grain prices.

With regard to the longer term, the Government recognizes that a number of factors could have a bearing on cost-sharing arrangements, including:

—the future export price of grain;

—the degree of cost increases in fuel, labour, fertilizer and other major cost items in grain production;

—the volumes of grain likely to be produced and marketed;

—the economic position of grain producers relative to other major participants in the economy;

—efficiency improvements in the grain transportation system that could abate the actual cost of moving grain;

—the fiscal position of the Government.

Because of such uncertainties, Dr. Gilson recommended that a full-scale review be carried out in 1985-86, and that further decisions about a number of important questions be taken on the basis of findings at that time. The Government agrees with this recommendation and will make provision for the review in its legislation.

The Government will also undertake during or before 1985 a special study with industry representatives, as recommended by Dr. Gilson, to ascertain the feasibility of linking the producer's share of transportation costs to the price of grain.

In the meantime, the Government will make provision in its legislation that, in the period from 1986-87, producers should pay the first six percentage points of railway cost increases due to inflation, or less if inflation is lower. If inflation is higher, the Government would pay for anything over 6 per cent. The reason for choosing 6 per cent is that over the past twenty years, railway cost increases for the total rail system, net of productivity, have averaged about 6 per cent per year. It would be appropriate for this normal escalation of costs to be borne by grain producers, especially if they are safeguarded against abnormal levels of inflation that might periodically occur.

In reference to the 6-and-5 program, it should be pointed out that the 6-and-5 program expires in 1984 and that this part of the program comes into effect only in 1987.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

SALE OF APARTMENT UNITS TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the rumours that an important player, Mr. William Player, has already disappeared from the Canadian horizon, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he can give us any information as to what the government is doing to bring Mr. Player back to Canada; and when he is here, what is it going to do?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not going to raise a point of order such that a ruling has to be made on this matter, but I think we are slipping into a difficult situation when Question Period becomes re-ignited after delayed answers have been given. Honourable senators should ask the questions they want to ask at the appropriate time. Delayed answers come afterwards. Therefore, we should have the follow-up questions asked at the next sitting of the Senate.

In this particular case, I should be happy to consider the concern expressed by Senator Haidasz and see whether I can get a reply to his question. Some senators to my left have indicated that the major responsibility in this regard lies, perhaps, with provincial governments. Perhaps I will keep that for the reply that will be forthcoming.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government saying that if a senator wants to ask a supplementary question he cannot do so if delayed answers have been given?

Senator Olson: A supplementary question is one thing, but we are now getting into a situation where we re-ignite Question Period. There will be a Question Period tomorrow, the next day and, most likely, the day after that, when far more well-thought-out questions can come forward.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): They will.

Senator Olson: I am not making an objection; I just register concern as to what is happening. Senator Haidasz has not violated the rules nearly as badly as some of the members opposite have. We are, however, slipping almost unconsciously into this situation. I wanted to point out to honourable senators that we could have what amounts to two Question Periods. That is not what is intended. Delayed answers should be put on the record so that honourable senators can read them. Should they have some supplementary questions, there is ample time in Question Period of the following day in which to bring them up.

Senator Marshall: This discussion brings to mind the idea of having parliamentary secretaries to ministers in the Senate. Perhaps the minister could avoid delayed answers and subsequent supplementary questions if such people, who would be aware of what is going on within the departments, could answer the questions initially. I think of Senator Bonnell, who could be the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I can think of some senators on the opposition side who could give more information in answer to questions.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think Senator Marshall's logic and reason have led him from the ridiculous to the sublime, or something like that.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, with respect to the point raised by the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding delayed answers, I would ask him what item he is speaking to when he gives delayed answers? The Order of Business for today is as follows: Presentation of Petitions; Reading of Petitions; Reports of Committees; Notices of Inquiries; Notices of Motions; Question Period; Orders of the Day. The minister must be delivering the delayed answers in Question Period. Therefore, the honourable senator would be entitled to raise a question at that time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Phillips can read the sequence of business if he likes, but he knows that the practice in this house is that His Honour the Speaker recognizes senators who want to ask oral questions so long as there are any who indicate that they wish to do so. When we reach the end of that period, he then calls for delayed answers and they are given. I expressed a view a few moments ago. It is just as valid now as it was then, although if Senator Phillips wishes to go into the legal technicalities regarding what is in the rules and so on, I suppose he has a point, too.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-132, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-132, an act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, has several key elements. Honourable senators will have noticed that the bill has only one clause and it is not a long clause at that. We have learned, however, that simply because a bill has only one provision it does not necessarily follow that it is simple. As is often the case, this bill, though it has only one provision, nevertheless has several key elements.

The first key element involves the government's six-and-five program. It is crucial to the understanding of Bill C-132 that the principle on which the six-and-five program is based be clearly understood, particularly at the second reading stage, when the principle of a bill is at the core of our consideration and debate.

The central idea of the six-and-five program is that the inflationary expectations of Canadians must change if inflation is to be reduced so that Canada can start on the road to economic recovery. The government initiated this process of reducing inflationary expectations through programs under federal jurisdiction. It started with the salaries of M.P.'s and senators, proceeded to the salaries of federal civil servants—

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: What is the definition of an M.P.?

[Translation]

Senator Frith: The letters "M.P." stand for Member of Parliament, of course. There is no English equivalent for the French word "député". Besides, I do not want to put the question to Senator Olson. In accordance with our practice, it is clear that in English, technically, a senator is a Member of Parliament. When we say "M.P." in English, we refer to a member of the House of Commons.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Wait until Senator Olson hears about that; there will be big trouble.

Senator Frith: He can read Hansard for the explanation. Perhaps we will start again, honourable senators. We will go back up to the top of the hill, as Senator Buckwold said earlier, and start again.

The government initiated the process of reducing inflationary expectations through programs under the federal jurisdiction, first, by dealing with the salaries of members of Canada's House of Commons, and, secondly, by dealing with the salaries of members of Canada's Senate—who together make up Canada's Parliament; then by dealing with the salaries of federal civil servants, followed by family allowances and old age security pensions. As honourable senators are aware, the purpose was to index them by 6 per cent in 1983 and by 5 per cent in 1984, instead of retaining the full cost-of-living indexation which would normally take place.

• (1650)

The program has already started to have the desired effect. One of the most inflammatory elements in the process of inflation is the expectation of inflation. The widespread belief that inflation must inevitably continue causes more inflation in itself. Producers put up the cost of goods because they think there is going to be inflation; workers require or demand larger increases because they think there is going to be inflation; so the first attack on inflation must always be to reduce the expectation of inflation. The expectation of inflation is not the only factor, but it is the principal one and, in some ways, the most difficult to control.

The second important aspect of Bill C-132 is its impact on those who receive family allowances—mothers with dependent children. In January 1983 family allowances were increased by $1.61 per month per child, and they will be increased in January 1984 by $1.43 per month per child over the 1983 rate. In other words, these benefits will continue to be increased. It is the rate of increase that is being limited.

Mothers are receiving $1.40 less per month per child in 1983, and will probably be receiving about $2.50 less per month per child in 1983 than they would have received with full indexation. I say "probably" because future changes in the consumer price index, on which the calculation is based, can only be estimated at this time. If inflation rates fall below 5 per cent in 1983, then family allowances will be indexed in accordance with the actual rates. In other words, the 5 per cent cap proposed in Bill C-132 for 1983 is an upper limit for indexation in 1984.

The third point is that only mothers in upper-income families will be affected by limited indexation of family allowances. The 2.4 million mothers in low-income and middle-income families will be compensated in advance for the effects of this limitation on the indexation of their family allowances during the two-year restraint period—that is, 1983 and 1984. Under Bill C-139, to amend the Income Tax Act, which is now being debated in the other place, the government is proposing a special temporary $50 increase in the child tax credit for the 1982 taxation year, over and above the regular full cost-of-living increase. The credit of $343 per child will more than offset, for these families, any loss in family allowances during the two-year restraint period.

Also, Bill C-132 will not affect in any way children who are protected by special allowances. These allowances, as many honourable senators are aware, are paid on behalf of children who are under the age of 18 and are maintained by government institutions. In January 1983 these allowances were increased to reflect the full increase in cost of living from the 1982 monthly rate of $37.65 per child to $41.87. They will continue to be fully indexed to the full cost of living in 1984.

Honourable senators, for our present purpose—that is, second reading debate on the principle of the bill—those are, I think, the key elements making up the one provision contained in Bill C-132.

In summary: first, it is an integral part of the government's six-and-five program; secondly, family allowances will still be increased in 1983 and 1984, although to a limited extent; and low-income and middle-income families will be no worse off as a result of complementary changes to the child tax credit.

Honourable senators, that, in my respectful submission to you, is what Bill C-132 is.

Now, just a word about what it is not. During the parliamentary and public debate on this bill other aspects of it have been emphasized, based, I think, on something that Bill C-132 is not. For exlample, Bill C-132 in no way affects the universality of the family allowance program. After all, the universal nature of family allowances means that the allowance is paid on behalf of all eligible children in Canada. This bill does not change that fact.

Secondly, Bill C-132 is not an attack on the principle of indexation. Family allowances will continue to be indexed every year. Bill C-132 places a two-year temporary cap on the rate of indexation. I stress the word "temporary" because, so far as this bill is concerned, full cost-of-living indexation will be restored in 1985 and subsequent years.

Bill C-132 is not, in its essence, a revenue-saving device. That is one of its effects, but that is not its purpose. There are some savings for the family allowance program, but the additional cost of the $50 child tax credit reduces the level of these savings to a comparatively modest amount. That is why I emphasize that the six-and-five program is not meant to be a reduction in expenditures, but, rather, an attack on inflation by changing the inflationary expectations of Canadians.

Honourable senators, that is Bill C-132, an act to amend the Family Allowances Act, in terms of its impact on family allowance recipients, and in terms of its over-all relevance to the government's six-and-five program. I urge all honourable senators to support second reading of this bill.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Would the Deputy Leader of the Government allow me a question to clear up a point?

Senator Frith: Of course.

Senator Tremblay: Could he tell me how the six-and-five program will apply to family allowances paid in Quebec?

Unless there have been some changes, we know that under the system used in Quebec, the family allowances are not the same for each child who is eligible. They are paid by the Canadian government in accordance with the legislative provisions which were enacted—if my memory serves me right, this goes back to 1971 or 1972—by both the federal and the Quebec governments. They are paid according to a scale whereby the first child receives a certain amount, the second a little more, and the third still a little more. Unless I am mistaken, the difference between the first child and the third or fourth is about one to three. For instance, if the first child gets $15, the third one might get $40 or $45. This scale is applicable in Quebec and the amounts of the federal cheques are based on that scale.

Here is my question: How indeed will the six-and-five program apply in Quebec? The federal payments as a whole are the same, and the total amount of family allowances is the same in Quebec as in any of the other provinces. However, this total amount being the same for distribution within a family according to the ages of the children, the allowances vary from the first to the second, to the third or the fourth, unlike in any other province.

So I would like the deputy leader to tell me briefly how the six-and-five program will apply. Will it apply uniformly to each child, regardless of the amount paid? For example, let us say that a child is rated at $45 a month, if I may use that expression. Given the current rate of inflation, that would work out to an increase of 10 per cent, or nearly $5. Will the 6 per cent apply so that the increase will be reduced from $5 to $2 for example? I simply want an explanation on the way the six-and-five program will mesh with the system agreed to by the federal government and Quebec more than ten years ago.

Senator Frith: If I have correctly understood Senator Tremblay's question, the first thing to do would be to explain the basic underlying principles. Generally speaking, the 6-and-5 program has its own limitations since the federal government can only apply it within federal jurisdiction. The other point is that under the system covered by this bill, the provinces are entitled, to a certain extent, to apply the legislation differently, as Senator Tremblay has mentioned. According to my information, the only two provinces which opted for a different implementation, on which the 6-and-5 program will necessarily have some impact, are Alberta and Quebec, where payments will vary according to the children's age. Only Quebec has a payment differential according to the age and number of children.

Senator Tremblay: Only Quebec?

Senator Frith: That is correct. For these reasons, the 6-and-5 program in general, and more especially in reference to Bill C-132, will not have a consistent impact on benefits. This is due to Quebec and Alberta having opted for this variation. This results in a variation in practice. As for specific figures, I have a table which I could put on record and which we could discuss during the debate.

Senator Tremblay: I wonder whether Senator Frith would be willing to put this table which he seems to have on record. I would be very interested to see the effect of the 6-and-5 program in the case of Quebec and Alberta. I would like to see the figures in this table.

Senator Frith: Very well, but I have one reservation. As far as the economic effect on inflation, and so on, is concerned I cannot provide the information immediately as I do not have detailed figures.

Senator Tremblay: My question referred to the financial impact on families.

Senator Frith: On families, exactly.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, might I ask a question of my honourable friend arising from his explanation of the bill? He gave us the number of mothers who will not be affected by this legislation because of their income status. Can he tell us the number of mothers who will be affected by it because they are in the higher income echelons? In that connection, can he tell us what amount of money, in each of those two years, will not be spent that would otherwise have been spent if this program were not in effect?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I can table or read a statement and a table dealing with the financial implications of the bill: the rate changes; the loss in family allowance benefits over the two years, which amounts to approximately $45 per child; and the gross savings, which would apply to the second part of Senator Roblin's question relating to the actual differences in revenue resulting from this legislation.

As to the number of mothers, I would have to do some arithmetic based on the figures of those who are not affected. I do not have the number, but I will try to have it for tomorrow. Alternatively I might be able to obtain the information later today and have it included in the record of today's proceedings.

Senator Roblin: I am agreeable to whatever is convenient for my honourable friend; but I am not really interested in the gross figure. I am interested in the net figure—that is, after taking into account the $50 per month, and all that sort of thing. It is the net consequence to the treasury that I am trying to get at.

Senator Frith: I believe I have the net effect, but I do not have the number of mothers.

FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS

- RATE CHANGES

The proposal to limit indexation of FA to 6% in 1983 and 5% in 1984 results in the following rate changes:

	Monthly FA rate* $		Annual FA $
	Full indexation	Limited indexation	Full indexation	Limited indexation
	$	$	$	$
1982	26.91		322.92
1983	29.92	28.52	359.04	342.24
1984	32.31	29.95	387.72	359.40

* Rates vary in Quebec and Alberta.

 Uses actual indexation rate of 11.2% in 1983 and an assumed rate of 8.0% in 1984 which is the most recent Department of Finance estimate.

Loss in FA benefits over 2 years is about $45 per child (i.e., $16.80 in 1983 and $28.32 in 1984) relative to what FA would otherwise have been.

- ESTIMATED NET FA PROGRAM SAVINGS

	Gross Savings $M	Revenue* Loss $M	Net Savings $M
Calendar 1983	115	22	93

* Assuming average tax rate of 19%.

- Child tax credit expenditures in 1983 will increase by $250 million as a result of the $50 increase.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I move that the Senate adjourn now.

Hon. Martial Asselin: If the Senate adjourns, that means we come back at eight o'clock this evening.

Senator Frith: According to the Rules, if we had not finished by six o'clock, we would have adjourned until eight o'clock this evening. Since we finished our work before six, it means that we shall resume proceedings tomorrow at 2 p.m. Another thing I would like to point out is that I have been told it is not correct French to use the expression: "Je propose que le Sénat s'ajourne maintenant", and that one should say: "Que le Sénat ajourne maintenant".

Senator Asselin: You are quite right.

Senator Frith: In any case, I understand my advisers are right.

Senator Asselin: I would also add that when the Speaker says: "Que les portes soient ouvertes", the correct way to say it is: "Que l'on ouvre les portes".

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

LITHUANIA

SIXTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF THE RESTORATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, this day, February 16, 1983, marks the sixty-fifth anniversary of the Proclamation of the Restoration of the Independence of Lithuania. The establishment of the Lithuanian Democratic Republic is widely celebrated by Lithuanians in Canada, the United States, and many European countries where they have settled. After a brilliant period of statehood and empire, followed by subjugation and oppression for centuries by the Russian tsarist regime, on this day in 1918, at the end of World War I, Lithuania, by the will of her people, again became a free country with an advanced democratic constitution.

The other two Baltic nations, Estonia, on February 24, and Latvia, on November 18, also proclaimed their independence and established democratic republics. They followed the example of Ukraine, which earlier, on January 22, 1918, was the first of the subjugated nations in the Russian empire to proclaim the restoration of independence and statehood. Ukraine, however, was soon conquered by the Red Army and incorporated into the Soviet Union.

We must remember that the western powers promptly gave de jure recognition to the Baltic states. The Soviet Union also announced their recognition of these states in 1920. In 1921, the Supreme Council of the Allied Powers gave the Baltic states full recognition, and they were immediately admitted into the League of Nations. In 1922, the United States granted them de jure recognition.

Lithuania, as well as Latvia and Estonia, flourished for 20 years as free democratic states, living in peace and harmony with their neighbours. This freedom, however, came to an abrupt end when the Soviet Union, after signing the Hitler-Stalin "Non-Aggression Pact" in 1939, occupied the three Baltic states in June 1940 and, subsequently, forcibly incorporated them into the U.S.S.R. as "Soviet republics". The legitimate governments in exile have, however, continued to be recognized through their consuls by the principal western powers, including the U.S.A. and Canada, to the present time. Yesterday, their consuls in Canada, who sat as distinguished guests in the Senate gallery, were warmly welcomed, having received enthusiastic applause from the leaders and members of both sides of this chamber.

Today, on the occasion of the sixty-fifth anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day, we pay tribute to the human rights activists in Lithuania and the Lithuanian people who, through their Catholic Church, are continuing the struggle for freedom and democracy in conformity with the principles embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the Charter of the United Nations and the same principles enunciated in the Helsinki Final Act, both of which were signed and endorsed by the Soviet Union. Canada has consistently condemned the Soviet violation of human rights at the United Nations and at the Belgrade and Madrid Review Conferences. The Canadian Senate and House of Commons have passed several unanimous motions condemning Soviet violations of these rights and Soviet aggression in other parts of the world.

Today, honourable senators pay tribute to the Canadian citizens of Lithuanian ancestry. Since their arrival after World War II, having fled from the Soviet communist oppression, they have integrated into Canadian life and have become a dynamic part of the Canadian multicultural mosaic. Their contributions to our country are many and significant and are recorded in a large volume entitled Lithuanians in Canada, and other publications. By preserving their cultural heritage, they are enriching the treasure-house of the Canadian heritage. Above all, their wholehearted dedication to the principles of freedom, democracy and human rights makes Canadians more conscious of these the highest principles of humanity, and that we, each of us, can do more for our great country and humanity in every respect.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

ORDER IN COUNCIL TABLED

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to table a document which, I think, requires some explanation, particularly to Senator Godfrey, since it is also, in part, a reply to a question he raised some time ago.

I have contacted the office of the Minister of Agriculture, and they have confirmed the original explanation provided to Senator Godfrey, which is, simply, that through an oversight the order was not tabled within 15 days of its making.

The further delay in the tabling of the order has been caused by the adoption of new rules in the other place. The rules I am referring to are those now requiring each minister tabling a document to designate the committee to which it should be referred in the covering letter to the Clerk of the House of Commons. The letter has now been re-drafted, subject to the new rules, and signed by the minister.

Consequently, honourable senators, I have the honour today of tabling the following document here in this house:

Order in Council P.C. 1982-1859, dated June 23, 1982, amending Schedule I to the Canada Grain Act, effective August 1, 1982, pursuant to section 15(6) of the said act, Chapter 7, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL REVENUE

CONFIDENTIALITY OF CERTAIN INFORMATION ON 1982 PERSONAL INCOME TAX RETURN FORMS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, which has to do with the income tax forms which were mailed recently. I have not yet received mine, but some have received theirs.

Can the Leader of the Government explain why these forms contain information which is deemed to be secret and which can fall into unauthorized hands?

Can he also tell the chamber whether these forms embody the budget changes which have not yet been approved by Parliament?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe some explanations have been given by the Minister of National Revenue with respect to whether or not these forms, which are mailed out to individuals, carry information that is private to the individual. I will obtain those explanations, and also ask for an expanded explanation if the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition does, in fact, contain an inquiry that has not been answered to date.

The question of whether or not that information is available to people other than the person to whom it is mailed is one which requires some detailed explanation. I believe the income tax return forms are sent by first-class mail. Obviously, information private to the taxpayer which is communicated between the tax department and a taxpayer, whoever it may be, would be done through first-class mail. However, in this case there is a question raised as to whether or not someone illegally examining that letter could get some information from it.

I will have to take as notice the other part of the question. It might be helpful if the Leader of the Opposition could indicate to me some particular matter he believes is not in compliance with the Income Tax Act as it now stands. Of course, it may be changed with the passage of Bill C-139.

AIR CANADA

PROPRIETY OF QUESTIONNAIRE

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, apropos the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition a few moments ago, I am reminded of something that happened while I was travelling to Ottawa by plane only yesterday. The purser brought around a questionnaire which was designed, I presume, to get passenger reaction to the services offered by Air Canada.

The immediate point of my bringing this matter to the attention of honourable senators is that that questionnaire contains questions relating to the personal income of passengers. The passenger is asked which category of annual income he fits into: $10,000, $20,000, $30,000 or $40,000. On that questionnaire are other financial questions of a personal nature.

Honourable senators, I do not know the legality in asking questions of that nature, but I certainly question the propriety in doing so. Many people might innocently believe that they have no choice but to answer those questions. I am not ashamed of my income, but it is certainly none of Air Canada's business, nor is the income of anyone else travelling with Air Canada. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government might have this matter looked into.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall ask the Minister of Transport for a reply to the question, if there really was a question asked. I take it to be more of a complaint or grievance.

I have seen those forms, too. The first thing that comes to mind is that one is under no obligation to answer any of the questions. Secondly, if all of the questions were answered, I think that someone relatively clever, reading them over carefully, could almost narrow those answers down to a particular individual. For that reason I do not answer such questions at all. Other people have exactly the same choice.

I do think that Air Canada likes to conduct market surveys relating to the kind of service they should provide to passengers from certain locations. Other questions perhaps help them devise both service and advertising that would do that. I do not blame Air Canada for trying, but I really think it should be a little more subtle because, if all of those questions are answered, the information is no longer private.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION

FINANCING POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I imagine that the honourable minister in charge of the Canada Development Investment Corporation has been following with as much interest as I have the comments that recently appeared respecting the operations of that corporation. I have been stimulated to ask him if he could clarify his position with respect to one or two matters in that connection.

One of the companies that now comes under the minister's aegis is Teleglobe Canada, which is one government corporation which makes a lot of money. I believe it made $47 million last time out. The minister has given some indication, if he has been correctly quoted, that he expected to use some of the money from that company to pay the operating expenses of the Canada Development Investment Corporation.

On the assumption that that is correct, would he tell the chamber whether he feels he has the authority to divert funds from the earnings of that company to another purpose, namely, the financing of the Canada Development Investment Corporation?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Thank you, Senator Roblin for your question. The responsibility for Teleglobe was transferred to me by the Governor in Council. It is a corporation that, as Senator Roblin says, has been profitable.

• (1420)

Hon. Jack Marshall: There must be something wrong!

Senator Austin: On the establishment of CDIC, and my announcement to the press of the transfer of responsibilities to me, including that of Teleglobe, I was asked a question as to whether I had looked at any time for some of the revenues of Teleglobe to be available to CDIC. I said at that time that I would like to see revenues of Teleglobe available to CDIC. The question and the answer, however, honourable senators, were of a prospective nature.

The situation, as honourable senators know, is that Teleglobe is a statutory corporation. It does not have share capital. The prospect of revenue being transferred from Teleglobe, in current circumstances, is the subject of a legal inquiry on my part to see whether it would be in order under existing statutes.

At this moment a summary of the situation is that the legislation which Senator Doody was inquiring about at an earlier time relative to the Canada Development Corporation and the Canada Development Investment Corporation will, of course, be placed before Parliament, and I hope it will be in a form which will give Teleglobe share capital and allow for the transfer of dividends or operating funds from Teleglobe to CDIC.

I want to remind honourable senators that in announcing CDIC I said that one of its principal purposes would be the privatization of assets of a commercial character. There is no possibility, of course, of dealing in a commerical way with Teleglobe, unless it has share capital, and unless its condition is such that its capital is capable of transfer to the private sector, and/or its business is capable of being combined with other businesses, either now owned by the Crown or in the private sector; but these are matters that are prospective in nature and will be fully debated in this chamber and in the other place when the legislation is before us.

Senator Roblin: I take it that the minister is telling me, therefore, that no attempt will be made to divert any funds from Teleglobe until the matter has received statutory approval by Parliament.

Senator Austin: I am saying exactly that, Senator Roblin, unless there now exists statutory authority, and I have asked the law officers of the Crown if there is such authority by which such a diversion could take place.

Senator Roblin: Well, I will leave any discussion of the propriety of such a diversion, regardless of the statutory situation, until I hear the minister's report from the law officers as to what his powers are, and save myself a little breath.

I now want to talk about the sale of Teleglobe, or anything else for that matter, that comes under the control of CDIC because, as reported in the press, the minister refused to give an undertaking that he would refrain from taking any action in this area of sale until parliamentary approval had been given to the statute of CDIC.

Has the minister been correctly quoted as saying that he refused to give any undertaking as to the prospects of selling any of these companies, or is that also a matter which he is willing to defer until Parliament has ruled on this matter?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the question of Teleglobe referred to specifically by Senator Roblin is, or course, one in which there is no possibility of sale or any dealings. I explained why just a few moments ago.

On the second limb of the senator's question, if there is authority now given by Parliament, I do not understand the problems of the propriety of acting on it. If Parliament has empowered the executive, then the executive is entitled to use the power, and is accountable for the use of it to Parliament.

That brings me to the third limb, as I understood Senator Roblin's question, which is identical to that asked by Senator Doody some weeks ago. I presume that the answer in the Senate is the one that appeared in the press. Essentially, to summarize it, I said that I proposed at this time no sale of any of those assets held by CDIC which are in a legal condition to be sold by order of the Governor in Council. Indeed, when honourable senators consider the state of the commercial and equity markets at the moment, it is not difficult to realize that there are not many buyers. In fact, none has come to my attention for the shares of CDC, Canadair, de Havilland or Massey. The question therefore is totally hypothetical.

• (1425)

However, I did not want to be bound by an absolute undertaking not to act in a commercial way if I believed it was in the interests of the taxpayers of this country for me to take some commercial action. Therefore, for the sake of clarity, I will say again that I propose no divestment of any kind from CDIC at this time, and I see no early prospects of divestment. I see no likelihood of a circumstance occurring before the legislation is placed before Parliament, but I believe I would be acting contrary to my responsibilities as a minister to give an undertaking that I would not defend the commercial interests held by the Government of Canada and, therefore, the Canadian taxpayers if some circumstance, which I cannot now imagine, should arise.

Senator Roblin: The minister will pardon me if I say that he seems to be setting himself up ahead of Parliament. It seems to me that the whole of this operation requires parliamentary approval. The minister himself has said that he intends to bring in a bill to validate this business, and I believe that should be done. The minister should not regard himself as being able to make these decisions in advance of Parliament simply because he has not taken the trouble to bring down the bill. So I would ask him to consider that point. In my opinion, he would have done well to have given us a clear undertaking, which in practical terms he could well do anyway, to the effect that he was not going to take any action of this kind until Parliament had approved the legislation.

Does the minister believe that the present statute under which the Canada Development Corporation is operating allows that company to transfer its shares to CDIC without any further legislative sanction by Parliament?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, with regard to the first point, let me be absolutely clear—and I am not suggesting that Senator Roblin has suggested otherwise—that CDIC exists, and actions taken with respect to CDIC exist, under authority which Parliament has given the executive, the Governor in Council, and there has been no suggestion in press reports that CDIC lacks legal authority. So, for the purposes in which CDC is now engaged, it is legally and properly constituted and able to carry on its activities. Those activities are related to crown assets previously held by the Government of Canada, the responsibility for which has been transferred either to me or to CDIC. I want to be quite clear about that.

With regard to the second point, the honourable senator is correct—and I do not believe I have ever averred to the contrary—that the CDC Act requires its shares to be held by a minister of the Crown. The responsibility for those shares was transferred to me some time ago, and CDIC, in effect, acts as an advisory body to me with respect to CDC.

Senator Roblin: I have heard the minister's explanation and I suggest that it is much the same as that given to the press. It leaves the question dangling. If all these measures are so appropriate and the proprieties have all been observed, we still need a bill. I believe that when he replied to Senator Doody the other day the minister said that the bill would be coming down. I am wondering whether he can now put a date to it.

ROLE OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the minister, in addition, whether the Canada Development Investment Corporation will be under the supervision of the Auditor General. Will the Auditor General have full access to the undertakings, activities and books of the CDIC?

• (1430)

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): I think the case of the CDC shares indicates why I believe it would be contrary to my responsibility as the minister responsible to give an undertaking of an absolute character not to act in any commercial way. Again, I am dealing with a hypothetical question and there is no question of divestment before me. It is my understanding of the law that I, as the minister responsible, can sell portions of the CDC shares into the private market at this time. I am not in a position to do so because I believe that the market is not available at a rate of return that is appropriate to the Government of Canada's investment.

On the question of the bill, I said previously in answer to Senator Doody that I stated in the CDIC announcement that I would seek parliamentary approval of a number of measures relating to CDC and CDIC. That bill is being prepared by the Department of Justice and I hope we will have the legislation at an early date. I would clearly find it to my advantage to put an explanation of the policy relating to CDC and CDIC before Parliament and the people of Canada in a way that is realistic and cogent to the issues, rather than to have speculation about the matter in the press.

On the question of the Auditor General, it is a matter of government policy as to whether the Auditor General will, in fact, be the Auditor General of CDIC. It is not a decision that I shall take alone. The question of the role of the Auditor General in conducting commercial audits, such as for CDIC, de Havilland, Canadair, Petro-Canada, CN or Air Canada, is one of importance in a policy sense. However, I do want to make it clear to the chamber that the Auditor General will have access to all the audited statements of CDIC, as he does to the audited statements of all crown corporations, and that he will have access to discussions with the auditors of those corporations whenever he has questions.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am well aware of the minister's powers with respect to the shares of CDC. My question on the sale of shares carefully avoided that corporation. I talked about Teleglobe, which is the one the minister himself referred to in respect of syphoning off funds. I agree with the minister that the sooner he gets his bill before Parliament not only will it be better for him but it will also be better for Parliament. It is much more appropriate that Parliament should deal with these matters than that they should be left in limbo.

I hate to claim the minister's undivided attention; I know it is a bit tiresome but allow me to continue.

Senator Austin: I beg your pardon, Senator Roblin. The Leader of the Government has asked a question and I was attempting to respond.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): It related to part of the response.

Senator Roblin: He was giving you some good advice as to how to answer the question?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Not advice, just further information.

Senator Roblin: The minister to whom he addressed the question is very good at not giving information if he does not wish to.

I want to ask the minister a further question about the Auditor General. I was not referring to the regular business audit. If the minister will take the trouble to refer to the recent report of the Auditor General, he will find in it a very extensive statement on the role of the Auditor General with regard to crown corporations, and the Auditor General clearly differentiates between an ordinary attest audit, I believe it is called, and legislative audits or comprehensive audits such as the ones he conducts. The reason I ask the question is because, according to the Auditor General's statement, one of the companies under the minister's aegis, Canadair, has been closed to the Auditor General. If that corporation is closed to the Auditor General, it seems to me that we might well inquire as to whether the CDIC itself will be closed. If the CDIC will be open to the Auditor General, and the minister is now giving me the assurance that it will be, I expect that the other corporations that are subsidiary to it will also be available for inspection by the Auditor General. Perhaps the minister could take that matter under consideration.

The whole point at issue here and the reason why I ask the question is because the Auditor General has informed Parliament and the people of Canada of the fact that these crown corporations are slipping out of any parliamentary or legislative control. When one considers the course the government has followed in creating the CDIC, one could not get a more perfect case history to justify what the Auditor General is charging. The minister does not give me any confidence to feel that he really thinks that the Auditor General's strictures as to crown corporations are worth his trouble to assuage or to modify, but the minister, no doubt, will be able to give an answer to that matter.

● (1435)

That is the point I think is important in this discussion: whether this particular crown corporation, which bands together several billion dollars worth of public activities, is going to be a crown corporation like some of the ones we have known that escape the net of reasonable parliamentary investigation, or whether it will conform to the principles that the Auditor General lays down as to how crown corporations ought to respond to Parliament. I hope that the minister will deal with that topic in due course.

Senator Austin: Senator Roblin, these are interesting observations and I would like to respond to them briefly.

Firstly, I apologize for having my attention directed away from you when you were commencing your remarks, but I see no cause for you to say that my colleague, Senator Olson, is not forthcoming with respect to information. I find that he is always informative.

Senator Roblin: You don't ask questions; you just answer them.

Senator Austin: With respect to the question of the role of the Auditor General, this is not the time for me to enter into a debate about a problem which is the subject of policy consideration.

However, I do want to say that the question of the role of the Auditor General is not to be linked as directly as you linked it with the question of either an attest audit or a comprehensive audit. What is appropriate in an auditing sense for government departments has to be considered in terms of whether it is appropriate for commercial corporations, either in the public or private sector, and I should like to advise honourable senators that this is a matter of active debate in the accounting profession itself, and the application of rules of comprehensive audit is not one that has been settled by the accounting profession respecting questions of a commercial nature. These are important and interesting issues, but they are not susceptible of quick determination.

With respect to the issue of parliamentary control of crown corporations, I want to advise honourable senators that the government is concerned to ensure that Parliament maintains appropriate control over the spending of government—and that includes spending by crown corporations. I will not elaborate on the meaning of "appropriate control" in answering Senator Roblin's questions; in fact, the answer I should begin to give would be of a conceptual nature, so, again, this is not the moment for me to start in on it.

However, as honourable senators know, a bill related to the control of crown corporations is before the other place. Last night, the President of the Treasury Board, the Honourable Herb Gray, appeared before a committee of the other place to discuss this matter.

Finally, I want to reiterate to Senator Roblin that my answer, as it stands today, is that the Auditor General has full access to the audits of crown corporations, either CDIC or held by CDIC or reporting to me, and when those audits are completed the Auditor General has access to the auditors of those corporations to pursue any line of inquiry he wishes.

Senator Roblin: Well, of course, my honourable friend knows perfectly well that I am not talking about auditing in the sense of what accountants agree is professionally appropriate. That has nothing to do with this issue at all; it is a question of what is appropriate for Parliament. Parliament wants an audit; Parliament wants control over the spending of government funds, and I do not think Parliament cares very much what the auditing profession may think about it. Parliament wants to have that right and, indeed, it has that right, but it is seldom honoured.

I point out to my honourable friend, though, that the Auditor General specifically made the point that he would like to have the audit of the CDIC as part of his responsibility. I hope that when the bill is presented the minister will be able to give us an assurance that that will be so.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Roblin when he says that Parliament's control over the spending of government is an important principle; it is a principle the details of which are now before Parliament in the form of legislation. When the bill respecting CDC-CDIC is before the Senate Senator Roblin, I and, undoubtedly, other honourable senators, will join in a debate on all the questions that have been raised.

NATIONAL REVENUE

CONFIDENTIALITY OF CERTAIN INFORMATION ON 1982 PERSONAL INCOME TAX RETURN FORMS

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary to the question raised earlier today by the Leader of the Opposition. This matter arose last Friday in the House of Commons as a result of a question put by my successor there for the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River, to which the Minister of National Revenue made some reply. I had an opportunity to see the Minister of National Revenue today and expressed my opinion that his answer was rather inadequate and, perhaps, lame.

I see in The Citizen of today, under the heading "Tax forms open social security number to public" the following was stated:

> A foul-up in Revenue Canada's computers has put each taxpayer's social insurance number on prominent public display in the envelope window of every 1982 personal tax return, adding new gobbledygook to this year's filing nightmare.

Honourable senators, there are four senators in the cabinet, so I wonder if one of them would indicate to us that an inquiry will be made regarding this. I ask that because something was said in the previous questions and answers here today regarding the importance of a principle. I think one of the important principles of the Income Tax Act has always been that everything is done to maintain the secrecy of information supplied to the department.

I would like an inquiry made to determine whether or not the answer given by the Minister of National Revenue was adequate when he said, notwithstanding the fact that Parliament has not yet passed laws regarding averaging of income tax, it was "put there for the convenience of taxpayers."

I should like to know if there is not in this a breach of the present law, and whether a higher percentage of Canadian taxpayers are likely to find this convenient and an aid to their proposed averaging than the high percentage of taxpayers who are inconvenienced and annoyed by this new and unnecessary dessemination of income information.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall ensure that Senator Benidickson's comments are included in the reference I make to the Minister of National Revenue.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Frith for the second reading of Bill C-132, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I apologize to the Deputy Leader of the Government for having been absent during a large part of his speech yesterday afternoon. I have since had an opportunity to read it carefully in Hansard. Of course, I congratulate him for his valiant attempt to lend this measure a significance that it does not deserve.

This bill, honourable senators, is, in my judgment, a waste of Parliament's time. It is part of a package that is retrograde in terms of social policy. The measure itself is quite useless in terms of social policy.

Without meaning any disrespect to the Deputy Leader of the Government, I must say that I find it incongruous that the Minister of State for Social Development, who sits in this chamber, has not seen fit to enter either this debate, or the debate on Bill C-131 that preceded it, in order to defend these measures in the context of the overall social policy and priorities of the government. I quite understand that the Minister of State for Social Development has other assignments, but most of those assignments, including his responsibility for patronage in British Columbia—which assignment he has accepted from the failing hands of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport—have nothing to do with social development. I would invite the Minister of State for Social Development to enter this debate seriously, perhaps at third reading, to explain and defend this measure and associated measures under the so-called six-and-five program in terms of the social priorities and policies of the government.

The six-and-five package, as a whole, is, as I said, retrograde in terms of social policy. This measure is quite useless and irrelevant, I submit, in terms of any fight against inflation.

Honourable senators, what does this bill do? Well, as the Deputy Leader of the Government pointed out, family allowances, in 1983 and 1984, will not be increased automatically to cover the annual increase in the cost of living; instead, they will be increased by a maximum of 6 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984. The loss to a family with two children and an income up to $28,330 in 1982 as a result of this partial de-indexing will be more than offset, as the Deputy Leader of the Government has pointed out, in 1983 by a one-year temporary increase of $50 per child in the child tax credit. This provision is not contained in the legislation before us, but is contained in another measure which, presumably, will be before us in due course.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has stated—and this, by the way, answers a question that was put to the Deputy Leader of the Government yesterday by the Honourable Senator Roblin—that the net savings to the treasury over a two-year period will be in the order of $70 million. What will be saved on the family allowance payments will be $320 million, but $250 million will be spent on the enrichment of the child tax credit. So, there is a net saving forecast to the treasury of some $70 million over the two-year period.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has also stated in the other place that the cost of family allowances to the public treasury is now approximately $2.2 billion annually, of which $500 million is recovered through the tax system. So, to that extent, this universal program is progressive.

This bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of the House of Commons. Witnesses appeared before that committee from the Canadian Council on Social Development, the Ottawa Women's Lobby, the University Women's Club of Ottawa, the Ottawa Council for Low Income Support, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women and the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. Those organizations—all of them—opposed this measure.

Those groups and the opposition parties have taken objection—I think well founded objection—to the measure on the grounds that it penalizes mothers and children for inflation. In 1984, even the poorest will be penalized by the fact that the increase in the family allowance will have fallen below the rate of inflation that we now anticipate. Even if full indexing of family allowances is resumed after this legislation expires—and I note the undertaking given by the Deputy Leader of the Government in this regard yesterday—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, it was not—

Senator Murray: The Deputy Leader of the Government gave a very clear undertaking that full indexing of family allowances would be resumed in 1985.

Senator Frith: As far as this bill is concerned.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That will be the effect of the bill.

Senator Frith: This bill will not touch 1985 and following years. I did not undertake anything more.

Senator Murray: The Deputy Leader of the Government said yesterday—and I can find the quotation in Hansard, if he wishes—that full indexing of family allowances would resume in 1985. Am I not correct?

Senator Frith: As far as this bill is concerned, yes.

• (1450)

Senator Murray: Does the Deputy Leader of the Government anticipate some other decision?

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Murray: If there is any doubt about it, why did he make the point yesterday?

Senator Frith: I did not undertake that that would happen. I just said that this bill would not affect its happening.

Senator Murray: I see. Then the undertaking is a good deal less significant than I thought it was when I first read it in Hansard.

Senator Frith: That is because it was not an undertaking.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It means nothing.

Senator Murray: As Senator Roblin points out, it means nothing.

In any case, the measure has been criticized with good reason on the basis that even if full indexing of the family allowance is resumed after the legislation expires, the base will have been permanently reduced. In terms of overall social policy, the measure has been attacked again, I think, with good reason as another ad hoc measure that creates new anomalies, new inequities and new inconsistencies. For example, becasue of the one-shot increase in the child tax credit, families with two children become net losers under the de-indexing provisions of the bill if their income is above $28,330.

Under Bill C-131 that was passed here last week and given Royal Assent yesterday, the partial de-indexing of the old age pension, families become net losers if their income exceeds $15,000. A single old age pensioner becomes a net loser if his or her annual income exceeds $9,000. Frankly, I find that quite difficult to understand. The child tax credit is being increased. The best that can be said about the guaranteed annual supplement is that it is not being reduced. Where is the equity in that, and what is the rationale for this different treatment in terms of overall social policy?

A 70 year-old widow becomes a net loser under six-and-five once her annual income exceeds $9,000 and has virtually no possibility of recouping her lost income by going out into the labour force. The mother or father of a family has at least the theoretical possibility of recouping some of the lost income. When this measure is taken in concert with the other measures of the six-and-five package that we have seen, it raises very serious questions of equity and rationale and, as I indicated earlier, of the overall social priorities and policies of this government.

The measure was put forward yesterday by the Deputy Leader of the Government in terms of its impact on inflation and the inflationary psychology. I contend that this measure is irrelevant to any fight against inflation. We are told on the other side that inflation is coming down. We have this mindless invocation of six-and-five: Six-and-five is working; six-and-five is working; six-and-five is working.

Hon. Peter Bosa: It is.

Senator Murray: Well, if inflation is coming down a bit, it is not because six-and-five is working, but because 1.6 million Canadians are not working. There are 1.6 million Canadians unemployed because of the disastrous, wrong-headed economic policies of this government, and six-and-five has nothing to do with it.

Senator Bosa: Nonsense!

Senator Murray: The Minister of National Health and Welfare pointed out that this bill, together with the offset provisions of the child tax credit, will result in a net saving of $70 million to the treasury over two years. If I read what the minister said correctly, in 1983 it will result in an increase of $215 million. In terms of any savings to the public treasury, like other elements of six-and-five, it is irrelevant to inflation.

They say inflation is coming down, but compared to what? Inflation in our major trading partner, the United States, was 3.9 per cent, December over December. It was 9.3 per cent in the same period in this country. That figure of 9.3 per cent is exactly as it was when this government took office. That is what we have to show for almost three years with a Liberal government. That is what the Liberals call progress. They are back where they were when they took office in terms of inflation—9.3 per cent—after three years of putting the economy of this country through a wringer and subjecting us to obscenely high interest rates, high unemployment and low investment. We keep hearing this mindless chant: Six-and-five is working; six-and-five is working; six-and-five is working.

In April 1982, before the six-and-five program was introduced, the Conference Board of Canada predicted that the 1982 inflation rate in this country would be 10.2 per cent. In January 1983, six months after six-and-five, they had to acknowledge that the 1982 inflation rate had been 10.8 per cent. In April 1982, before six-and-five was brought in, they predicted that the 1983 inflation rate would be 7.9 per cent. In January 1983, they had adjusted that to a prediction of a 7 per cent inflation rate for 1983. Between the time before six-and-five was brought in and six months afterwards, they made an overall adjustment of three-tenths of 1 per cent. That is pretty insignificant.

Look at the economic growth in that period. In April 1982, before six-and-five, the Conference Board of Canada predicted an economic growth for 1982 of 0.2 per cent. In January 1983, they had to acknowledge that economic growth in this country in 1982 had been minus-5.1 per cent.

In April 1982, they predicted that economic growth in 1983 would be 2.2 per cent. In January they had scaled down that forecast to 1.6 per cent. I saw a new forecast from the Conference Board of Canada this morning that real economic growth in this country in 1983 will be 1 per cent.

We keep hearing this song: six-and-five is working. A week ago Senator Everett said government restraint is working. What restraint? The latest available statement of financial operations put out by the Department of Finance shows that federal government spending between April and November of 1982—those would be the first four or five months of six-and-five—increased by 15.9 per cent over the same period in 1981.

Now we hear it asked sometimes—and I must say I ask the question myself—What about matters like interest on the public debt, unemployment insurance payments, petroleum compensation payments; these payments over which the government has so little control? If you take them out of that figure that I have just cited—the increase of 15.9 per cent—you still have an increase in federal government spending from April to November of 1982 of 15.2 per cent.

What about transfer payments to the provinces? In that period transfer payments to the provinces—equalization, Canada assistance plan, health and post-secondary education—went up by only 8.9 per cent. If you subtract them from the figures I have used, you find that in the period from April to November of 1982 there was an increase of 17.5 per cent in the ongoing expenditures on purely federal government activities. The contention that government restraint is working or, indeed, that there is any government restraint, is contradicted by the figures put out by the Department of Finance itself.

[Senator Murray.]

• (1500)

When considering the six-and-five program, one is struck, not so much by its application, but by the interesting exceptions that have been made. Five hundred editorial employees of the CBC received increases of 11.5 per cent from November 30 last. CMHC rents have been increased by 22 per cent in Churchill, Manitoba; by 15 per cent in Winnipeg; by 14 per cent in Thompson; and by 35 per cent cent in Coldbrook, Nova Scotia. There has been a 12½ per cent increase for federal housing in the Northwest Territories. One wonders whether CMHC has heard about the brave new world of six-and-five.

What about the 50 per cent increase in unemployment insurance premiums? What about the 12.1 per cent increase in Canada Pension Plan premiums paid by anyone in Canada earning $18,500 or more next year? What about the 10 per cent increase in St. Lawrence Seaway tolls, and so on? The exceptions are more interesting than the application of the program.

Where six-and-five is contributing "wonderfully" is on such measures as the de-indexing of income tax proposals announced in June by the Minister of Finance, which will take $1 billion in demand out of the Canadian economy, plunging us further into this Liberal depression. This is the deflating effect of the six-and-five program—creating unemployment and stifling recovery.

We have 1.6 million people unemployed in this country. Since August 1981 there has been a net loss of 578,00 jobs, 307,000 of them in the manufacturing sector. Since the six-and-five program was introduced, between June 1982 and January 1983, employment is down by 168,000, and unemployment is up by 158,000, persons.

According to the preliminary estimates for 1982 prepared by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, Canada's real economic growth in 1982 was the worst in the industrialized world at minus-5.1 per cent. We were twenty-fourth out of 24 countries surveyed.

The OECD forecast for 1983 is that Canada will have the second highest unemployment of seven major countries surveyed. Of 10 major countries, we are the only country in which industrial productivity has decreased. The prospects do not look too much brighter in the brave new world of six-and-five.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce did a survey in October and November showing that Canada's larger firms will reduce their capital investment by 8 per cent in 1983. The 1982 level already represents a 6 per cent decrease from 1981. This is a disgraceful performance and a very sad outlook that the government's economic policies have brought about.

This bill, I say, is a waste of parliamentary time; useless in terms of social policy; irrelevant to inflation; a shallow public relations exercise; a show of smoke and mirrors; not a policy, but a lame excuse for a policy, and I will have no hesitation at all voting against it.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to make an intervention in the debate on this bill. I very much appreciate the speeches made by the Deputy Leader of the Government and Senator Murray.

All of us in this chamber recognize the problems of inflation, and all of us hope that there will be even one small step taken by every sector in the fight against inflation.

It seems to me that the focus by many Canadians has been on the government to take a lead. Many Canadians hold the view that inflation is the fault of the Liberal government, and argue that the Liberals should do something about it. I believe Senator Murray's own party has put forward that same argument. "Cut down on the deficit," they keep saying.

I would point out that in Canada we spend some $8 billion on social programs. Therefore, I, for one, feel that we should be analyzing how that money is spent.

Along with Senator Murray, I have been disappointed and dismayed with the ad hoc approach we have taken in the form of the three bills that have recently come before us. I feel we have taken a shotgun approach. In the instance of the bill to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, both barrels of the shotgun were fired into the woods, not knowing who or how many would be the victims.

As I listened to that first of the trinity, the bill dealing with supplementary retirement benefits for civil servants, I noted that in 1982 30,000 widows of former civil servants lived on less than $3,200. I found that statement in the Citizen of February 15.

I have talked with responsible senators and members of Parliament who, I think, are extremely sensitive to the pulse of this capital city, and they have assured me that there are not that many in need. On the other hand, I received no satisfaction from either Mr. Barnes, who appeared before our committee, or the minister, who said he would look into this matter, and I still do not know how many retired public servants' total income is below the threshold.

My hope and, indeed, the hope of a number of senators here is that the minister will establish a threshold so that those in such need do not suffer. I look forward to hearing about this in the near future because there is some urgency in knowing how successful the minister has been in pursuing the need for a threshold for those relying solely on the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

I would now turn to the next bill we were asked to pass, the one amending the Old Age Security Act. I could not vote in favour of that bill either because, as I stated in the chamber, I thought the threshold was too low and that it affected the victims of inflation rather than those who should be tightening their belts. Some of the people it affects have already tightened their belts drastically. Their belts have been tightened enough.

● (1510)

With respect to the bill before us, I am pleased to say that it has the ingredients which make it sensitive and humane. It has contained within it the provision of the child tax credit, which will affect two-thirds of mothers in Canada. It has the sensitivity to arrange for the $50 extra credit which will be paid quickly to the mother so that she can plan accordingly. It has the threshold aspect, and it is generous. It is provided for families which have an income of less than $26,330 in 1982. This threshold is much more generous than that of the last bill that came before us. The cutoff in this bill actually goes up to $38,000, but the cutoff for pensioners—which honourable senators voted for—is $9,000 for a single pensioner.

I ask any one of you honourable senators to search in your heart and to imagine how you would wish an older relative of yours to survive in a large city on $9,000 a year. I ask honourable senators how you would wish that relative of yours, who is trying to survive, to be asked to tighten his belt a little more in order to fight against inflation.

Honourable senators, I wanted to clarify why I did not vote for the last two bills and why I am predisposed to vote for this bill. I think that Bill C-132 has in it the ingredient of a threshold that is high enough to look after the needs of the children of two-thirds of the mothers of Canada, who will still get their family allowances. I would agree with Senator Murray; I would agree with the minister who is looking at the pressing need for an examination of our entire social security system. She has the green paper on pensions. There is, indeed, a desperate need for a broad examination in this area.

Honourable senators, I feel uncomfortable because our approach in the Senate at this time is, in my terms, an ad hoc one which has been ungenerous, harsh and unfeeling in terms of the other two bills we passed. I am glad to say, however, that, because of some of the qualities of understanding, sensitivity and generosity embodied in this bill respecting the needs of children, I support it.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a brief intervention, the main purpose of which is to ask a couple of questions of the sponsor of the bill. Yesterday afternoon, when he was belabouring the point that this piece of legislation—the third part of the Trudeau trinity—is an integral and essential part of the six-and-five program, I noticed a father and his son of about three years of age come into the gallery. After the father had received the seating plan, he was pointing at the sponsor of the bill. I am sure he was telling the young lad that there was a "six-and-fiver" taking away the boy's new shoes. Honourable senators, I am glad the sponsor of the bill did not look up into the gallery at that time, because, had he done so, he would have found it difficult to complete his remarks.

The government has not been very fortunate in introducing its legislation into the Senate. Last week, when the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act was introduced, an announcement was made in the other place concerning the salaries to be paid the members of the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects. We learned the salary of the chairman, $800 a day, and that delightful additional benefit, the raising of that payment to $925 a day when he leaves Toronto. To pay one day's salary of the chairman, a donation from the indexation of about 1,800 old age security recipients is required. As both I and Senator Donahoe mentioned last week, such payments do not appear to contribute to inflation!

When this bill was introduced here this week, there was an announcement made that the directors of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation have had their per diem payment increased from $150 to $450. Honourable senators, where is the reduction of inflationary expectations with respect to these raises? What has happened to the control that was so essential yesterday afernoon? A raise from $150 to $450 per day has no effect on inflation! That is hard to reconcile with yesterday's arguments. It is also difficult to understand how the purchase of a new pair of shoes for that youngster in the gallery causes inflation, while Mr. Macdonald's salary does not. Perhaps the textile industry in Quebec is so prosperous that it does not need any further contributions in the form of purchases of clothing. The directors of CMHC, however, need another $300 per day!

I should like the sponsor of the bill, when he closes the debate, to take a moment to explain to me that aspect of the six-and-five program. Honourable senators, I have a different interpretation of the six-and-five program and the way it is working. The six-and-five program is taking a little bit from just about everyone to give a great deal to a very few privileged directors of crown corporations and Liberal supporters in other situations.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that, if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, dealing with the interventions in reverse order, I can assure Senator Phillips—who, I have noticed, has been intervening frequently on behalf of the opposition with respect to bills that deal with economics—that I do not ask him or any other senator to support this bill on the basis of shoes in the gallery, Mr. Macdonald's salary or the salaries of directors of CMHC. I note that Senator Phillips has become something of a resident economic adviser to the chamber. I am sure that when he reflects upon the issue before us—second reading and explanation of the principle of Bill C-132—and makes the comparison between the shoes, the salary, the CMHC and this bill's attempt to reduce inflationary expectations, he will have a further and more thoughtful lecture or series of questions for us.

With reference to Senator Thompson, I heard with interest his views on Bill C-133 and Bill C-131 at the time of their debate here. With his customary sensitivity and discrimination, in the sense of having discriminating judgment rather than practising discrimination in any pejorative sense, he said that he detected a difference in principle, particularly with regard to equity and fairness, in this bill as compared to the other two. As he has pointed out, the principles of equity that apply and are reflected in this bill are meant to further underline the fact that the purpose of the bill is not to effect the savings that have been referred to but, rather, to reduce inflationary expectations. It is true that there is a savings effect, but the purpose of the bill is not to save revenue.

[Senator Phillips.]

• (1520)

With reference to Senator Murray, I was a little surprised to hear him venting his frustrations on this worthy little bill, part as it is of a worthy program that is working. I can understand, in view of the frustrating experiences that he has undergone recently, and for which he has all of our empathy, if not sympathy, that he finds it even more frustrating that, as he said, "six-and-five" is working and inflation is coming down. A frustrating experience, indeed, for members of the opposition. However, I agree with him about assessing the cause. I cannot say with the absolute authority of edicts carved on tablets of stone that the six-and-five program has brought down inflation. Neither can he say with similar authority, however, that it has not. It is a matter of opinion. I am sure he respects my opinion on the subject to the same extent that I respect his.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I do not know if I would settle for that.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the basic thrusts of Senator Murray's intervention were, first, that this bill is retrograde insofar as social policy is concerned—

Senator Flynn: It is a package.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am limiting myself to the bill at the present time. We can have a debate, perhaps, some time on "six-and-five" generally. At the moment, however, I am asking honourable senators to support Bill C-132—

Senator Flynn: In isolation.

Senator Frith: Bill C-132 is a part of the six-and-five program. I think it is a worthy part, as I have said, of a worthy program that is working. It is not offered as a breakthrough in social policy, but as a continuation of the social policy of which family allowances is a part, and as an adjustment of the economic consequences of that social policy.

The social policy remains intact. Universality remains intact. The social sector that is the target of the program remains intact. Indexing remains intact. The economic effect on the social program is adjusted for the purpose of reducing the expectation of inflation that has such an inflammatory effect on the inflationary process.

Honourable senators, for that reason, and for the reason I mentioned in my original intervention, I ask you to support the principle of this bill, thus helping to promote the effect we believe it is having in reducing inflation, and thereby taking one step more towards economic recovery.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., that this bill be read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

However, before the question is put there are two pieces of information, which flow from yesterday's date that should be placed on the record. The information may be of assistance to senators attending the meeting of the committee.

• (1540)

The first is supplementary information to what appeared on the record yesterday in answer to a question by Senator Roblin. It is a document outlining the impact of the six-and-five program on family allowance beneficiaries. It gives the number of beneficiaries, which I was not able to give yesterday. The table also sets out what the 3.6 million family allowance beneficiaries will receive as a result of limiting indexation of family allowances to 6 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984. The document then refers to the 2.4 million people mentioned in the debate who are classed as low-and middle income beneficiaries, and includes columns showing changes in child benefits for 1983 and 1984. The document also sets out the net gain to families and the offsets for 1983 and 1984, which Senator Roblin wanted.

So, honourable senators, may I have leave to have that document appear in the Debates of the Senate as part of the intervention I am now making?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The table follows:)

IMPACT ON FA BENEFICIARIES

As a result of limiting indexation of FA to 6 p. 100 in 1983 and 5 p. 100 in 1984, all 3.6 million FA beneficiaries will receive:

$16.80 less per child in 1983
$28.32 less per child in 1984

2.4 million low—and middle-income FA beneficiaries will be no worse off during the two-year period. Their FA reductions will be offset by a $50 increase in the child tax credit for 1983. This offset is illustrated below.

1983 Changes in Child Benefits	1984 Changes in Child Benefits
+ $50.00 (CTC increase)	- $28.32 (FA reduction)
- $16.80 (FA reduction)
+ $33.20 (Net gain to families)	- $28.32 (Net loss to families)

Net gain in 1983 offsets net loss in 1984.

1.2 million high income FA beneficiaries will be worse off. These beneficiaries do not quality for the child tax credit.

In 1985 and subsequent years, total FA and CTC benefits will be lower because of June 1982 budget proposals.

Senator Frith: The second document relates to a question asked yesterday by Senator Tremblay.

[Translation]

When I answered yesterday, I could not provide the exact figures on the results of the program as it applies to the Province of Quebec. Since then, I have made some calculations applicable to the two provinces concerned. It seems that the figures for Alberta are 5.7 per cent, 6.1 per cent, 6.1 per cent, and 6 per cent. For the Province of Quebec, however, I admit that I was rather surprised to come up with a general figure of 6 per cent.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): For the year 1983 and 1984?

Senator Frith: For 1982 and 1983. In any case, we will be able to examine them.

Senator Flynn: Indeed.

Senator Frith: It is 6 per cent in each category. It would seem that the change in the Province of Quebec has affected not only the age, as in Alberta, but also the rank, let us say, for instance the second and third children. In any event, the committee will have an opportunity to study it tomorrow. In the meantime, honourable senators will be able to examine the figures in this table which I would like to table, with leave of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The table follows:)

ADJUSTMENTS TO FA RATES
BY ALBERTA AND QUEBEC

Alberta and Quebec have enacted provincial laws, under Section 4 of the Federal Family Allowances Act, to vary the allowance rate according to the age and/or number of children in the family.

The federal act requires that total payments in these provinces, over a four-year accounting period, must average out to the federal rate. 1982 is the first year of the current four-year period.

Alberta and Quebec have set 1983 rates which result in an average benefit equivalent to the federal rates provided in Bill C-132.

1982 and 1983 family allowance rates for Alberta and Quebec are as follows:

ALBERTA

Age of Child	1982 Amount	1983 Amount	Percentage Increase
0– 6	20.90	22.10	5.7
7–11	26.10	27.70	6.1
12–15	34.30	36.40	6.1
16–17	38.50	40.80	6.0

QUEBEC

Age	Rank of Child	1982 Amount	1983 Amount	Per-centage Increase
0–11	1st	16.15	17.12	6.0
	2nd	25.65	27.19	6.0
	Subsequent	62.43	66.18	6.0
12–17	1st	22.88	24.25	6.0
	2nd	32.38	34.32	6.0
	Subsequent	69.16	73.31	6.0

Senator Frith: According to the information I have, arrangements have been made for the committee to meet tomorrow at 10 a.m., and the minister will be present.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT

PROPOSED ALLEVIATION BY ESTABLISHMENT OF ARMED FORCES ENLISTMENT PROGRAM—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, February 10, 1983:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing an enlistment program in the Armed Forces to help solve the unemployment problem affecting our young people and to teach them useful skills and to provide other training commensurate with today's needs.

He said: Honourable senators, my inquiry has to do with the establishment of an enlistment program in the Armed Forces to help solve the unemployment problem affecting our young people, to teach them useful skills and to provide other training commensurate with today's needs.

I believe, as do countless others, that the future of any nation is its youth, and Canada cannot afford to have so many well educated and uneducated young people waste their lives in idleness. Everyone needs a feeling of self-worth, a purpose in life, and unless we succeed in providing meaningful employment and opportunities for the youth of our nation, the consequences could be serious. When too many members of a generation find themselves shorn of hope and their dreams shattered, there is a real and dangerous risk that they will feel that the only recourse is to challenge the very tenets of the society that let things reach such a stage. We need to build a true and decent society and at the same time create meaningful jobs for young Canadians. If we cannot do so, the structure of our society could be weakened to the point of crumbling.

Honourable senators, those words are not wholly my own. Rather, they are observations of some historians much wiser than I. Similar words have been uttered at various times in our history, but they were never more appropriate than they are at this very moment in time. I make mention of these words because they are so relevant to the subject of my inquiry, which subject arose in the other place, to recruit or place between 25,000 and 50,000 young, unemployed Canadians in the military.

The idea is not new. I recall and, indeed, participated in, during the Diefenbaker government, in the early 1960s, a program which was initiated on the basis of six-week training courses, nationwide, under the supervision of regular and reserve cooperative command and control. The courses were held in armouries across the country to relieve the serious unemployment situation of that day and, as I recall, they were very successful. Honourable senators should note that the Senate Subcommittee on National Defence recommended increases in the reserves, which would provide a basis for justification of the idea, and implored the government to implement a plan immediately to raise the level of the military by 8,400 by 1987.

Certainly, a join-up plan is worth investigating through to reality, because it has the support of the majority of the members of the other place with some 209 indicating that support—a rarity in these days—and I have every confidence that it will receive the support of this chamber.

For my own part, however, I would go beyond the idea suggested and make it more permanent, because permanency would produce double or even triple benefits for our country over the years: it would relieve unemployment; it would help fulfil Canada's defence commitment; and it would help in the development of our youth. That is a subject I shall deal with more fully a little later, although what I have to say will most likely be ignored, just as most of what we have to say in this chamber is ignored. Development of our youth is something I have advocated for many years because of my concern over the direction our country is taking in relationship to our youth.

Please, honourable senators, let me be a little bit of a braggart to prove my long-standing support of national service for our youth by quoting from an editorial in the Halifax Chronicle Herald of June 1982:

> It is with some interest that we reflect on remarks made on the subject of national service in the Senate by Senator Jack Marshall who wanted to associate himself with the Senate subcommittee report on Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces, particularly with reference to recommendations and reserve strengths. "Personally," he told the upper house, "I would go further and suggest the formulation of national compulsory service under a youth development program. It would apply to youths of 16 and 17 years of age, and the period of service would be for six months." It was not the senator's first reference to some form of national service by young people, nor is it likely to be his last.

Honourable senators, I still want some concept of military service, but not as a means of teaching our youth to learn how to kill. The Lord only knows, television is teaching murder and violence better than any military instructor could. I want all young Canadians to be given the opportunity to vent their energies, not with anger and hostility towards our society. I do not want them to be engrained with the philosophy that takes for granted idleness and government hand-outs. Our efforts should be directed towards extracting the multitude of talents that we know they all have in their young bodies and minds; towards giving them something meaningful to do, challenges to accept and objectives to strive for by promoting discipline, leadership, self-appreciation, fitness, survival, comradeship, respect and service to their fellow citizens and the nation as a whole.

Honourable senators, just last week the Minister of Finance rightly described the plight of our 1.6 million unemployed Canadians as a moral and social challenge of staggering proportions. He also said that he could foresee no significant reduction in unemployment as being likely this year, not only in Canada but on a worldwide basis, so isn't it obvious that action has to be taken and taken now? If we look for a moment at some of the related statistics, we find, first of all, that of the 1.6 million unemployed some 595,000 are in the 15-to-24 age group, the age bracket we are concerned about. On the same subject, a reasonable estimate is that the cost of unemployment insurance benefits for the past year will have hit some $8.5 billion, and we can say, without fear of too much contradiction, that almost $3.5 billion went to the youth of our society that I am referring to.

Honourable senators, my purpose in mentioning those figures is to show that if a program were introduced, even in the proportions recommended by the Subcommittee on National Defence, it would not affect our defence budget very seriously. Indeed, it would be of great benefit to our defence forces because we would be using payments from unemployment insurance benefits.

First of all, let us examine the financial implications of the subcommittee's recommendations:

> On the basis of reliable research, the Sub-committee estimates that the extra cost of increasing the armed forces to 92,000 Regulars and 47,500 Reserves by 1987 would be about $350 million per year in 1981 dollars, or six per cent of the present defence budget. This includes funds for capital and other initial expenditures and for continuing annual personnel costs.
> Capital and other initial expenditures would amount to about $1,300 million dollars, phased in over a period of about five years. Half would be allocated to purchases of new equipment and ammunition for the larger force in Europe and Canada. The remainder would be required for the construction of new base installations and training facilities; additional costs related to a larger Supplementary Reserve; and other expenditures of a similar nature.

• (1600)

> Additional annual Personnel, Operations and Maintenance (PO&M) costs would also be incurred as manpower levels were raised. They would amount to about $100 million more... in 1985/86 when an additional 2,400 troops would be added to Canadian Forces Europe in accordance with the Sub-committee's recommendations. They would then rise to $350 million by 1987, when a further 6,000 personnel would be added to the Canadian armed forces.

So, if these figures are anywhere near correct—that we can increase our forces personnel by 8,400 at a cost of $350 million—certainly we can increase them by 10 times that amount, or 84,000, for the $3.5 billion we are paying out in unemployment insurance benefits.

This might be too simplistic, but it is certainly worthwhile exploring, and any shortfall could be made up from monies allocated to all the other programs such as local initiatives, community development, NEED, Outreach, and many others which are certainly questionable as to their end results. Indeed, many of those programs could be superimposed within the military training sphere of endeavour. I understand that, from 1971 to the present, the government has spent $3.5 billion on many of those programs.

Honourable senators, we now come to the difficult part, and that is how a program of such proportions can be carried out. As we learned in basic training during the Second World War, when planning an exercise we had to make an appreciation of the situation, weigh the advantages against the disadvantages, make a decision and get on with the job.

One disadvantage that I can detect is the attitude of society against anything military. It is obvious that much of this attitude, however, is dispelled, as evidenced by the vocal support of members of Parliament who represent a large majority of the Canadian people.

Certainly, the program would be a war against unemployment, along with a war against the lack of opportunity for our youth. If the program were carried out well, it would not be long before attitudes changed.

This is what the Minister of National Defence had to say about society's attitude, in a speech to the Conference of Defence Associations recently:

> I do not despair about the perception of the Canadian public in regard to the place of our forces in Canadian society. While I am somewhat reluctant to thrust strictly military programs upon the government as part of our job-creation efforts, I have been encouraged by the widespread suggestions of Canadians from all across this country that a military program of some sort would be beneficial both in terms of meeting our requirement for trained reserves and in giving our youth invaluable training and personal development.

The other disadvantage I see is the cost, and the ability of the Canadian Forces, who are strained to the utmost in carrying out their present commitments, to oversee the program. To my mind, there is no question that, with government support, and a realistic readjustment of priorities, a youth enlistment program could reap untold benefits both now and in the future.

If you want to take the cost per recruit and compare it to local incentive grants, the government is prepared to pay $30,000, $40,000 or $50,000 to create a job, yet the cost of training one recruit is $25,000.

The first advantage to the Canadian Forces would be that it could carry out a practical exercise in mobilization and manning, and specifically put into practice recruiting on an emergency basis. It would allow the Department of National Defence to test its efforts to maintain sufficient capability within Canada to assure the protection and security of the country, and to allow a testing of the requirement of the total force concept, which exploits the full potential of both the supplementary and primary reserves.

Again, from the Minister of National Defence:

> Any wartime commitment of significant size or duration would obviously require additional personnel from the reserves. Furthermore, the force must have the necessary plans and preparations which would enable it, in a sustained crisis, to carry out even further expansion.

The minister went on to state:

> I am not talking about the type of national mobilization which occurred in the two world wars, but I am talking about the need for plans and preparations which would enable the Canadian Forces in a crisis to immediately activate its full war establishment, made up of both its regular force and substantially improved reserve components. It is this type of mobilization plan which will flow from the government's decision to ensure that Canada's forces will be able to meet and sustain their defence commitments during the 1980s—
> In the long term, the ability to sustain the operations of the Canadian Forces during a crisis is dependent on the state of our national industrial readiness which obviously lies beyond the sole purview of the Department of National Defence. It is, nevertheless, my intention to pursue this issue with the responsible departments and agencies.

I agree wholeheartedly with the minister, because any program on any scale would have to have the cooperation of outside industry and business.

Honourable senators, I can see countless other advantages that an enlistment program for youth employment would allow, and I list but a few. The service would provide Canada with a greatly enlarged supplementary reserve of young, well motivated citizens with military experience to draw on in an emergency situation; it would put a sense of realism into the training of those in the reserve forces who are the leaders and officers, who are now getting low in morale because of the repetitiveness of the training; and it would provide ambitious but discouraged young men and women with trades training and career options that previously might not have looked attractive to them. We read every day about engineering graduates who cannot find a job. Those graduates are going to waste.

Before I conclude, honourable senators, I have a word or two to say on support services. Training space and facilities for training must be uppermost in our minds to take on an expanded program of this sort. Apart from the fact that we allowed for some in the recommendations of our Subcommittee on National Defence, I am sure that, besides the existing armories which would be used, others which have closed down over the years could be re-opened. That would create employment. Schools which have been closed down over the years could be re-opened; existing schools could be utilized. There would be improvements to existing firing ranges, and new ones could be built. And, I daresay, even government buildings which lie vacant could be put to use.

To put the final touches to my thoughts, honourable senators, I want to relate the words of a young man whom I have come to know. To me, he is typical of what we should strive for in producing a good Canadian. He is now studying at university and is about to enter an officer training program in the forces. For 10 years he went through the cadet services and obtained the designation of Master Cadet. He went through the militia as an officer and cadet instructor. He gained a B.A. with honours in 1981, and is now doing his master's thesis in Canadian defence policy. Besides the many things he had to say about what his experience in the militia had taught him, he said this about something he learned about regional differences:

> A common thread in all of my military experiences has been the uniqueness of the Canadian character. While certain regional differences are obvious in individuals from Newfoundland and Ontario, Quebec and Alberta, the constant in all of these experiences is that when these people were thrown together they worked as a team together. This I attribute to our distinctly Canadian institutions which ensure the continuance of our varied way of life despite competitive rivalries among the members of our family. The Canadian military is a levelling institution which has the capacity to cut through all the regional differences we have on the future of our country and allows us to see our common strength as a nation.

Honourable senators, I suppose I have gone on long enough, but I should like to see the whole matter of an enlistment program referred to a committee—perhaps the Senate Subcommittee on National Defence. Although I have not checked this out with the chairman of that subcommittee, I do not see why we could not take that on and produce a program that could be implemented in line with recommendations by military experts in their projections to the 1990s. Admiral Timbrell told us just yesterday that he projected the need to be 150,000 by 1990. Colonel Liston, when speaking to the Institute of Strategic Studies, mentioned a figure in the area of 100,000.

I guess I can summarize the whole subject in a couple of lines: If, God forbid, we have a war, what is wrong with being prepared? And, please God, if we don't, we have lost nothing; indeed, we have gained a better Canadian.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

THE HONOURABLE EDGAR FOURNIER

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION FROM SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, our colleague, Senator Edgar Fournier, has resigned from the Senate for health reasons, and I am sure we all regret the fact that he is leaving us after a career in politics that lasted over thirty years.

Senator Fournier was elected to the New Brunswick Legislature in 1952 and was immediately appointed President of the New Brunswick Hydro-Electric Commission in the cabinet of the Honourable Hugh John Flemming. He was re-elected in 1956, and kept the same position until the elections in 1960, when our friend Senator Robichaud came to power. That year, Senator Fournier was defeated in his riding, but the year after, 1961, when a by-election was called in Madawaska-Restigouche, he succeeded in being elected as a Member of the House of Commons. In 1962, he was defeated by a narrow margin, but was subsequently—and it was a case similar to mine—appointed to the Senate a few months later. He has therefore been in the Senate for twenty years, since September 1962. Senator Fournier discharged his responsibilities in the provincial political arena and here in the Senate with great dedication. There are many things I could mention, but I would like to emphasize the role he played as Vice-chairman of the Committee on Poverty which was widely reported by the press and received a great deal of praise. The committee was chaired by Senator Croll, and in fact, Senator Croll was planning to say a few words about Senator Fournier's contribution to the Committee's Report on Poverty, and I believe he will do so at the first opportunity.

Before entering provincial politics, Senator Fournier had been active in a number of organizations in the community, such as the Chamber of Commerce, St. John Ambulance and the Edmundston Vocational School. They say he started his political career by driving around in a car with a loudspeaker, and that he went to the church door after service, where he could find an audience. I think that Acadians belonging to the Progressive Conservative Party had to be bold to be successful, because there were not many of them. And not many Progressive Conservatives of that generation succeeded in making a political career for themselves in New Brunswick. The same applies, of course, to Quebec, but at that time it was not as bad. Today, it is worse in Quebec, and less so in New Brunswick. Times certainly have changed.

As a person, Edgar Fournier has tremendously endearing qualities. He is warmhearted and generous, and has always been very dedicated to and understanding of others. He is an exemplary husband and father, and a profoundly religious man. We know he has been very active in the parliamentary institution organization known as the Prayer Breakfast. I think we shall fondly remember the years that Edgar Fournier was in the Senate. As I have said, he is an extremely endearing man. He is now going back to live, this time more or less permanently, in his beloved Madawaska, with his wife and family. People are more relaxed there than they are here, and I am sure he will spend many happy years doing what he likes doing best, leaving behind the thankless and frustrating world of politics.

We wish him the very best.

• (1405)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I too would like to pay tribute to Senator Edgar Fournier who resigned from the Senate last week.

I became acquainted with Senator Fournier early in the sixties. During the early or mid-sixties, there were a number of occasions on which he displayed warmth, and mild and sincere dedication, to the public service and to other people involved in the legislative process, especially in committee work. My acquaintance and respect for him goes back to those days.

The resignation of Senator Fournier leaves a great vacuum in this chamber because he had one of the most varied backgrounds of any senator. As Senator Flynn has already mentioned, Senator Fournier entered politics in 1952 as an MLA in New Brunswick. He subsequently served as minister without portfolio and Chairman of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission under Premier Hugh John Flemming before coming to Ottawa, as has been pointed out, as a member of the House of Commons in 1961.

The Senate is fortunate to have had the benefit of Senator Fournier's experience for over 20 years, and I regret that his health has not permitted him to stay longer.

However, Senator Fournier is a unique man; one who has expertise in a wide number of areas not usually associated with the art of politics. He had a quite varied career before he entered politics, adding to the experience that he carried into these deliberations in Ottawa. For example, he started out delivering coal between Edmundston and Maine in the days when one unloaded trucks by hand. He was a welder and a metal worker, a garage and a snow-plough operator, a teacher at vocational schools, and he also served as an instructor in aircraft maintenance under the British Commonwealth Flight Training Plan.

Senator Fournier is also known as an inventor. Among the inventions he has designed and built is the first one-stroke magnetically-driven motor in the world, displaying his interest in efficient energy use.

His unique background brought to the Senate a point of view and expertise which was, I think, unequalled in the time that he served here. This was evident in the contributions he made to the many Senate committees of which he was a member.

A true representative of the people, Senator Fournier interested himself in many of the most crucial social issues affecting Canadians during the time he spent contributing to the public affairs of the country. In this connection, I should like to mention briefly his contribution to the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies. As the Leader of the Opposition has already mentioned, Senator Fournier's fight against poverty and unemployment is well known, as well as his interest in good passenger rail services to his home province of New Brunswick and, particularly, to that part of New Brunswick which is highly dependent on rail passenger service.

Senator Fournier will be sorely missed here, not only because of his contributions to public life but because of the good humour and mild and gentle nature which were always a part of him. It is unfortunate that his health has not allowed him to continue as long as I am sure he would have liked. However, honourable senators know that Senator Fournier is a fighter and has overcome health problems in the past. In this vein, and on behalf of those of us on the government side, I should like to wish him and his family good health and to wish him a happy and productive retirement.

• (1410)

I conclude by saying that Senator Fournier leaves no one but friends here, and I am certain that I am speaking on behalf of all honourable senators when I say he will be welcomed back at any time he decides to pay us a visit.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, we were somewhat surprised to hear the announcement made by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, regarding, I believe, the resignation of Senator Edgar Fournier.

First of all, on behalf of New Brunswick Francophones, I would like to say to Senator Fournier and his family that all Acadians, all New Brunswick Francophones have appreciated his work on behalf of New Brunswick, first as an MPP and a Provincial Minister and subsequently as a representative of New Brunswick Francophones here in the Senate. I remember when Senator Fournier was President of the New Brunswick Hydro-Electric Commission, when the number of Francophones in the provincial cabinet was considerably less than it has been since 1960 and than it is now.

Traditionally—the tradition was fairly well established—when there were two Francophones in the New Brunswick cabinet, that was a lot. In Senator Fournier's time, there were two Francophones in the New Brunswick Government. Although both were supporters of the Progressive Conservative Party, I still remember what they did for the province, Edgar Fournier and Roger Pichette.

Edgar Fournier won the respect not only of his fellow Francophones but of the entire population of New Brunswick. He introduced many innovations in the production of electric power, as the architect of the first dam on the Saint John-Beachwood River. Here in the Senate, as was said by Senator Flynn and Senator Olson, he worked on a number of committees. I remember that the first time I ever had dealings with the Senate was when I appeared before the Committee on Poverty. I was Minister of Social Affairs of New Brunswick at the time. I remember some interesting exchanges I had with Senator Fournier and his concern for the plight of the less fortunate, not only in New Brunswick but across Canada.

Perhaps I may remind this House that when I arrived here as a senator in 1979, I was the fourth Francophone from New Brunswick, which means that three other Francophones were already sitting in the Senate, namely, Senator Robichaud and the two Fourniers, Michel and Edgar. Now, Francophones are represented by only two senators, myself included. They are undoubtedly well represented by Senator Robichaud, but I hope that the Prime Minister or whoever is responsible for appointing senators, will soon give the Acadian and Francophone population of New Brunswick the representation to which it is entitled in the Senate.

Once again, on behalf of all New Brunswick Francophones, we thank Senator Fournier for a job well done.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I just want to add a few words concerning the retirement of the Honourable Senator Fournier who was one of my great friends. I heard he was going to retire only a few moments ago. I sat with him in the House of Commons and here in the Senate for a number of years. We often went to the Parliamentary Restaurant together where, oddly enough, we talked about everything under the sun, except politics.

Senator Fournier, as Senator Flynn already pointed out, did a tremendous job in conjunction with Senator Croll. He also worked on the Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies. I think we can all agree that we are losing a colleague, but above all, we are losing a great friend.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 17, 1983

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, to which was referred Bill C-132, intituled

"An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, February 16, 1983, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Chairman

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 1, 1983, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Before the motion is put, I wish to give some information on the business in the other place. Today the House will proceed with the second reading of the borrowing authority bill; Friday will be an opposition day; and next Monday the other place will resume its debate on Bill C-139, which is, an omnibus budget bill, if you will pardon that expression.

• (1420)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Comprehensive.

Senator Frith: Perhaps "comprehensive" is a less provocative word. There may be a vote on that bill next week, but it will only be for that particular stage, not the final stage. Wednesday is a private members' day; and on Thursday they will continue their consideration of Bill C-139 or the borrowing authority bill.

All that means, honourable senators, is that there is virtually no chance of our receiving any legislation from the other place next week, and, insofar as I am aware, there will be no bills introduced in the Senate next week. For that reason, I suggest that we adjourn until Tuesday, March 1 at 8 o'clock in the evening.

There is, however, plenty of work for the committees. I understand that at least three of them will be meeting next week. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has several items of business before it; the Northern Pipeline Committee is studying its report; and the Subcommittee on National Defence of the Foreign Affairs Committee will be working, though not in Ottawa.

Hon. Lowell Murray: The Official Languages Committee will also be meeting.

Senator Frith: Senator Murray informs me that the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages will also be meeting.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: My committee has two meetings.

Senator Frith: Senator Godfrey informs me that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will be meeting too. Keep those meetings coming, honourable senators. Are there any more?

Thus, for the aforementioned reasons, it will not be necessary for the Senate to sit. That will give the committees ample opportunity to deal with their important and voluminous work, and that is why I propose that we adjourn until Tuesday, March 1, at 8 p.m., rather than until next Tuesday.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators the explanation given by the Deputy Leader of the Government is quite convincing. The main reason why the Senate is not to sit is that the House of Commons will not be sending over any legislation. I do not think that we should be afraid of admitting that we are not going to be sitting when the House of Commons is not expected to send us any legislation and we have none being introduced here. I suppose that the scenario described by the deputy leader takes for granted that the Senate will give third reading to Bill C-132 this afternoon, for, if that were not the case, the plan of the deputy leader would be somewhat upset.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: I can tell you that it would not do him any good.

Senator Flynn: I am sure he is quite indifferent to that.

I suppose also that it means that Royal Assent has been pre-arranged and that as soon as the bill receives third reading the Speaker will rise and give notice of Royal Assent later this afternoon.

Perhaps I should also take this opportunity to ask whether the deputy leader has done anything about my suggestion on changing the procedure followed to provide Royal Assent to bills. Certainly, Royal Assent does not create a problem today, but apparently on Tuesday it was not convenient for the Deputy Governor General to come at the regular hour. As a result, Royal Assent was held at an awkward hour and only about ten Members of Parliament accompanied the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons on that occasion. Can the deputy leader tell us whether he has done anything about, for example, arranging a meeting between the Speakers of the two houses and the house leader of the other place to provide a solution?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition has raised three points. The first was whether the plan not to sit next week takes into account the third reading of Bill C-132. That is part of the plan and certainly part of the expectation. Honourable senators will note that I did not move the motion to adjourn until March 1 until I had received leave to proceed with third reading of Bill C-132 today. Thereafter, my spirit of adventure led me to risk the possibility of losing a vote on that bill or a motion to adjourn. Secondly, of course, if it does receive third reading, we will have Royal Assent, and plans have been laid to that end.

• (1425)

On the third question, I have a positive report also. I have been studying the material that was sent to us and, after informal discussion with the Speaker, he has undertaken to try to arrange a meeting of exactly the kind described by the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should make a couple of comments because Senator Flynn has raised one important matter with respect to the activities of this chamber in dealing with bills from the other place. The motion is to adjourn until Tuesday, March 1, which means a longer than usual adjournment. Of course, we are always subject to recall. However, I would welcome and, indeed, solicit his support in dealing with some of the legislation on the Order Paper which, perhaps, has been on it for longer than the government would wish. If he could exert his great influence in facilitating the movement of such legislation, he would be performing a service not only for this chamber but also for those Canadians who are awaiting the passage of some of that legislation because they realize it is beneficial for the Public Service of Canada.

Senator Murray: Is the budget ready now?

Senator Flynn: I must inform the Leader of the Government that I have no influence at all with Mr. Broadbent and his supporters.

Senator Olson: I was really referring to those people with whom I know the Leader of the Opposition does have some influence.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PETRO-CANADA
CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

INVESTMENT OF FUNDS IN CAPE BRETON COAL VENTURE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government relating to the Gillespie-Lalonde swindle. Is the investment of $25,000 in return for $1 million in tax-free grants considered to be within the six-and-five guidelines for the privileged few of the Liberal Party?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is no way that a responsible person could reply to a question that is predicated upon an acknowledgment that there is a swindle, because there is not.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am particularly interested in the role of our oil company, Petro-Canada. Can the minister tell us what funds Petro-Canada used for investment in the Gillespie consortium? Were any of the Canadian ownership taxes diverted to the Gillespie consortium?

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice in order to obtain a precise answer. The simple answer is that the regular budget of Petro-Canada is used for all its expenses, whatever they may be. I will inquire whether there is any specific identification of the use of the Canadian ownership tax other than for the specific purpose that was stated at the time.

Senator Phillips: I have one further question for the honourable minister. Could he tell us who was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when the oil substitution program was developed and introduced in Parliament?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this is a question almost bordering on the absurd. My honourable friend, if he wants to do a little of his own homework, will know exactly who were the ministers of every department, the dates on which they were appointed and the dates on which there was any cabinet shuffle. I don't see any point in questions the answers to which I know are available in the senator's office.

Senator Phillips: I point out to the honourable minister that I do not have the staff or the resources that he has, nor do I always have the time to do this type of research.

Senator Olson: I have noticed, over time, that requests are sometimes made of the Leader of the Government and other ministers to do senators' homework for them. I think we should change that slightly. I am sure Senator Phillips has that information in his office. If he does not, then he has disposed of it because it was certainly sent to him.

• (1430)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I cannot understand why the Leader of the Government would take the attitude that he has to do everyone's homework. God forbid he should do my homework for me.

Senator Olson: I think it is sad that Senator Marshall should make that kind of comment because I know that, over time, we have answered many questions for him.

Senator Marshall: That is your responsibility.

Senator Olson: It is our responsibility up to a point. It is not our responsibility—and I do not accept the responsibility—to have a minister's staff or departmental staff ferret out information from material that a senator has already had sent to his office. He can do that himself. I used to do it when I was a back-bencher, so I do not think that other senators should escape from it.

If there are other kinds of information that are not readily available to honourable senators, I do not mind incurring the public expense that is involved in that procedure. When an honourable senator wishes us, at public expense, to go digging out a whole lot of figures in the kind of configuration that is asked for from time to time, then, as a responsible minister, I must resist.

Senator Marshall: If the Leader of the Government is suggesting that I ask questions to which I can myself get the answers, I can assure him that that is not so and that he should not say that. I have a responsibility here and so has the Leader of the Government. If I am not doing my job, I will only say that there are two sides to the street. There are many things involved here that are weak and that one is too embarrassed to complain about.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps we should go back to the beginning of this dispute, that is, to where Senator Phillips asked me who was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources at a specific time. I know that that information is available in his office.

Senator Marshall: Why do you waste so much time? Why didn't you answer the question?

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to that posed by Senator Phillips. I suppose that in asking it I take the risk of having the question termed silly by the lecturer of the house, or I take the chance of receiving a lecture from him. It is a straightforward, simple question—he may say that it is from a simple person, but I would not mind that. I have had a lot worse said to me in my lifetime.

The question is: Can he tell me what amount of money was provided by the Cape Breton Development Corporation to the consortium that was formed to promote that proposition?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice and find out the detailed technical information.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

KIRBY TASK FORCE REPORT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It deals, once again, with the Kirby report. I understand that that report was to have been tabled in St. John's at 10 o'clock this morning. Whether that actually happened, I have no way of knowing.

Hon. Robert Muir: Parliament is up here.

Senator Doody: I did not hear that interjection.

Senator Muir: I say that Parliament is here in Ottawa. I thought it would be released in Parliament.

Senator Doody: Yes, I had no doubt about where Parliament was. I am not an expert on geography, but I do have some local knowledge!

The report was to have been tabled in St. John's at 10 o'clock this morning. I was rather surprised that the Leader of the Government had not distributed it here, at least at the beginning of the sitting, and I wonder if indeed it was tabled in St. John's. If so, when will we, the interested members, be privy to its contents?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my information is that it was to be released in both St. John's and Ottawa today. Perhaps I could find out in a few moments whether that has been done. I am not sure of the exact time it was to have been released in both places.

Senator Doody: It was to have been at 10 o'clock in St. John's. If it had been issued simultaneously, I could have had it for breakfast here in Ottawa. Unfortunately, I am still waiting. Lunch has passed, dinner is approaching and I still have not seen the Kirby report.

Senator Olson: As I said, honourable senators, I will try to find out the exact time that the report was to have been issued. My information at the moment is that it has already been done. If Senator Doody checks his mail box, he may even find it there.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Fasting is one of the steps to sainthood, anyway.

Senator Doody: I am well on the way to sainthood if the absence of information constitutes fasting. Believe me, I am canonized in preparation for the trip.

Senator Frith: I am speaking of your lunch.

Senator Doody: I am speaking of the information that I do or do not get from the government. I can assure the honourable senator, for the record, that I check my mail box regularly. I left my office at around 12.30 this afternoon. Up to that time there had been no such document—or anything approaching the document, not even an answer to my questions about it—placed on my desk or in my mail box.

Senator Olson: I think that Senator Doody will have all of that supplied to him, perhaps before the sun sets this day.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question supplementary to that of Senator Doody. It has to do with the consideration of the Kirby task force report, which is a document important to all of eastern Canada.

Honourable senators, I brought up this point many years ago and I bring it up again. Why is there no representation in the form of a committee for fisheries when, as a resource, it is so important to all of Canada? I have looked through the Rules of the Senate and the only reference I can see to a committee having anything at all to do with oceans or fish is the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which, among other things, deals with the following:

> transport and communications by land, air, water . . . navigation, shipping and navigable waters.

To the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce can be referred matters which deal with natural resources and mines.

Should honourable senators wish to have that extremely important report referred to a committee, what are they to do? Why is there no committee which has under its umbrella the responsibility of fisheries, which is such a vital resource to both the east and west coasts of Canada? Can the Leader of the Government answer that question?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I suppose I could escape the question by saying that I do not know what the reasons were in the past. Whatever they were, however, I presume that matters related to the fisheries were referred to a committee of this chamber. I could say, too, that there is some duplication with respect to committees. I believe that the Senate has recently done some revision with respect to the terms of reference in the rules respecting the various standing committees.

I also think that Senator Marshall's viewpoint is one that we should have a look at. Perhaps the terms of reference to standing committees should be made more explicit.

Senator Marshall: I am satisfied with that answer. I hope that it will be one of the first objectives for the new leader—and I realize it is a little late to be congratulating him—to consider for the start of a new session. I hope he will keep it in mind.

Senator Olson: As honourable senators know, the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders did have a meeting recently from which resulted a number of helpful suggestions for clarifying the terms of reference. It may be that fisheries should be taken into account in that regard. However, when that reference was made, it was not as a result of a motion passed in this chamber to instruct the committee. The members of the committee prefer to listen to some discussion, draft their own recommendations and come back to the chamber. Perhaps that same procedure should be followed in the future.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Can the Deputy Leader of the Government give us any indication of the number of pieces of legislation we can expect to receive before the beginning of a new session?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators, I cannot. I can describe some of the legislation that I think the government wants to have passed before the commencement of a new session, but I cannot give an accurate total of pieces of legislation, nor can I give particular descriptions of them all.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

PORT HAWKESBURY AND GLACE BAY—REPORTED SHUTDOWN OF HEAVY WATER PLANTS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question for my dear friend, the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is relative to previous questions I have posed regarding the future of the heavy water plants at Port Hawkesbury and Glace Bay, Nova Scotia. I know that this has been dealt with in cabinet on several occasions, and that it is causing certain cabinet ministers great concern and distress. Is the leader in a position to advise us if any new developments have taken place, or does he have anything to tell us that will give encouragement to those who are employed at those heavy water plants?

• (1440)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Muir is correct: there has been a great deal of discussion based on sincere and genuine concern. I do not think we have any particularly positive, good news that there will be an increased demand for the production from those two plants, but I repeat that we are extremely concerned about the matter. As I say, I do not have any positive, good news to convey to him at this time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF AIR BASE IN LABRADOR

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer to a question raised by Senator Marshall on January 26. It concerns the activities of the Department of National Defence so far as Newfoundland is concerned. It is a very long answer, containing much detail respecting present and future DND activities in Labrador and even beyond. If Senator Marshall agrees, I shall ask that it be taken as having been read.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Since 1941, a major air base has been in operation at Goose Bay, Labrador. While the activities of the base have changed drastically over the course of its history, military activities remain relatively high. Today, the air forces of three NATO countries regularly conduct air operations from the Transport Canada owned airfield at Goose Bay.

Canadian Forces Station (CFS) Goose Bay has a permanent military strength of over 200 personnel and employs over 70 civilians in support of the long range air defence radar, air trafic control radar, and limited Canadian Forces flying operations. DND is also the Executive Agent for the German Air Force (GAF) which conducts an annual training program comprised of a six month, summer deployment of up to 16 fighter aircraft and 200 personnel. Both the Royal Air Force (RAF) and the United States Air Force (USAF) maintain permanent detachments at Goose Bay supporting, respectively, RAF low level flying training operations in Labrador and trans-oceanic air transport operations.

FUTURE DND ACTIVITIES IN LABRADOR

The introduction of the CF-18 aircraft into NORAD operations may result in an increase in flying and related activities at Goose Bay. The Goose Bay airfield has been recommended as a CF-18 deployed operating base (DOB) which would be supported by CFS Goose Bay and would commence operations in July 1987. A CF-18 detachment would be responsible for a 24 hour-seven day a week alert posture. There is also a possibility that in the same time frame, the present Melville radar will be replaced by a minimally attended radar, in which case the level of DND's activity at Goose Bay would probably decrease slightly.

In the future, allied military training activity at Goose Bay could increase, especially if the provincial authorities will permit the development of tactical air ranges. The RAF and GAF both tentatively plan on operating TORNADO jet fighters/bombers from Goose Bay for low level navigation training. As this activity is realized, DND will be undertaking greater responsibilities as Executive Agent for all the Allied users.

In the final analysis, the implementation of these various activities is dependent upon Canada's intentions for the support and use of the Goose Bay airfield and its associated infrastructure. DND and numerous other departments are participating as members of the Interdepartmental Task Force on Goose Bay which is addressing this question.

DND ACTIVITIES IN NEWFOUNDLAND—GENERAL

In addition to the foregoing discussion on air activities at Goose Bay; following is a short resumé of other current DND activities in Newfoundland.

CFS Gander, comprising a military strength of over 400 military personnel and 120 civilian personnel provides for the following missions:

—103 Rescue Unit with 3 Boeing CH113/113A helicopters for search and rescue services in the Newfoundland/Labrador area of the Halifax Search and Rescue Region;

—the long-range air defence radar as part of the NORAD system;

—a major communications research centre; and —turnaround support for CF-101 interceptor aircraft on NORAD air defence mission.

With the introduction of the CF-18, CFS Gander will continue to be utilized as a turnaround facility with regular CF-18 missions conducted to ensure that this capability is maintained.

CFS St. John's provides military support for all other military activities in Newfoundland with the exception of those described above. Fifty-two military personnel and 35 civilian employees provide support for the Royal Newfoundland Regiment, the Naval Reserves of HMCS Cabot, the military jetty at St. John's, and the 62 Canadian military personnel employed in Oceanography at Argentia, Newfoundland, where approximately 400 US military personnel and their families are also based.

ESTONIA

SIXTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF THE RESTORATION OF INDEPENDENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask leave to fulfil an obligation I made to the Estonian community, and in particular to one of the last surviving members of the free Parliament of Estonia. I should like to do this now because, although their Independence Day occurs on February 24, I have learned that we shall not be sitting at that time, and I shall be in the west.

I should like to bring to your attention, honourable senators, that on February 24 the sixty-fifth anniversary of the Proclamation of the Restoration of the Independence of Estonia will be commemorated. Those of us who were privileged to be present last night at the Baltic celebration have an appreciation of the rich quality and substance of the heritage of the Baltic people and of the determined dedication to freedom and justice that they maintain and attempt to inspire in Canadians.

I have been privileged to have a personal knowledge of this little nation, because the person whom I said at the start I have an obligation to is my own father-in-law. He is now one of the few survivors from that free Parliament of Estonia. Particularly through him I have learned of the flowering that took place during the 20 years of freedom they were able to enjoy after almost a thousand years of occupation by the Soviet Union, by Germany, for a more enlightened period by Sweden, and then again by the Soviet Union.

Estonia has a smaller population than that of metropolitan Toronto. When they got their freedom, 65 years ago, they had to start from scratch. They had to set up their own institutions, their own methods of financing, their own system of money, and an import-export system. The vitality and enthusiasm with which they undertook those tasks made them a hallmark of democracy. Their social legislation was outstanding. They had medicare and progressive labour laws many years before we did. When they set up their governmental institutions they elected, under President Paets, a constitutional forum whose task was to search out and study the deficiencies and strengths of all the established parliaments of the world. Their Senate was set up in a way that I suggest to the government leader it would be very worthwhile for our joint committee to look at.

What happened to them after 20 years? Because they were a window to the west they were overrun by the Soviet Union. Then Germany moved in. In 1944 the Soviet Union came back, and once again darkness descended over the freedom that the Estonians had enjoyed for that brief time.

I am sure that all of us here recognize that even 40 years later Estonia still suffers the brutality of the regime that has been imposed on that little nation and its people. Let me give examples. We believe that we have the right to freedom of religion here. Their clergymen, if they are outspoken, are thrown into psychiatric wards, or are tortured, or are sent to hard labour. That kind of treatment extends right down to boys and girls at school, who fight russification. This is exemplified by the case of the two young girls who were sent to two and a half years' hard labour just a couple of years ago by the Soviet Union.

What hope is there for this little country? For instance, at Strasbourg on January 13, 1983, the European Parliament, its conscience aroused to the fate of these little Baltic nations, passed a resolution to introduce a resolution at the United Nations, the object of which would be to institute an examination of the question of decolonization of these three Baltic states. I hope that Canada will back that resolution to the full.

I think that feeling across this country is to the effect that we should maintain our integrity by recognizing always the de facto but never the de jure acceptance of that harsh annexation. I hope that we might take the step that Australia and Great Britain took in recognizing the honorary consuls of those countries. I hope that Canada will not be so timid as to leave this matter in a state of ambiguity and inconsistency by accepting the Lithuanian honorary consul, who is allowed to be included in the diplomatic book, while refusing to include those of the other two Baltic nations, for fear that we may offend the Soviet Union. I hope that that will be remedied by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs.

We should all remember, in the light of what has happened to these Baltic nations, that our own independence and freedom can only be preserved at a price. We must oppose tyrannical aggression. We must not allow an imbalance of might such as is revealed in the history of the Estonian nation. Otherwise, we could lose our great freedoms and independence.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-132, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I assume that the Deputy Leader of the Government is not going to speak to third reading.

Senator Frith: I am not necessarily going to speak to third reading, no.

● (1450)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to say a word or two on third reading, which will detain the Senate for but a few minutes.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on a small point of order, I in turn assume that Senator Murray is not thereby assuming that I am not going to speak to it. However, I have nothing to add except by way of reply.

Senator Murray: I quite understand that, but let me express my regrets once again that the Minister of State for Social Development has fled the chamber and will not be here to try to defend and explain this measure and associated measures of the six-and-five program in the context of the overall social policy and priorities of the government.

Hon. Peter Bosa: He has not fled; he has other duties.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He does not want to hurt his case.

Senator Murray: Senator Bosa, who has appointed himself spokesman for the Minister of State for Social Development, says that Senator Austin has other duties. I do not doubt that. As I pointed out yesterday, those many other duties, which he has been assigned by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, including the responsibility for patronage in British Columbia, have nothing to do with social development. Without meaning to be offensive personally or meaning any disrespect, I hope that before long we will hear from the Minister of State for Social Development on matters that are properly his concern in that portfolio.

Honourable senators, I will take but a minute of your time. Yesterday, when I discussed this matter on second reading, I said that the measure was irrelevant to inflation, and I placed before the Senate some facts about federal government spending, facts which contradict the assertion that there is any program of real government spending restraint, facts that contradict the assertion, which we so often hear in this chamber, that inflation is coming down because of some alleged program of government restraint. I placed on the record figures that we had as to federal government spending between April and November of 1982.

I intervene again today because there comes to hand this morning the very latest statement of financial operations of the Government of Canada for the first nine months of the present fiscal year—that is to say, from April to December of 1982. These statistics from the Department of Finance show that total federal government expenditures went up in that period by 17.1 per cent over the corresponding period a year previously.

If you remove from that figure the interest payments on the public debt, net petroleum compensation payments, and contributions to the Unemployment Insurance Fund, you still have an increase in federal government expenditures of 16.4 per cent.

If you deduct the major transfer payments to the provinces for health, post-secondary education, the Canada Assistance Plan and equalization payments, you see that ongoing expenditures on purely federal government activities in the first nine months of this fiscal year—the brave new "restraint" world of "six-and-five"—have gone up by 19.2 per cent. I say, honourable senators, that inflation in this country is still double the rate of inflation of our major trading partner, the United States.

If inflation is coming down somewhat, it is not because of the so-called six-and-five program, and it is not because of any federal government restraint program, since there is no federal government restraint, as the figures I have just cited show. It is coming down because we have 1.6 million people unemployed and because the disastrous and wrong-headed economic policies of this government have created and worsened a terrible economic depression in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): The Murray Bureau of Statistics!

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to refer to two items which I know the sponsor of the bill noted at our committee meeting with the minister this morning.

I think every senator would share the view that if, because of the large bureaucratic organization, there is the omission of any small group with respect to the coverage given to children across Canada, that injustice should be corrected.

I should like to raise two points which the Honourable Alvin Hamilton brought up in the other place. One point relates to orphans who are not in institutions and do not receive family allowance. The other is with respect to unmarried teenage mothers who are not in an institution or with their family.

I know the deputy leader is sensitive to the plight of these groups, as, indeed, all of us are. I request some remedy with respect to these matters.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, dealing first with the intervention made by Senator Thompson, he quite rightly reported what we heard in committee—some further discussion of problems in the application of the law to orphans and unmarried teenage mothers. That has been a preoccupation of Mr. Alvin Hamilton, a member in the other place.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Frith: Why not, indeed, as you will hear in a moment. The position taken by the minister is that, in her opinion, Mr. Hamilton is quite right, that an orphan who has income from some other source—for example, from an estate—can be disqualified from receiving family allowance, and that there is no reason why that should be so because, in principle, the contribution to the support of the orphan by the estate is the equivalent of a contribution by a family where a child is not an orphan. In other words, family allowances are paid notwithstanding that fact that a family is contributing to the support of its children. The fact that there is a source of income contributing to the support of an orphan is no reason to disqualify an orphan from family allowance benefits. The position of the minister is that that should be corrected.

There is an analogy, but not an exact one, with regard to unmarried teenage mothers—that is, those in the age bracket qualifying for family allowances but who are themselves mothers. Without going into the details of that, the minister's position is that that too should be looked into because, in her opinion, it is inequitable when measured against the principles of the legislation.

She has passed her views on to the Minister of Finance, so I can only say, in answer to Senator Thompson, that his concern, Mr. Hamilton's concern and the minister's concern is being looked into.

Senator Flynn: I wonder if Senator Thompson is happy with that assurance.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: Let us find out. He seemed to be satisfied in committee.

Senator Flynn: He is very subdued.

Senator Frith: The steps are being taken on the basis of the recommendation of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

With reference to Senator Murray's intervention which, as he frankly admitted, was a repetition of what he said yesterday, except that he also asked why Senator Austin was not here, I can only say that I obviously paid more attention to his intervention than he did to mine. The position of the government, and the position of Senator Austin also, is as was explained yesterday in reply. That is, this legislation does not purport to be a breakthrough in social policy. Its measures leave intact the social policy aspects of the legislation: universality is intact; indexation is intact; and the whole social program is intact. All this bill does is adjust the economic effect of that program. It does not in any way deal with the principles of social progress and social legislation that are included in the original legislation.

● (1500)

Senator Murray said it is irrelevant, that the six-and-five program has had no effect on inflation. To prove that, he said that there is no restraint program, and he offered figures that show an overall increase in government spending of 19.2 per cent. Whether or not that is right, I do not follow the sequitur.

Senator Olson: It is probably not right.

Senator Frith: The question of whether or not the actual six-and-five program, including all of the legislation to date on that subject, has had an effect on inflation is, in the final analysis, a moot point because I do not know of anyone who can tell us whether it has or has not. As I said yesterday, it is really a matter of opinion. I give Senator Murray's opinion the respect I believe it deserves, and no doubt he will give my opinion similar respect. But to say that there has been an increase in government expenditures over all and that the six-and-five program has had nothing to do with the decrease in inflation is, to me, a complete non sequitur.

Senator Flynn: That is not what he said.

Senator Frith: That is precisely what I heard him say. We may have a difference of opinion on that, but that is what I heard him say. That was the inference he wanted us to draw. On that subject, all I can say is that—

Senator Flynn: It is all connected with restraint.

Senator Frith: —the fact that inflation is dropping is a frustrating experience for the opposition, for two reasons—

Senator Flynn: For the unemployed also; for the two million unemployed it is a very frustrating experience.

Senator Frith: Yes, it is. We accept that. That is changing the subject. Let me get back to what I was saying. It is also frustrating, as we see, to members of the opposition, because it is not a politically desirable situation for the opposition when inflation goes down, since rising inflation is, for them, a useful political weapon. So we understand their frustration. But what could be worse than their frustration at inflation going down? Is it not that the decrease in inflation may be caused by government programs? That simply exacerbates their frustration.

Senator Flynn: High interest rates are connected with it; so is unemployment.

Senator Frith: Senator Murray said that unemployment is causing inflation. We all know how respected an economist Senator Murray is, but I am saying that there are economists who merit the same respect and who might put the matter the other way around.

Senator Flynn: Name one.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn wants me to name an economist who says that the lowering of inflation causes unemployment. I do not have that information at my fingertips, but I shall find some for him.

Senator Flynn: They say that inflation is the result of unemployment.

Senator Frith: There are those who would say that certain steps that are taken to attack inflation cause unemployment—

Senator Flynn: That's right—

Senator Frith: But Senator Murray does not say that. He says that unemployment causes inflation.

Senator Flynn: He never said that.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Quit while you're ahead.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators have a full week in which to read Hansard. Assuming that Senator Murray does not change his blues—and, of course, he cannot change the blues for yesterday—he will find, if he looks at Debates of the Senate for yesterday and today, that he said the cause of the drop in the inflation rate was the number of unemployed.

Senator Flynn: That's right; that's what he said.

Senator Frith: Well, I disagree with that. That is wrong, in my opinion.

Senator Flynn: Name one economist—

Senator Frith: It is wrong, in my opinion; and it is right in his opinion—and, apparently, it is right in the opinion of the Leader of the Opposition.

Honourable senators, for the reasons mentioned yesterday, I ask honourable senators to support third reading of this bill. It is part of the six-and-five program, and it is our opinion that the program has, in fact, contributed to the lowering of the rate of inflation, and that the lowering of the rate of inflation is an important step towards economic recovery, which, in turn, will be an important step in resolving the unemployment problem.

Senator Flynn: I am quite sure that if we had any doubt about the way we would vote on third reading, Senator Frith has anticipated that doubt—

Senator Frith: You were going to vote differently—

Senator Flynn: After the discussion in committee this morning, which was reported to me, we had some doubts; but now we are sure. Yesterday Senator Thompson voted for the bill; but I am sure that today he will hesitate to support the bill, particularly after having listened to the argument of the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I want to place on record the fact that, if Senator Flynn is going to ask the opposition to support the bill on third reading, having voted against it on second reading, simply because of my intervention, I am sorry to hear that; but I am very doubtful that is so. I am sure that Senator Thompson will speak for himself.

Senator Thompson: I would like to speak for myself. I felt that there was clarity and lucidity in Senator Frith's point when he was speaking on the bill.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., that this bill be now read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

February 17, 1983

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Julien Chouinard, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 17th day of February, 1983, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a Bill.

I have the honour to be
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

On the Orders:

Consideration of the Fourth Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Consideration of the First Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Guay, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Cottreau, for the adoption of the Second Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in addition to the fourth report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages we have on our Order Paper the committee's first and second reports.

I should like to take some of the time of the Senate on this Thursday afternoon to discuss the work of the committee, and to comment on some of the issues that the committee has considered.

The idea of creating this committee first surfaced in a formal way in the Thirtieth Parliament as a result of a proposal before the House of Commons, which proposal died on dissolution in March 1979. Again, during the Thirty-first Parliament, discussions took place with the government of the day towards the establishment of such a committee, but those discussions expired with the dissolution in December 1979. The sponsors of this committee, if I may call them that, in particular, Monsieur Serge Joyal, M.P., and Monsieur Jean-Robert Gauthier, M.P., had in mind a mandate for this committee on language matters somewhat analogous to that of the Public Accounts Committee on matters of financial administration, or a mandate somewhat analogous to that of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. The committee was to operate, as far as possible, in a non-partisan way, and one of the chairmen was to be drawn from outside the ranks of government supporters.

The committee was finally established in October 1980. It held four meetings and then suspended its work for three months so that the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution could get on with its deliberations, some of which touched on language matters.

The Special Joint Committee on Official Languages resumed its work in February 1981. The members decided to focus, in turn, on three main aspects of language policy: language of service to the Canadian public; language of work in the departments and agencies of the federal government; and equitable participation of both official language groups in the departments and agencies of government.

The committee considered language policy, of course, in the context of the Official Languages Act passed by Parliament in 1969, of a parliamentary resolution passed in 1973, of various policy statements made by the government, in particular those emanating from the Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission, of the Constitution of Canada as it affected languages, and also in the context of the annual reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

The committee heard testimony from witnesses representing the government and its agencies, minority language groups, and public service unions.

With regard to the provision of services to the Canadian public in both official languages, enormous progress has been made since 1969. That progress is most obvious in what I might call the bilingual regions that have been defined by Treasury Board for administrative purposes. They are: the National Capital Region; the Province of New Brunswick; Montreal and other parts of Quebec; northern and eastern Ontario. Elsewhere, the availability of service in both languages is sporadic.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): What is sporadic?

Senator Murray: The availability of services in both official languages is sporadic outside of the regions I have mentioned.

Why is this so? Well, honourable senators, in the first report tabled on July 9, 1981, we said:

> The overall finding of the Committee is that far too many institutions are all too frequently unable to provide service in the right place at the right time in the right language.
> The Committee found that the reasons for this unacceptable state of affairs lies as much in the apparent inability of federal institutions to determine where bilingual services should be made available to the public as in their inability to staff the appropriate positions with qualified bilingual personnel.

Honourable senators are aware that the Official Languages Act provides for the establishment of bilingual districts where there is at least a 10 per cent minority official language population, and that these bilingual districts would be drawn up on the recommendation of a Bilingual Districts Advisory Board.

The fact is that the government has never proclaimed any bilingual districts, although there have been, I believe, two reports recommending the boundaries of those bilingual districts. It appears that there is a host of practical problems involved when one tries to address the problem of language rights by drawing lines on a map by virtue of some mathematical formula, such as 10 per cent.

So, the committee recommended that the concept of bilingual districts be discarded, and that references to bilingual districts be removed from the act, and in their place, in order to try to deliver government services in the official language of choice, the committee recommended that there be employed two concepts—which will be familiar to honourable senators from the earlier discussions on constitutional matters—where there is significant demand and/or where numbers warrant, and that these two concepts be employed to require the active offering—and I emphasize the phrase "active offering"—of service to the public in both official languages.

I may say that at the same time the committee would eliminate from the act such phrases as "to the extent that it is feasible" where service to the public is concerned. Phrases like that, in our judgment, provide too convenient an escape hatch for departments or departmental managers who do not want to bother organizing their operations in such a way as to provide services in both of the official languages. The committee would have the government define those areas where there is significant demand and/or where numbers warrant, and we believe that this concept is far more flexible than the concept of bilingual districts as envisaged in the Official Languages Act. We would have the government define those areas on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

The provision of service to the public in both languages obviously involved the designation of certain positions as requiring bilingual skills. The committee heard evidence from the government itself indicating that identification and staffing of those position had often been haphazard. The government reviewed those positions to determine more precisely which positions should be classified as being bilingual, and at what level of language competence, and which positions currently identified as being bilingual ought not to be so classified.

It is the committee's view that the proper definition and identification of bilingual positions should lead to the use of imperative staffing in virtually all cases—that is, requiring that vacancies in bilingual positions be filled by employees who meet the language requirements of those positions.

I may say in passing that we heard testimony from at least one of the public service unions to the effect that they would be far more sympathetic to imperative staffing if they had more confidence that what they call an "honest designation" system was being used with respect to bilingual positions.

• (1520)

I want to turn for a moment to the question of language of work in the departments and agencies of the government. The Parliamentary Resolution of 1973 stated:

> public servants should as a general proposition and subject to the requirements of the Official Languages Act respecting the provision of services to the public, be able to carry out their duties in the Public Service of Canada in the official language of their choice,

The resolution approved:

> the taking of measures, after consultation with employee representatives, designed to produce a greater use of French at all levels in the Public Service, through increasing, where practical, the number of French Language Units, through further recruitment efforts by the Public Service Commission, . . . helping to realize the objective of achieving full participation in the Public Service by members of both the anglophone and francophone communities.

Honourable senators will note that the Parliamentary Resolution of 1973 made the obvious connection between the availability of a public service career in one's own language and the objective of equitable representation of both language groups in the public service. A Treasury Board directive in 1973 established the right of employees in certain parts of Canada to be supervised and have access to central services in both official languages. That 1973 directive was elaborated upon by a further Treasury Board directive in 1977. Since 1977 departments are supposed to have adopted and implemented plans and programs to help enable employees to work in the language of their choice. This is an extremely difficult area and it is one where we might as well admit that finding ways to achieve the objective has been quite difficult.

The committee found that departments are in most cases in the dark on how to apply language-of-work policy. We found that the right of employees to be supervised in the language of their choice is often not respected. We found that there are too few training and development courses in French as compared to the numbers available in English. Insofar as central employee services are concerned, the situation varies, but we found that evaluation and control of plans is quite lacking. We, therefore, asked the Commissioner of Official Languages to conduct a thorough and detailed study on the guidelines and programs in the area of language of work. That study, I am informed, has now been completed by the office of the Commissioner. We want regions to be designated for language-of-work purposes. We think that the Treasury Board guidelines need to be simplified.

Finally, we would like to see added to the act a section stipulating that employees should, subject to the requirements of the act regarding language of service, be able to carry out their duty in the official language of their choice. This would bring the act into conformity with the Parliamentary Resolution of 1973.

The question of the equitable participation of both language groups in the public service is an important objective of public policy. It is obviously important to the maintenance of confidence in our institutions that they be seen to be representative of the two official language groups. This is another difficult and very delicate subject and we might as well admit that there is a great deal of work to be done to achieve the objective, to refine the policy and to implement it effectively. Overall, it appears that representation of the language groups in the public service, if not in all the crown corporations, does reflect the proportion of English and French speakers in the population at large.

But that situation varies widely from one department to the next. There are still departments where there is quite a large imbalance of English over French, and there are some where there is quite a significant or growing imbalance of French over English. Of course, there remains a remarkable shortage of francophones in senior management and in the technical, scientific and professional categories.

In its fourth report, our committee said:

> The key to success therefore does not seem to lie merely in having a "critical" overall number, but rather in combining a balanced concentration in the various occupational categories with a working climate and conditions that encourage the establishment of French as a language of work.

The committee recommended that the Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission develop clear guidelines to help departments set appropriate participation targets to rectify certain imbalances in representation and to move more quickly towards achieving Parliament's objective of equitable representation.

I should like to say just a word about the question of language and the merit principle in public service hiring. Some people seem to think that language and the merit principle are opposing concepts. I think it important to remember that it is not the Official Languages Act but the Public Service Employment Act which makes language an element of merit. Public service positions are classified according to language requirements—either unilingual French, unilingual English, or bilingual. The so-called "exclusion order" is still in effect giving certain unilingual public servants incumbent rights in bilingual positions and giving others the right to occupy such positions provided they are willing to take language training at government expense. Subject to this exclusion order, language is considered an element of merit in hiring, which is what Parliament intended in the Public Service Employment Act.

As for imperative staffing, which means a candidate for a bilingual position must already be bilingual, it is nothing more than the re-instatement in particular, well-defined circumstances of the section of the Public Service Employment Act that was suspended by the exclusion order. Again, I make reference to the need for a proper designation of the bilingual positions and of the level of language competence required in each position. A problem arises because of the erroneous view of some people, including some in the public service, that imperative staffing of bilingual positions is intended to increase francophone representation in the public service. That was not and is not the intent. It has been confirmed on several occasions by representatives of the Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission that the purpose of imperative staffing is to ensure that services are available and are delivered to the public in both official languages and that it is possible for employees, subject to the conditions I have mentioned, to work in the public service in the language of their choice.

Honourable senators, we have to live with two languages in this country. The Fathers of Confederation knew it. They accorded recognition to two languages because it was necessary to do so in order to achieve Confederation in 1867. My old chief, the Honourable Robert Stanfield, used to say, "Language is not one of the things that unite us in this country. In a sense we are divided by language."

[Senator Murray.]

• (1530)

That is a fact of life, but the purpose of our efforts is to ensure that language does not become a source of grievance, tension and conflict in our society. The purpose of language legislation and language policy with which we are dealing is to ensure that we achieve linguistic justice so that, among other things, Canadians can communicate with and be served by their federal government in either official language, and so that there is equal opportunity for Canadians of both languages to pursue careers in the public service and to work in their own language.

We need to work at these matters. Parliament needs to pay close and continuing attention to them. We have to admit that anomalies, inequities and problems arise, and, rather than run from them or resent their being raised, we have to have them out on the table so that we can observe the grievances and the misunderstandings, and deal with them and try to correct them. We need to pay continuing attention to these matters, not because official bilingualism is an end in itself, but because linguistic justice is essential to our existence as a country.

In the past few years Canada has come a long way along this road. When I first came to this city as a young ministerial assistant in September 1961, simultaneous interpretation facilities were only then being installed in this chamber. Simultaneous interpretation had been in effect in the House of Commons for but a couple of years. Prime Minister Diefenbaker, when he introduced on August 11, 1958, a motion to approve the installation of simultaneous interpretation in the House of Commons, said that the adoption of such a measure "will be belated recognition of the equality of the two basic languages of this country as related to discussions in this chamber."

The right to speak either language in Parliament, which has existed since Confederation, was of limited value if one's colleagues could not follow and understand one's speech. In those days, parliamentary documents were published in French days and weeks after the English version. It was almost a hundred years after Confederation, and yet French-speaking members of Parliament were still protesting the inferior status which practice had accorded to the French language; an inferior status which created serious obstacles to them in the carrying out of their responsibilities to their constituents and which must have been a source of daily frustration to them.

More has been done in the past 25 years towards achieving equality of languages than was done in the first 90 years of Confederation, but we are still learning about these matters. We are still learning about the limitations of the Official Languages Act; we are learning about the effectiveness and shortcomings of federal language policies; we are learning about the problems in the implementation of the policy. We are learning to look behind the statistics of bilingual positions and incumbents, and we are finding that these statistics are often quite misleading as to the availability of services and opportunities to both language groups. We are learning of the growing insecurity on the part of many English-speaking Quebecers about their future and the future of their language in Quebec, and whether and how federal legislation and federal policy can address these concerns effectively.

One of our recommendations is to establish the declaratory and executory nature of section 2 of the Official Languages Act. Honourable senators will be aware that most of the judges called upon to rule on the question found that section 2 does not create executory rights; that is to say, rights that are enforceable through the judicial process. There has also been a recommendation that the act be given primacy, to provide that other acts cannot be construed as infringing the rule set out in section 2.

[Translation]

Finally, honourable senators, I would like to say a few words about the language situation in the Senate. Needless to say, when the Official Languages Act was passed in 1969, Parliament wanted it to apply first and foremost to Parliament. Section 2 which I have just mentioned, the Declaration of Status of Languages, reads as follows:

> The English and French languages are the official languages of Canada for all purposes of the Parliament and Government of Canada, and possess and enjoy equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all the institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada.

Senator Frith: In the institutions of Parliament.

Senator Murray:

> —in all the institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada.

This act has already been in force for thirteen years. However, instead of showing some leadership in applying the linguistic reform legislation, Parliament has acted slowly. The annual reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages, the special studies sponsored by the Commissioner, and more recently, the first report of the special joint committee give ample evidence of this fact.

In 1977, a special study recommended by the Commissioner of Official Languages examined the situation in the Senate and made specific recommendations, of which several have admittedly been implemented. However, the most important conclusion of this study was that slowness in implementing the various programs in the Senate was largely due to a lack of administrative guidelines concerning the official languages. The special study recommended that such instructions be prepared to inform the staff of their responsibilities concerning both communications and contacts with the public.

In his 1977 annual report, the Commissioner came back to this issue and emphasized the need for a general application plan covering the language of service to the public for the Senate and the language of work in the Senate.

The present Speaker of the Senate accepted our invitation to appear before the special joint committee. While recognizing that our Speaker does not have the same administrative powers as his counterpart in the House of Commons, our committee and the Speaker of the Senate were able to summarize the linguistic situation in this part of Parliament. In our first report, we stated the following:

> The Committee was particularly critical of the Senate and House of Commons, the two institutions responsible for the Official Languages Act but still unable to meet its requirements in many respects. It suggests that these two bodies should undertake immediate and serious efforts to rectify a situation that is all the more unacceptable given the symbolic importance of Parliament.

Despite the special study's recommendations made in 1977 the Commissioner's annual report for that same year, and the special joint committee's report tabled on July 9, 1981, so little progress had been made by the end of 1981 that the Commissioner felt he had to come back to the charge in this year's annual report.

The Commissioner was of the opinion that the Senate was lagging in language matters. He was compelled to note that the Senate authorities had not yet stated any policy on official languages; since the 1977 report, efforts had been timid; the recommendation made in July 1981, by the Special Joint Committee had not been acted upon.

In particular, we had not yet established data on our staff's language proficiency; we had not identified bilingual positions in the Senate; we had no language policy with respect to staffing, etc.

Admittedly, some progress was made since the 1977 study. A review of the situation shows that the progress barely meets the minimum required from a self-proclaimed bilingual institution. I also admit that the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has discussed the situation a number of times and that finally a coordinator has been appointed, with a mandate to prepare a language policy and the administrative guidelines for its implementation. The Deputy Commissioner on Official Languages, Mr. Gilles Lalonde, commented on the recent progress in his letter of November 15, 1982, to the Clerk of the Senate, and I quote:

> We note with satisfaction the commitment by the Senate to comply with the spirit and letter of the Official Languages Act. We also note with interest that the Senate already has taken some action in order to establish the basis for an adequate Official Languages program. The appointment of an Official Languages Coordinator who will see inter alia to the setting up of a plan of action and the identification of staffing language requirements is a significant first step in that direction. Mrs. Erika Bruce can rest assured of our full co-operation in that respect.
> We note further progress accomplished by the Senate during the year, such as the hiring of a bilingual legal counsel, the revision of the French text of the Senate Standing Orders, the steps taken to ensure greeting in both official languages by security guards, and improvement of the simultaneous translation services.

So it seems that language reform is starting to evolve on a more solid footing than previously. As far as we are concerned, we will be looking forward as before to the Senate's progress in language matters.

Honourable senators, I would like to point out the reference made by the Deputy Commissioner on Official Languages to the effect that all that progress—> —is a significant first step in that direction.

And also this other sentence in which the Commissioner has said:

> It therefore seems that language reform is starting to evolve on a more solid footing than previously.

I submit that this is a stage through which most government departments and agencies went quite some time ago.

You will excuse me if I insist on saying that we are lagging behind most federal institutions in language matters. As far as I am concerned, the reputation of the Senate and of Parliament in general is at stake. I do not wish to blame anyone for that situation. In the process of achieving language reform, it would be a shame were we to be more complacent with our own institution than with government departments and agencies.

Thus, before the end of the current year, it is my sincere hope that a language policy will have been stated and that the Senate will have implemented a linguistic regime worthy of this chamber.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I want to congratulate the co-chairman of the Joint Committee on Official Languages for the excellent work he has done and for the good presentation we have just heard. I have always believed that he was quite sincere when he worked with us on the committee, and I think that fact must be emphasized today. I am sorry that I was delayed and was not here to listen to the opening remarks of Senator Murray. I would like to ask him whether his remarks today relate to the three items on the Orders of the Day concerning the reports of the Joint Committee on Official Languages. I have the impression that Senator Murray spoke about different reports. I did appreciate his remarks. I take the floor not only to commend him for the work he has done today to draw our attention to the proceedings of that committee, but also to assure you that he is doing a tremendous job as co-chairman of the committee. I want to thank him publicly and I hope he will continue to fulfil his duties on our committee for a long time.

● (1540)

[English]

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, it may seem a little ridiculous that I should rise to make an observation or to get confirmation of the fact that I did not appreciate the words used by Max Yalden in his report on the Senate. I think that the Deputy Leader of the Government should read them.

Would Senator Murray confirm that, of the Senate's 374 employees, 218, or 58.3 per cent, are francophones and 156, or 41.7 per cent, are anglophones? Would he also confirm that 245 employees, or 65 per cent, appear to be bilingual; 113, or 30 per cent, are unilingual English speakers and 16, or 5 per cent, are unilingual French speakers? The point I am trying to make is that Mr. Yalden, in his report, was damning the Senate, which I think is unfair. I am pleased that the proportions I have just outlined seem to indicate that the Senate has done its job in the bilingual thrust of Parliament.

Senator Guay: Perhaps that had better be clarified.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not in a position to confirm the statistics that the honourable senator has placed on the record, although I hasten to say that I accept them.

With respect to the comments of the Commissioner of Official Languages, the deputy commissioner, in the letter which I placed on the record a few moments ago, indicates that progress has been made. I believe that I made clear, however, that I think it would be premature to say that the Senate has done its job in this respect.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to add my remarks to those of Senator Guay and also, to some extent, to those of Senator Marshall. I believe the point Senator Marshall was trying to make is that he thought the criticisms which had been voiced were too strong because we had not completed our job.

I want to congratulate the members of the committee for a job well done, and especially Senator Murray who acted as co-chairman. I want to thank Senator Guay and all his colleagues for their contribution. I think I can sincerely say that I am not just being polite and civil. My compliments are well deserved. I may add that we experienced some difficulties, when we tried to set up this committee. I think we should also be grateful to the former Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Joe Clark, for it is under his administration that this committee came into being, a committee whose existence is a sign of progress. Some 20 years ago, I was appointed to sit on the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission. With the benefit of hindsight and foresight, progress appears to have been tremendous. On the other hand, we must realize that various groups continue to resist changes. That is why we feel we should praise and support the committee's efforts. Moreover, I commend the Senate for taking action to implement the suggestions and recommendations of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Would you like to adjourn the debate now, in case some other honourable senator should like to deal with this issue, or should we consider the debate as ended?

Senator Murray: Madam Speaker, I feel that Items No. 13 and 14 of our Orders of the Day should be stricken out. Personally, I have considered all the reports in one speech, and I do not intend to rise to deal with the others.

Senator Frith: The remarks made by Senator Murray, Senator Guay, Senator Marshall and myself should apply mutatis mutandis to the other two items listed under Orders of the Day.

Senator Guay: Agreed.

• (1550)

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, do you agree that the other Orders of the Day be deleted?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I should point out that one of the orders, No. 14, was for the adoption of the second report. I may say that events have overtaken us, and I will need some advice from someone more experienced in the rules than I as to what to do; but I would be quite content to see the formal adoption proceed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps the word used by Madam Speaker is not precisely what we meant when we were talking about the other orders. I have a suggestion to make, not that the other orders be deleted but that the debate on Order No. 8 be taken as applying also to Order No. 13, and that it apply also to Order No. 14. I suggest, with leave, that we amend the motion numbered 14 and treat it as a study of the report, rather than as a motion for the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Guay: I was about to suggest—and Senator Murray is aware of what I am going to say—that since the committee is now coming out with its fifth report, we will have a chance to say a few words on it when we receive it here in the Senate. I thought I would mention that, since the fifth report should be coming out within the next couple of weeks.

COMMITTEES AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science and the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, rule 76 of the Rules of the Senate provides that Senate committees may have power, if so ordered, to sit while the Senate is adjourned. Some of our committees have a general power so to sit, while others have received a specific power so to sit. While that has been interpreted as being a general power, I thought it would be a good idea, perhaps ex abundanti cautela, to make sure that the committees named have the same general power to sit as certain other committees, even though the Senate is not sitting.

Hon. C. William Doody: Is the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance included in that?

Senator Frith: That committee has a general power.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Will the Northern Pipeline Committee and the Joint Committee on Official Languages be sitting in the coming week, and will they be included, if required, in this arrangement?

Senator Frith: The Northern Pipeline Committee has now become the Special Committee on Energy, and has this general power, as does the Joint Committee on Official Languages. I was trying to tidy up this little question mark that applies to those that do not have the power.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Does the Subcommittee on National Defence fit in there?

Senator Frith: It will have the same power as the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which is included in the motion before us now.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, does that mean that all committees now have that general power? The deputy leader mentioned a moment ago Foreign Affairs, and so on. Are all our committees included in this arrangement now?

Senator Frith: It is the intention of this motion to give those committees which do not now have the power, the power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Senator Rowe: The thought occurred to me that instead of specifying all the committees it would have simplified matters to say that all committees not possessing that general power should be given it.

Senator Frith: That would have been one way of doing it, but it would have meant that one would have had to look up all the committees in order to ensure that the ones I have now named will have the general power that the others already have. By this motion, they will all have the general power.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE HONOURABLE EDGAR FOURNIER

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION FROM SENATE

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I regret that I was not present in the house on Thursday, February 17, when tributes were paid to the Honourable Edgar Fournier on the occasion of his resignation from the Senate, although Senator Flynn did indicate that I had intended to associate myself with those tributes. Senator Fournier was my good friend and the tributes to him are handsome and well deserved. I associate myself with all of them. However, they did not go far enough. There was another dimension to Senator Fournier that we should consider. I speak as a warm friend. Although it is hard for me to explain, I can relate to him.

He is an Acadian, a francophone, and a Roman Catholic. He comes from 10 generations of Canadians, and is a religious man and a Conservative. He served municipally, provincially and federally. He was later appointed to the Senate.

I, on the other hand, am a Hebrew and the son of an immigrant—a first generation Canadian. I also served in municipal government, the provincial government and the federal government, and was then appointed to the Senate.

Senator Fournier and I come from different cultures and traditions. We are ethnically different and do not share the same background. We are almost like two trains passing in the night; yet, we are both Canadians.

We met here in the Senate, and we undertook, with the assistance of the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government, our task, which was a study of poverty in Canada—a social dilemma which plagues this country as it does many others. I, as chairman, Senator Fournier as vice-chairman, and 18 other senators, formed a committee to study this subject. We travelled across the country, hearing those who wanted to be heard.

Finally, we presented a report to Parliament. That report found instant acceptance, and is now used as a reference book in social service courses at all universities. No university is without a copy. It is also used as a reference book by all social workers.

We did not abolish poverty, but we did alleviate it. What we did, in fact, was drag poverty out of the closet and place it on the dinner table, and there it has remained for attention.

● (2010)

Senator Fournier and I then undertook a study of retirement along with 23 other members of the Senate. It took us about three years. We brought in a report which was accepted by a vast majority of Canadians, though not by the government as yet.

For seven years Edgar Fournier worked on both of these problems with heart and soul. Perhaps you did not know that he was an early riser and came to the Senate at 7 o'clock every morning. I am an early riser too, and I come to the Senate at 7.30 a.m. He would have breakfast in the building and then drop into my office, and we would spend five or ten minutes discussing the witnesses we had heard and our plans for the future. That went on for all of the seven years, with the exception of the time when he was seriously ill, so great was his devotion.

Honourable senators, I tell you all this to indicate that we were two people so different in every respect who found a common ground of co-operation to work for the common good of the people of this country and to unite them all as Canadians. We did find a common ground. That is my view of what Canada is all about, the common ground that we must find. This quiet Canadian was essential to the studies of poverty and retirement because he represented the establishment and I was the new boy.

On your behalf, I want to thank this gentle and understanding Canadian who made such a great contribution to Canada. I wish him well and, particularly, good health, and I hope that he and his wife will have many years in the bosom of their family in the province they love so much.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

PRIVATE BILL

POLYVENTREPRISE LTÉE—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, tabled the following report:

Tuesday, March 1, 1983

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill S-34, intituled "An Act to revive Polyventreprise Ltée and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, February 10, 1983, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN NEIMAN,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Martial Asselin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES 1983-84

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1984.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On February 28 he inspected a group of militia personnel in Edmonton. To paraphrase what he had to say, it appears that he is in full support of the idea that has been mooted in the other place and in the Senate with respect to placing the unemployed in the Canadian armed forces.

The Leader of the Government said:

> We are seriously considering making more use of the military generally, and of the militia particularly, to utilize some of the training capability they have.

Would the Leader of the Government advise the Senate as to what stage the idea of recruiting 50,000 unemployed into the armed forces is at, insofar as the cabinet is concerned?

● (2020)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not want to take issue with the way in which Senator Marshall tried to paraphrase what I said. I know that he is a reasonable person and that he is aware that sometimes exaggerations are made of what he, as a politician, or I, as a politician, might have said.

I said that we have what I consider to be a highly successful project involving the militia in Alberta. This project involves a small number of people in the Edmonton—the northern militia—district. I believe that the program started with about 40 recruits or applicants. Last Saturday I attended the graduating ceremonies of 25 of them.

I went on to say that it was a highly successful project, that they used the training facilities of the militia there, and that perhaps the net cost of that program was close to zero. When you subtract all the costs that would otherwise have been involved, and when you consider that what was used was otherwise unused training capability within the militia, that is true.

I would not want my friend to believe, however, that I ever said that there was a possibility that 50,000 could be taken into this program, or, indeed, even into the regular forces program. I know that that number has been bandied about by some people, but I do not think that the number which can be expected to beneficially make use of those training facilities is anywhere near 50,000.

Having said that, I do believe that an extremely beneficial use of funds was made in this case, and that belief was confirmed by what I witnessed there and by the comments made, not only by the young people who participated but also by their families and others who attended the ceremonies. They were extremely happy about a number of things, such as the training in trades and the discipline involved in certain military aspects of the training.

I should like the honourable senator to understand that I do not expect this program to be a great panacea for the unemployment problem. Certainly with respect to the limited number of people who were involved in what was virtually a pilot project, it was highly successful from my point of view and, I think, from the point of view of the recruits who participated in it.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I do not know why the Leader of the Government always has some suspicion about questions from across the floor. I neglected to commend him for his going and inspecting the militia. I take this opportunity to do so and to say that I fully agree with him.

In view of the fact that this program proves that 25 militia recruits can be trained for nothing—for zero cost, as the article states—and because such a program replaces welfare and unemployment insurance payments, why can we not expand it to take in more recruits? Why could we not use unemployment insurance benefits for the benefit of the 15-to-24 age group? By doing this people would not need to go on welfare. They would be given something worthwhile: they would be given youth development and citizenship training.

Would the Leader of the Government agree with that? Would he help me, or can I help him, expand the program right across Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am glad that we understand each other.

Senator Marshall: We did from the beginning.

Senator Olson: I think this program has scope. If my friend read the article in the Edmonton Journal, which is somewhat longer than the one in the Ottawa Citizen, he will have noted that I also said we were seriously considering some expansion or further utilization as a result of what we learned from this pilot project. We get into difficulty when we start to talk about numbers like 50,000. I do not think anyone has expectations that such a number could properly be brought into the kind of program I am talking about.

• (2025)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Don't get excited!

Senator Marshall: In view of the fact it is known that the government has asked the Department of National Defence to consider and come up with some kind of plan, can the Leader of the Government indicate to us the proportions of the requested plan? Is it for 1,000, 2,000 or 5,000? Is it attached to any other training program, or is it strictly on the basis of what he recommends and what I would recommend? Can he tell us what state it is in and the numbers they are asking the Department of National Defence to consider?

Senator Olson: I do not think that putting a number on it at this stage would be a very wise or prudent thing to do because we have to look at other things, such as costs for the various trade schools, vacancies and the capability to accept people into the military schools. If you go beyond the facilities that are now in place, then, of course, the cost escalates rapidly.

It seems to me that we are doing what we usually do—and it is eminently sensible—namely, finding out what the capabilities now are in the unused training capacity, both in the militia and the regular forces. When we have assessed those kinds of numbers we have to match them up with the individuals who may want to enter into training, and then we can come up with the numbers. I think it is a very wise thing to be bandying about a set of numbers first—

Senator Flynn: That is much clearer than it was.

Senator Olson: —and then seeing whether we have spaces afterwards.

Senator Flynn: That is a very straight answer.

Senator Marshall: Would the Leader of the Government be able to get a report on the progress of that particular, valuable program and report to the Senate as soon as possible?

Senator Olson: I will give that undertaking to report to the Senate as soon as possible.

COMMUNICATIONS

BROADCASTING TO NORTHERN COMMUNITIES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development referring to an article that appeared in the Globe and Mail a couple of weeks ago dealing with a plan to use the Anik D satellite to link northern native communities by television. A further background to that would be statements made by the Honourable Francis Fox in 1980 calling for that kind of northern link.

Can Senator Austin confirm that he has told the group hoping to provide this communications network in the north using that satellite that a decision on government funding would be made by March 31 of this year?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I was approached by a native group in the Yukon who were looking for continued funding for their current activities in broadcasting native programs throughout the Yukon which, I think, is a different matter from a question dealing with satellite programming. With respect to the native group in the northern native broadcasting system, I said to them that I believed their project was a worthy one and I would give it whatever support I could within the considerations of the government.

I should like to say to honourable senators that for a few years now we have encouraged native groups not only in the Yukon but also in the Northwest Territories to reach their own communities in their various native languages. We have provided funds for training natives in the various aspects of radio and television broadcasting. That service does much to link remote communities in order to build up a sense of community activity and to preserve the culture of our northern native community. I hope that that is the information Senator Nurgitz is looking for.

• (2030)

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary, honourable senators. It was a newspaper article that referred to the use of the Anik D satellite, and I take it that I may well be in error, but am I correct in believing that the answer given is to the effect that while some support may be forthcoming in the way of some funding for a northern communications link, it does not necessarily include, or does not at this point include, the use of the Anik D satellite.

Senator Austin: I must say to Senator Nurgitz that I cannot tell him whether the use of the satellite is a part of the package now before the government, but I will make an inquiry. My impression from the brief—and I am only recalling it from memory—submitted at a meeting some weeks ago, is that it was essentially that support for training and further air time was sought by these people. I said I would look into it, and that in the meantime, in principle, it had my support. I hope that in the next week or two I will have the report. Again, I will check to see whether satellite time is involved.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

ALLEGED MEETING RE NATIVE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: While I am dealing with the question of northern development, I wonder if the minister could confirm that a meeting was held, I take it, in the province of Saskatchewan, on February 19, which included persons such as Tom Pelletier and Mr. Sol Sanderson, as well as his colleagues from the cabinet, Mr. Lumley, Mr. Axworthy and Senator Argue, along with Len Marchand, Joe Dionne, Harold Cardinal, Marion Meetmore and Noel Doucette, dealing with the Indian Economic Development Fund, and if, indeed, this is some form of government committee or subcommittee.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I have no knowledge of the meeting that Senator Nurgitz refers to. I do know that I am involved in committee meetings dealing with the Native Economic Development Fund, and that matter is of very critical interest to me personally; but I repeat that I know nothing of the meeting just referred to by Senator Nurgitz.

Senator Nurgitz: I take it the minister is not aware of a committee including the persons that I have just named, in any form.

Senator Austin: I am unaware of the meeting, and I am unaware that there is a committee of the type Senator Nurgitz refers to.

SPORT

SOCCER—1986 WORLD CUP COMPETITION—AVAILABILITY OF STADIUMS IN CANADA

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, but, in his absence, I would like to put it to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He is not here. He is jogging.

Senator Bosa: That is why he is the minister of physical fitness.

In 1986 the World Cup games will take place. They were supposed to be hosted by Colombia. I understand that for economic reasons Colombia will not be in a position to carry through that commitment. Since the games have to be held in the western hemisphere, has the minister made any overtures to FIFA, the international soccer organization, with a view to having the games hosted by Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question, but I will certainly see that the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport makes some inquiries about it and gives a reply as soon as possible.

Senator Bosa: I wonder if the leader could put a supplementary question to the minister. In dealing with the question, could the minister inform the Senate whether there are sufficient facilities in Canada to host the games, and in addition to that—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We have the financial means.

Senator Bosa: We need facilities—stadiums.

Senator Flynn: It would be a good question.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Senator Bosa: This is why I am putting the question, to see whether we can have an assessment of the stadium facilities in Canada, and whether Canada is capable of hosting the games.

Senator Flynn: Financially, of course.

Senator Bosa: I have another supplementary question. The Chairman of Metropolitan Toronto, Mr. Godfrey, announced lately that it is his intention to promote the building of a domed stadium, and that the project will be financed by the three levels of government. Has the Chairman of Metropolitan Toronto approached the federal government for a grant to build that stadium?

Senator Olson: I will see that all of those supplementary questions are referred to the appropriate minister.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

SALE OF APARTMENT UNITS TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers tonight. One is to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on February 15 concerning the whereabouts of Mr. William Player.

• (2035)

The question asked by Senator Haidasz fall under provincial jurisdiction and, as such, he should discuss this matter with the provincial authorities involved.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he would entertain a supplementary question to the delayed answer he has just given.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Of course—if you want to get the same type of answer.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that William Player is the principal of Kilderkin Investments, which company is now in default in the amount of $8.5 million, I would like to ask whether any of the money involved belonging to investors or depositors or creditors is covered by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Senator Olson: I cannot answer that question off the top of my head. I would need to know the names of the companies involved. Certainly, a reference could be made to the appropriate authorities to find out whether they were covered by the insurance capability of the CDIC.

Senator Haidasz: I have another supplementary question. I would like to ask the leader whether the government intends to introduce amendments to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation before this present session ends.

Senator Olson: I had better be careful here, but I think the government has already announced that it intends to raise the upper limits of the insured amounts, for example. There were some other amendments announced, I believe, a few days ago. I will obtain a copy of that announcement for my honourable friend, perhaps early tomorrow.

NATIONAL REVENUE

CONFIDENTIALITY OF CERTAIN INFORMATION ON 1982 PERSONAL INCOME TAX RETURN FORMS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in answer to questions asked by the Honourable Senator Flynn and the Honourable Senator Benidickson on February 16 concerning confidential information on income tax forms, the answer is that the new T-1 tax forms do indeed embody the budget changes referred to by Senator Flynn. The budget changes provide for a new income averaging formula that takes into account the taxpayer's income over the last few years. By indicating last year's income on the form, Revenue Canada is trying to make it easier for the taxpayer who wishes to take advantage of the new income averaging formula.

The social insurance number has been indicated to prevent any mix-ups or mistakes in the computer processing of tax returns, and also to keep the taxpayer's file up-to-date.

These measures have been taken to help the taxpayer get the best possible benefit from the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

AIR CANADA

PROPRIETY OF QUESTIONNAIRE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on February 16 the Honourable Senator Rowe asked a question concerning the propriety of an Air Canada questionnaire.

I have been informed by my colleague the Minister of Transport that the answer I gave to Senator Rowe on February 16 was essentially correct. The questionnaire referred to by Senator Rowe is simply a voluntary marketing survey devised by Air Canada to get passenger reaction to its service. No one is under any obligation to answer any of the questions.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It couldn't come from a better source.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CANADIAN FORCES—SUPPLY OF CANNED APPLE PRODUCTS

Question No. 99 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

With regard to Bulletin of Business Opportunities, Volume 10, No. 2, January 27, 1983, what are the names of the companies who tendered under (i) 03GD.2542008/2(2GD82-00288), (ii) 03GD.2542008/2(2GD82-0 0282), (iii) 03GD.2542008/2 (2GD82-00279), giving in each case the smallest unit cost available?

Reply by the Minister of Supply and Services:

The firms listed in Appendix A submitted bids for all three requirements.

Contracts were awarded on the basis of lowest unit prices submitted. The details and unit prices are provided in Appendices B, C and D.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

SEARCH AND RESCUE

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF EVALUATION REPORT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government having to do with the Cross report, which is an evaluation of search and rescue. At page 94 it is recommended that improved capability be deployed to the east coast of Newfoundland, indicating that more bases or faster aircraft, or both, are required in order to react to an incident.

I wonder whether the Leader of the Government could disclose the responsible departments and officials and their reply to that recommendation.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had anticipated some interest in this matter. Indeed, some of my caucus colleagues from Newfoundland have raised the matter with me, not only today but over the last two or three days, particularly since the recent hours of severe weather conditions experienced off the Newfoundland coast, where enhanced search and rescue capability may be needed.

As my honourable friend is aware, the Department of National Defence plays the leading role in respect of search and rescue in that part of Canada—of course, in co-ordination with Transport Canada. They have attempted to provide the most effective yet flexible coverage of the entire east coast.

I may say that, as of yesterday and the day before, there were potential difficulties because of the forecast of severe weather conditions. I have not received a report today, but as of about 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon weather conditions in the St. John's, Newfoundland area and, more specifically, in the vicinity of one of the oil rigs were reasonably good. At the present time there is a high pressure system in that area and wind is not a problem. Today, however, a low pressure system coming in from the United States could result in deteriorating weather conditions—snow, freezing rain and so on—with winds being forecast at up to 40 or 50 knots.

• (1410)

The present situation with respect to search and rescue deployment is as follows. One helicopter has been deployed from Gander to Badger, Newfoundland, to help break an ice log jam in the Exploits River, and there is a helicopter at Gander, in addition to this one, that is unserviceable. I do not have a prediction as to when it will become fully operational again.

In St. John's there is one Buffalo aircraft available, and one helicopter has proceeded to Gander, on its way to another area for an emergency medicine and food supply mission. This helicopter should have been back in St. John's last evening. Perhaps it was.

At Summerside there were two helicopters serviceable and one unserviceable, and one Buffalo aircraft fully serviceable and one unserviceable; but it is worth noting that the rig transportation is provided by the companies involved, in addition to what DND and Transport Canada have. There are at least five large helicopters and several smaller ones that belong to these companies.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Are they all serviceable?

Senator Olson: I do not have that detail. However, I do not take this matter lightly. I am trying, for the benefit of members who are deeply concerned with the east coast, and for the benefit of the Leader of the Opposition, to indicate that all that can be done is being done with all of the equipment that is within reasonable range of the area, where there is risk of this storm causing problems that would require search and rescue capability.

The Minister of National Defence further informs me that he is extremely concerned about this; therefore, he has indicated that he is willing to try to move more equipment within closer range, so that it will be available with a shorter time lag.

Hon. C. William Doody: If I may, honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a supplementary on the same very important subject.

In the recently released Mahoney report arising from an inquiry into the sinking of Arctic Explorer, the vessel that went down off the northern tip of Newfoundland last winter, recommendation No. 5 says:

> The adequacy of Search and Rescue facilities available to the Newfoundland Region ought to be reviewed and additional ships and aircraft provided.

My memory of that particular incident tells me that some of the men who subsequently died in that accident were in the water for 24 hours or more. The response time of the fixed-wing aircraft is just not adequate, considering where they are now based. I quote from Captain David Walsh, who was the marine co-ordinator of the search and rescue station in Halifax, which is the centre of the command for the east coast. Captain Walsh talked about the inadequacy of the force available. He said that the two coast guard ships operating out of Halifax, Daring and Alert, were tucked in some snug harbour, like Liscomb, Nova Scotia, riding out the storm instead of spending time patrolling the offshore.

This was not because the captains and crews of the ships did not want to go out, but because they are not adequate to take the kind of weather that a rescue operation is faced with.

Captain Walsh said the two cutters based in Newfoundland, Grenville and Jackman, are somewhat better, but they have to spend time in coastal harbours and require 12 to 24 hours to reach the areas of oil exploration off Newfoundland. The two vessels stationed in Newfoundland do not have the relief crews to enable them to stay at sea long enough to be in touch with the areas of greatest concern. Captain Walsh also talked about the fixed-wing aircraft, and so on.

The question is, what is to be done, in the light of the expert advice from people like the author of the report from which Senator Marshall has just quoted, in the light of the experience of people like Captain David Walsh, and in the light of the findings of the Mahoney report into the loss of lives at sea off the coast of Newfoundland?

● (1415)

There was another incident last week when two hunters were stranded on the ice. The RCMP advised Air Search and Rescue at 5 p.m. that two men were missing. At 7.30 p.m. Air Search and Rescue advised that no helicopters could leave Gander because of the weather, or St. John's as no standby crews were available. At 7.24 p.m., according to the reports, the Rescue Co-ordination Centre in Halifax informed the RCMP and the Emergency Measures Organization that no ships or planes were available to undertake a search for the men. The Emergency Measures Organization in St. John's arranged at 7 p.m. for the provincial government air service to secure the services of a Sealand helicopter. Although Air Search and Rescue despatched a Buffalo aircraft from Prince Edward Island, it took eight hours for the craft to arrive. The time factor involved in that rescue attempt, and the fact that no standby Air Search and Rescue crews were available, critically jeopardized the opportunity for safely rescuing the missing men.

Obviously, given the weather conditions in the North Atlantic at this time of year, eight hours is an unreasonable length of response time. In the light of all this data and these facts, and in view of the loss of lives to date, would the minister undertake to see that more equipment and personnel are stationed at adequate bases in Newfoundland and the rest of eastern Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Minister of National Defence has indicated to me, in response to some inquiries I made two days ago, that he is extremely concerned about the situation, that he takes Mr. Justice Mahoney's report seriously, and, indeed, in light of the situation resulting from the actual weather on site, and also forecasts of potential storms, he has moved some additional equipment into the area so that the response time can be shortened. Over the longer period he will, of course, be considering what can further be done with permanent standby equipment within a shorter response time.

However, I am sure my honourable friend understands that it takes a little time to achieve that. The equipment that is now available is a significant improvement, and we all hope the history of tragic and unfortunate incidents will not be repeated.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary. The minister stated that the Minister of National Defence had informed him that additional equipment had been moved into the area and that the response time had been shortened. Could the minister be more specific and tell us what equipment has been moved, where it is stationed, and what the response time is now?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not have any additional information beyond what I read with respect to the number of helicopters and Buffalo aircraft being made available. I gave the honourable senator details of the equipment that was on hand at 3 p.m. yesterday afternoon.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, in addition to the Ocean Ranger disaster, the offshore drilling rigs and the protection needed, as well as other matters, the Cross report also indicates that most incidents occur with fishing vessels. Although the minister will look into the matter of having aircraft deployed closer to the scene on a continuing and overall basis, as the Cross report points out, there should be deployment of a larger number of aircraft over a greater area. The Leader of the Government mentioned Gander and St. John's but there is another part of Newfoundland where many incidents occur—the west coast. There was evidence before the Subcommittee on National Defence that there was general agreement that more aircraft and better deployment was necessary to ensure quicker reaction to incidents that occur up the coast.

I would like the Leader of the Government to impress on his colleagues in the cabinet that this has been going on for some ten or twelve years and that it is important that something be done, not merely to snuff out a momentary incident but on the basis of the future.

Senator Olson: I do not think I can usefully add anything more, except to say that the Minister of National Defence and Transport Canada, as well as a number of other ministers, are keenly aware of the situation, and they are ready to give favourable consideration to meeting the needs reasonably adequately. I believe the report and other documents indicated that things were perhaps not as satisfactory as they should have been in the past, although I am sure that my honourable friend is aware that it is not possible to have search and rescue equipment in every location to meet every emergency, no matter how bad a storm may be.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question on the same subject. In light of the concern that has been demonstrated for the safety of seamen off the east coast, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would explain to us why the government has seen fit to dismantle the tracking station at Shoe Cove, just outside St. John's. This tracking station monitors the satellite sweeps of the ice lanes in the area and keeps track of the floes and drifts and supplies the information to the people concerned.

I have been told that the reason the station has been closed is that the owners of the satellite, the United States, have jumped the data fee from $50,000 per month to $600,000 per month, and that they are now going to try to do the same job from Churchill, Manitoba. There are experts who say that it is technically impossible. Obviously, I am not in a position to judge, but the assertion that such an operation from Churchill is technically impossible has not been refuted.

Can the minister rationalize for us the closing of this ice tracking station at this time—almost on the anniversary of the loss of Ocean Ranger, I might add? I am sure that is just a coincidence. If the minister does not have the information, will he undertake to get it for us?

Senator Olson: I undertake to get a response to that question.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I do not want to prolong this discussion—and it is really a discussion—unduly at this time, but we are literally dealing with matters of life and death as they affect east coast Canadians.

One aspect of this problem that has not been mentioned today, and one which has given me and many others concern—especially those who are personally familiar with this situation, as I have had the opportunity to be—is the icebergs on the east coast of Newfoundland, along the coast of Labrador and on the Grand Banks. Honourable senators may recall that within the last two weeks an iceberg came dangerously close—within a few miles—of one of the rigs in the Hibernia area. That iceberg was a small one but, even at that, it was estimated to be 100,000 tonnes. I might say that I am suspicious of that figure, because very few icebergs are as small as 100,000 tonnes.

[Senator Marshall.]

Just to give honourable senators an idea of the nature of the problem in certain years, I shall relate a personal experience. One of the years when I represented all of Labrador in the legislature I travelled by boat from St. John's to Nain in Northern Labrador, now the most northerly community in the province. I and those with me counted 300 icebergs along the route. That gives you some idea of the magnitude of this problem.

What I am getting at is that the law of probability must inevitably prevail. Sooner or later—and this is something the operators of Titanic found to their sorrow—those icebergs are going to present an even more serious problem than we have experienced so far. It is only a matter of time. I know that the university and a quasi-university organization in Newfoundland which deal with iceberg research have done some experimentation on actually towing huge icebergs of perhaps a million tonnes to determine whether or not it is possible to divert them in that way. I might say, incidentally, that there are icebergs which are far larger than a million tonnes.

• (1425)

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate find out whether the Government of Canada is at the present time undertaking any experiments in relation to icebergs which now pose a threat to eastern Newfoundland and which will continue to ad infinitum?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice and shall try to obtain a reply.

ENERGY

SCOTIA COAL SYNFUELS PROJECT

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question is directed to him as the former Minister of State for Economic Development. Can he advise the Senate when he was first informed of the Synfuels project in Cape Breton?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have any date, off the top of my head, as to when I might first have been informed about it. I think it was under way before I came into office.

Senator Phillips: The political amnesia in this affair seems to be spreading to other cabinet ministers.

I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate based on the Canada-Nova Scotia agreement on oil substitution. Paragraph 6.2(d) requires projects to be economically viable, and I quote:

> "economically viable" in this context means that there is a high probability that the money savings on operating costs generated by the undertaking will repay the costs thereof over the 10 years next following completion of the project.

My question is: What were the estimated savings on operating costs for the Synfuels project, and the number of years required to repay those costs following the completion of the project?

Senator Olson: I would like to advise Senator Phillips that I am not suffering at all from amnesia. I shall take that question as notice, since he did not send me notice before the sitting began today that he intended to ask it. I am sure he does not expect me to have the answer on the tip of my tongue.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Perhaps after listening to the various representations from the east, he will give some consideration to a question from Manitoba. I am speaking now of a very important matter, the Garrison, which I refer to as the "wrong way" river.

• (1430)

I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that the $1 billion sum that has been requested to make the Garrison Dam project a reality is being spent on that project.

While I spoke in January and February of this year on the subject of a further grant of some $4 million, within the past 10 days another $3 million have been allocated for that project, and another bill requesting $22 million is currently before the United States Senate for its consideration. In other words, over the years money has been made available for this project on a continuing basis.

Many people believe that this project—which has been talked about for the past 19 years—is something that is not as real as we fear it is here.

I should like the other cabinet ministers in the Senate to support the Leader of the Government so that we can be given a good hearing in the cabinet and so that appropriate representations can be made to the United States government.

Let me read a short excerpt from a newspaper article so that you will know what I am speaking about. It states:

> One billion-dollar sum that ought not count in the nation's grim deficit picture is that still to be spent on the Garrison River Project, which is to meet the nation's not-so-urgent need to have a small North Dakota river flow toward the North Pole instead of the Gulf of Mexico.

The article goes on to state:

> But the canals and reservoirs would themselves consume some 225,000 acres, most of it existing farmland. That and fears of pollution and flooding the project might cause elsewhere in the state have prompted some local farmers—

Those farmers reside in the south, and that has prompted them to support Canada's request.

> —and the National Audubon Society to fight the project in court.

If completed, the project would lift American Missouri River water—along with Missouri River predatory fish and pollution—over a continental divide and dump it into a Canadian river system which could be damaged by it. I am speaking now of the Red River. That would destroy all of the fresh fish in Lake Winnipeg.

The article goes on to state:

> The International Joint Commission back in 1975 declared that the diversion "would cause significant injury to health and property in Canada."

I do not think we should treat this too lightly.

Another newspaper article, making reference to the $3 million in funding, states:

> The controversial Garrison diversion project has received another $3 million in funding from Washington—

I want you to take particular note of the governor's name.

> —Govervor Allen Olson said yesterday.
> Olson said he learned of the additional funding in a telephone conversation with Interior Secretary James Watt.
> He said Watt told him the money had been redirected to Garrison from other areas of the Interior Department's budget.
> A spokesman for Olson said the governor also has been told another $5 million for the project will be contained in a jobs bill now before Congress.

This is not a reference to the other $22 million being considered, over and above, on a three-year contract.

The reason I ask this question again is that the people of southern Saskatchewan and Manitoba—south of Brandon and all the way to the Red River, and north towards Lake Winnipeg—are very concerned about this. I suppose we do not hear very much about this in Ottawa, but there are daily reports in the newspapers of Manitoba. The people of Manitoba and southern Saskatchewan wonder why we, in Ottawa, are not hollering louder about this. So, I hope that my voice will be heard and that soon we will be told that appropriate representations will be made to the United States government so that we shall be given some consideration while they are continuing to build that project.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the concerns expressed by Senator Guay. I think he is accurately reflecting the apprehension of those who could be affected by this diversion.

I also want to say to him that the other ministers in this chamber, as well as ministers of the Crown in the other place, have, indeed, supported—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Name them!

Senator Olson: —that view and, further, have supported expressing their concern through all available channels to the United States administration, the Senate and the Congress generally. It has been done. So I think Senator Guay can assure the people who are apprehensive about it and the people who are writing, as I think he said, almost a daily column about it, that we do not need to be convinced of the validity of the argument that Senator Guay and others have been advancing over the months or years. That has been conveyed by the Government of Canada to the administration in Washington.

● (1435)

Senator Guay: I have a supplementary. Many people are saying that while the United States government can criticize Canadian films and make a lot of noise about it and get a lot of press coverage, they hope that we can make as much noise and tell the United States government that we are also annoyed with their policy pertaining to the Garrison. If we get enough publicity, perhaps they will give us some consideration and will stop that project, because it is not only going to ruin Manitoba but it is also going to ruin a lot of their own citizens south of the border.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question on the same matter? I have noted carefully and I am glad to hear the minister's observation that everything possible is being done at the present time not only with the administration but also with the Congress—the Senate and the House of Representatives. I am glad to hear that because I am of the opinion that it is not nearly enough for us to get the ear of the administration. If we do not get the ear of the Congress, we are not going to get what we want.

Would the leader take a look into the liaison that we have in place with respect to the Congress of the United States, and at a convenient moment let us know exactly what is being done in that respect?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is easy to give an undertaking that I will try to get a reply to that question, but I think that both Senator Roblin and Senator Guay would agree with me, upon reflection, that if overt lobbying of the United States Congress were embarked upon by the Government of Canada or others, that would be acceptable up to a point, but it would involve interfering or attempting to interfere in the process of government of another country. Therefore, I am not sure that I can give a simple answer that is satisfactory. If we are to raise the profile of Canada as a country and the Government of Canada by objecting to a project that is going on inside the United States—notwithstanding the fact that there are potential pollution problems that have been pointed out very adequately over the past weeks—we have to handle it with discretion, particularly if we want to maximize the results that are in keeping with what I have just described.

Senator Roblin: I really agree with what the minister has just said. One has to be very circumspect in interfering in the internal affairs of another nation. I appreciate that point, but it is, nevertheless, a fact that, with respect to the United States, lobbying of the Congress is expected; that is not considered to be a no-no. You will find that many nations besides ourselves recognize that fact.

I have spent the past two days in Washington, and the rule of confidentiality prevents my telling the minister some of the things I have been told. I will simply affirm to him that representation to the Congress is not out of bounds, particularly if it is on a matter regarding which the administration in Washington and the administration in Ottawa are on an even footing. If the administration in Washington does not take a contrary view to the one we take, then I think discussions between ourselves and members of the Congress are considered to be sufficiently discreet. I admit that when it comes to acid rain, for example, and when you get a movie like the one that has been shown down there, which was mostly filmed in the United States in any case and has an entire cast of American actors, I can perhaps understand the unwise but human reaction of some people down there.

I just want to encourage the minister not to get put off his stride in dealing with the Congress by fears that in doing so we risk in all circumstances transgressing the unwritten rules of normal conduct between our two countries.

Senator Olson: I am glad that Senator Roblin made that comment on a supplementary question because that is not what I was trying to say. I have made representations directly to the leaders in both houses of Congress on a number of occasions, I think within what are the accepted laws, rules, precedents or traditions of propriety.

● (1440)

What I understood Senator Roblin and, perhaps, even Senator Guay to say is that they want us to raise the profile of the representations being made. Therefore, to give what I think is an honest answer, I am not sure that raising the profile would be productive; indeed, it may be counter-productive to do it in this case.

I want to assure you that we, as a country and as a government, are concerned about this matter, and that many of the suggestions that have been made again today have, indeed, been carried out in the past. I have reported that to this chamber.

When it comes to the Canadian government attempting to raise the profile particularly high by way of lobbying the United States Congress, there is a point of discretion beyond which it becomes counter-productive.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, it was the minister himself who raised the point, not I. Had he not mentioned the Congress or liaison, I do not think I would have raised the matter. However, having heard him make that statement and being encouraged by what he told this chamber, I asked the question: Would he now tell us just what form this is taking? I hope he still finds himself able to do so.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I would again address a question to my leader. I probably left Senator Olson with the wrong impression because, in answering Senator Roblin just a moment ago, he said that we do not want to interfere with the programs or progress of the United States, as such.

I would like to make it clear that, even though I mentioned sums of money being spent by the American government on the Garrison, I am not against their spending the money. I am against their diverting part of the Missouri River into the Red River. This will spoil our fresh water and our fresh fish.

They can damn well—if I may use that word—do what they want and build the Garrison, providing they leave the waters flowing south. They can spend all the money they want in building the Garrison, but they should keep their waters and not use our fresh water as a dump to clear their own area.

A representation should be made indicating that they can do what they want as long as they keep their waters and do not dirty ours. This is what the International Joint Commission stated in its reports of 1970 and 1975. Senator Robichaud, who used to be the joint chairman of that commission, can certainly clarify that point.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have to advise Senator Guay that I understood him perfectly.

THE CONSTITUTION

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS CONFERENCE—AGENDA

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the constitutional conference that begins on March 15 next.

Has a consensus been reached among the participants, including the native peoples, as to the agenda for the conference? In any case, when may we expect to see a copy of that agenda?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall have to make some inquiries about that. I am not sure that a consensus has been reached, and it may have some bearing on how "consensus" is defined.

In any event, I shall make inquiries later today and before we meet tomorrow so that I can give the information to Senator Murray, if it is available.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—INCREASE

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Your leader?

Senator Buckwold: Our leader, I am proud to announce.

Senator Flynn: Senator Guay said "my leader."

Hon. Peter Bosa: He is the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Buckwold: In any case, Mr. Leader, today the price of gasoline went up 3.5 cents a litre—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Shame.

Senator Buckwold: —as a result of the National Energy Program and agreements with the Provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and other oil-producing provinces.

Senator Asselin: It was not supposed to.

Senator Buckwold: I gather that this week there was a conference between the Prime Minister and the Premier of Alberta as to the future of these arrangements. I am expressing the view of many when I say it is a little bit incomprehensible that somewhere along the line Canadians will not benefit, in due course, from the significant drop in the price of oil.

Has the leader any comment to make on the meeting, or can he give any indication of what direction the pricing of Canadian oil will take?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it should be put on the record, in case someone does not understand it, that the reason the increase in the retail price of gasoline, heating fuel and other fuels took effect yesterday was because there was an increase in the price of the crude oil going into the refineries on January 1. There is a 60-day delay so that the inventory can be worked through the system before the higher-price fuel, in fact, reaches the consumer level. Therefore, I hope there is no misunderstanding about the reason for the 3.2-cent or the 3.5-cent per litre increase which took effect yesterday.

I think the statement regarding Canadians benefiting from what has been described as a drop in the international price of crude oil should be turned around somewhat. For many years Canadians have been benefiting from a price lower than the international price. Moreover, there is an agreement between the producing provinces and the federal government that that price will be limited, on the increase side—at least, while it is increasing—and that it will meet a ceiling when it hits 75 per cent of the international price. I will not go into the definition of how that international price is arrived at.

The price is now, I think, getting close to that level. If international oil prices drop by so many dollars per barrel—and I am not quite sure what the amount is, but I think it is by more than $4 per barrel—then the ceiling will come down to hit the 75 per cent level. Otherwise, according to the agreement, if oil had remained at its present price, calculated on $34 per barrel for the quality of crude coming out of the Persian Gulf area, particularly Saudi Arabia, there could have been a further increase of something like $4 per barrel on July 1, 1983, before it reached the ceiling.

What we are seeing now is a reverse of the trend that was anticipated when the agreement was signed. However clever some people may think they can be with 20-20 hindsight, I do not think that was anticipated when the agreement was signed on September 1, 1981. The situation has turned around completely.

I think it would be well for people, generally, to understand that situation. We are not, even today, at the so-called 75 per cent ceiling. However, it could be that, when prices start to come down, the world price may come down to the ceiling and go below the point where 75 per cent is effective.

As has been pointed out by a number of people, that does, in fact, require some very careful analysis of whether or not all of the circumstances respecting the agreement signed on September 1, 1981, really ought to be re-examined.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question, which is simply for the purpose of clarification. Is it the position of the government that the agreement would not allow the price to go above the 75 per cent ceiling, and that the price will be kept below the 75 per cent ceiling by government action, if necessary?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not prepared to answer that question. I am not, of course, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is directly responsible. Furthermore, I would expect that a matter of that importance and magnitude would be one which would be considered by the whole cabinet.

As Senator Buckwold has pointed out, there have been some discussions between the Prime Minister and the Premier of Alberta. I am sure that the question of what should be done in the situation that Senator Murray described formed part of that discussion. However, I am not now in a position to say that, if the international price continues to decline, the 75 per cent will decline with it.

• (1450)

Senator Murray: What does the agreement provide? That is what I want to know.

Senator Olson: I am not sure what the agreement provides. I think I have to put it this way. I do not think that the agreement was designed to deal with that possibility, because it was not anticipated at the time.

The Honourable Senator Murray can laugh, but I am giving him a frank and honest answer to his question.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): A truthful answer.

Senator Olson: I think that is what "honest and frank" means. Senator Frith says "truthful," and that is another way of saying it.

I repeat what I said a few minutes ago about the situation. When circumstances seem to be moving in exactly the opposite direction, that is something that both levels of government and a lot of other people want to take into account.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we now have the admission from the Leader of the Government in the Senate that he does not know what the agreement provides. May I ask him, then, whether the Government of Canada and the Government of Alberta have agreed on what the agreement provides?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have heard no reports that they have reached an agreement on what the agreement says, or, what is more important, how it is to be interpreted when there is now a set of circumstances surrounding it that were not anticipated at the time of signing the agreement.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Murray: Is there a difference of opinion between the Government of Canada and the Government of Alberta as to what the agreement provides?

Senator Olson: I know of no expressed difference of opinion.

Senator Murray: Implied?

NATIONAL REVENUE

INCOME TAX RETURNS—STATUS OF BUDGET RESOLUTIONS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate having to do with income tax returns.

This is the time at which income tax returns are being prepared. I have had some representations made to me by some of my constituents who are in the accountancy profession and who have expressed their concern about the uncertainty that prevails with respect to the budget resolutions that have to do with income tax, which resolutions have not yet been implemented.

Could the Leader of the Government inform the Senate as to when Canadians can expect the buget resolutions to be adopted by Parliament?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no, I cannot. I know better than to predict what the opposition may do at any given time in terms of dealing with these matters. It is a fact today—I suppose it has been so throughout parliamentary history—that the government proposes and the opposition disposes. Anything that we could do in this chamber would, I think, be of great service to the Canadian people.

Hon. Martial Asselin: There will be closure, as usual.

Senator Olson: We do not need to have closure if the bill passes.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. C. William Doody: What penetrating insight!

Senator Olson: If I could finish what I was saying when Senator Asselin interrupted me, I am sure that anything that the honourable gentlemen opposite can do to assist in the passage of this bill—which would, in a number of respects, improve the income tax rules and regulations for a lot of people in Canada—would be regarded as a great service to Canadians.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Would the Leader of the Government inform the members of the opposition that some of their greatest supporters are up in arms over the long delay in the implementation of these resolutions?

Senator Olson: Yes, I could do that, but I did not think it was necessary for me to advise the opposition. I think a lot of their own supporters throughout the country in the accountancy business and in several other businesses stand to gain substantially from the passage of Bill C-139. I assume that this has already been conveyed directly to the members of the opposition.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

SALE OF APARTMENT UNITS TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a supplementary question raised yesterday by Senator Haidasz concerning whether the government plans to introduce amendments to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act.

The answer I gave yesterday is essentially correct. I remember Senator Flynn saying that the bill had been introduced. That, too, is correct.

There is additional information I should add in order to give a more complete answer to Senator Haidasz' question. Bill C-142, to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, was introduced by the Minister of State for Finance in the other place on January 19, 1983.

Amendments contained in Bill C-142 would increase the maximum level of deposit insurance from $20,000 to $60,000. The Minister of State for Finance has said that this change would be effective from January 17, 1983, which coincides with some dates that a number of those depositors were apprehensive about.

PRIVATE BILL

POLYVENTREPRISE LTÉE—THIRD READING

Hon. Martial Asselin moved the third reading of Bill S-34, to revive Polyventreprise Ltée and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 3, 1983

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SCHEDULE OF AUTHORIZED SALARY REVISIONS TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled a schedule of authorized salary revisions for certain Senate positions, effective April 1, 1983, as approved by the committee at its meeting today, Thursday, March 3, 1983.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE BUDGET TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled a report approving the supplementary budget of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

THE ESTIMATES 1982-83

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the supplementary estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 15, 1983, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1410)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, indications are firm that we shall not receive legislation from the other place next week. The program there consists of either a continuation in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-143 or the consideration of some non-controversial legislation tomorrow, neither of which activities will produce legislation for us next week.

Monday has, I believe, been designated as the sixth Opposition day, or the House may continue consideration of Bill C-143, again not producing legislation for us to deal with. The Committee of the Whole will continue its consideration of Bill C-139 on Tuesday. On Wednesday the House will deal with private members' business, and on Thursday will continue its consideration of Bill C-143 or Bill C-139.

For those reasons, it does not seem appropriate to ask the Senate to sit next week.

However, I am glad to say that there will be committee activity next week, each of the committees continuing to have a heavy schedule. Honourable senators will recall that we have given all committees leave to meet when the Senate is not sitting.

My information is that it is likely that the following committees will meet next week, even though the Senate will not be sitting: the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs; the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments; the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance; the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, Subcommittee on Estimates; the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages; and the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, Subcommittee on National Defence.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are much obliged to the Deputy Leader of the Government for the explanations in support of his motion to bring us back here on March 15 instead of next week.

He mentioned the business now being considered by the House of Commons, and more specifically Bills C-139 and C-143. He also alluded to legislation which I think he meant to call non-controversial. However, I would like to know, and I think I am not the only one, what the Government's intentions are with respect to ending this positively endless session, because we shall soon be celebrating the third anniversary of this session if Parliament is not prorogued. They might adjourn before Easter, but according to the Rules of the other place, would that mean that we would also be adjourning on March 30? Would this be a prorogation, for all practical purposes, with a new session being called and starting after Easter, around April 11 or perhaps a little later?

The question is, and a number of senators would like to know the answer: Does the Government intend to continue this session ad infinitum? In other words, are we going to drop the practice of having one session per year and will Parliament, from now on, sit without any interruptions and without throne speeches, or will Parliament be prorogued and will a new session begin?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I cannot give a definite answer on behalf of the Government, but I am prepared to share my impression of what it intends to do. No date has been set yet, but one can draw certain conclusions from the legislation the Government would like to see passed before the end of the present session.

If you will allow me, my impression is, and I am not saying anything definite, that the three major pieces of legislation are Bill C-139 concerning the budget, Bill C-143, and the Canagrex Bill, more or less in that order—that is, the first two are both major bills, although I have the impression that the Government still intends to go through with Canagrex.

There are other bills that have some bearing on finance and which are very important in this connection, but as I said before, I do not think there is a definite date. However, once we have dealt with this set of measures and with these priorities, I think the Government will be ready to end the present session.

Senator Flynn: Canagrex had slipped my mind, but it seems it has also slipped the Government's mind, because if I am not mistaken, the House of Commons agreed to a two-day extension for the debate on this Bill. However, that was before Christmas 1982, nearly three months ago. Would that indicate that the Government's enthusiasm has cooled somewhat? It would take them only two days of debate and then we would get the Bill so that we could decide whether we want to accept a measure that, as we all know, is somewhat less than popular.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will let the Leader of the Opposition and other senators make up their own minds about the Government's degree of enthusiasm with respect to Canagrex. However, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, it is true that two more days of debate have been set aside, according to a resolution passed in the other place. If I remember correctly, there was some trouble in starting the two-day debate, because of certain objections that were raised on which, I may add, I have not formed an opinion. In any case, on both counts, namely the Government's preference for adopting Bill C-139 and Bill C-133 before Canagrex and the problems that can be expected in starting the two extra days' debate, whether or not there is any basis for the interpretation suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, namely that the Government's enthusiasm has cooled, is open to speculation.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Olson, had to leave unexpectedly on government business and will not be present today; and, according to my information, neither will Senator Perrault. Senator Argue and Senator Austin are here and, of course, I can take questions for the absent ministers as notice. As a result of the motion just passed we shall have a full week in which to obtain answers to such questions.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Speaking of Senator Perrault, last night on television at the closing of the Canada Games in Chicoutimi, Senator Perrault announced that he went there especially to eat tourtière and blueberry pie and that he ate a lot of it. Now I see he is not here today. Does he have an upset stomach by any chance?

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, on a point of order. I heard Senator Asselin say that Senator Perrault said he went to the Canada Winter Games especially to eat tourtière, and so forth. I watched the same program, but Senator Perrault never said he went there especially to eat Quebec tourtière and Quebec food.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Asselin: I could even add that Senator Perrault said he brought his wife and children over from Vancouver to have a taste of Lac Saint-Jean tourtière and blueberry pie.

Senator Robichaud: That is different.

Senator Asselin: It is the same thing.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Raisin pie!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I merely want to say—is there another point of order?

The Hon. the Speaker: No.

Senator Frith: Excuse me.

The Hon. the Speaker: In that case, I have no ruling to make on the point of order.

Senator Frith: Mr. Speaker, since no ruling is required with respect to the question put by Senator Asselin, perhaps I could suggest that—

Senator Asselin: I was just enquiring about his health.

Senator Frith: Yes, quite. Perhaps he is trying to lose the calories he gained last night!

Senator Flynn: He is out jogging!

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

JOB CREATION PROGRAM

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked of me by Senator Muir on February 15 regarding the job creation program. I was waiting for him to appear in the house before providing the answer, but I see that he is not here this week. I will therefore put the answer on the record, and if he has any other questions I am sure he will direct them to me.

He asked me questions regarding the nature of the NEED program, and without repeating his questions I will indicate that the number of jobs created to date is between 7,000 and 8,000; the number of jobs anticipated is approximately 80,000; and the average duration of jobs approved to date is 23 weeks.

He also asked questions regarding types of jobs or projects, and I could give you some samples. In Newfoundland, for example, jobs have been created for the purpose of building squid and capelin processing facilities. In Nova Scotia jobs have been created for the purpose of improving the quality of the ground fish catch. In Quebec jobs have been created for the purpose of fabricating warehouses for each of 11 designated fishing communities and this, in turn, creates a number of jobs for tradespeople such as plumbers and electricians. In Manitoba jobs have been created in the fresh-water fishing industry. In British Columbia jobs have been created in the forestry and woodworking industries.

I also want to mention the A-base job creation projects. There are various programs that deal with skills training on the job.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Did I hear you correctly—"seal" training?

Senator Austin: No seals; no seals of any kind.

Senator Flynn: It could be a Liberal Party program.

Senator Austin: I do not know what Senator Flynn is referring to—

Senator Flynn: You are perhaps the only one who doesn't.

Senator Austin: —but it is clear that there is no training of any kind whatever on his side of the house.

Funding for all of these substantial A-base programs amounts to approximately $940 million for fiscal 1983-84, and approximately 190,000 jobs are expected to be created in that fiscal year. The Minister of Finance is preparing a budget which I hope will give additional support in this all-important employment-creating sector.

The final question Senator Muir put to me related to federal-provincial agreements. I would like to report that such agreements have been reached with all provinces—with the exception of Nova Scotia, with regard to which discussions are continuing and we hope an agreement will be arrived at shortly—and Yukon.

In each of these provinces there has been a joint federal-provincial committee established which in some cases is comprised of senior officials and in others of officials and private citizens. These committees advise on the nature of the projects in relationship to the provincial economy.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

SALE OF APARTMENT UNITS TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on March 1, 1983, concerning whether the $8.5 million arrears in mortgage payments by Kilderkin Investments Limited are covered by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The answer is that CDIC does not insure the assets of Kilderkin, or of trust companies for that matter.

Deposits of trust companies to which the funds may be owing are insured to the limits stated in the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation legislation, assuming these are insured deposits.

Legislation presently before the House of Commons increases the insured limits from $20,000 to $60,000.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That's rather repetitious.

THE CONSTITUTION

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS CONFERENCE—AGENDA

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, yesterday I asked a question of the Leader of the Government concerning the agenda for the constitutional conference which begins in this city on March 15. As the Senate will not be sitting between now and that date, is the government now in a position to furnish us with a copy of the agenda, or can the minister state whether a consensus has been arrived at among the participants in that conference, including the native peoples, regarding the agenda?

I am putting the question to the Minister of State for Social Development in view of his Cabinet responsibility in the field of native peoples' affairs.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, the conference at the ministerial level, and with representatives of the Indian, Métis and Inuit peoples, which was held here earlier this week for two days, was entirely involved in a discussion of the agenda. I do not have an agenda to table; nor am I aware that an agenda is about to be released.

However, the issues are well known. They relate to definitions of section 35 and the meaning of aboriginal rights; to questions concerning the meaning of the word "existing" in section 35; to a charter of aboriginal rights in Canada; to the question of the ongoing process, and whether or not it would be constitutionalized. That item relates to section 37. It also relates to the question of whether that ongoing process would be political or whether it would be entrenched.

There were also discussions relating to the number of meetings that would be held in the future at the first ministers' level, in an attempt to deal with those questions of aboriginal rights that concern the native community. There are other issues, such as that concerning section 42 and whether paragraphs (e) and (f) of that section should be repealed. I refer to sections that deal with the creation of new provinces and the role of existing provinces in that creation.

I repeat, I do not have an agenda document to put before the Senate. However, I shall seek one, and if it becomes available I shall send it to the honourable senator. But there is no secret as to the issues that are under discussion. Indeed, the First Ministers' Conference on March 15 and 16 will, to some important degree, I believe, be publicly broadcast. That question has not yet been finally settled, but certainly a portion of the opening and closing will be publicly broadcast. I trust that my reply satisfies the honourable senator.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the summation that the minister has given of some of the outstanding issues, but my question was to ascertain which of those issues will be on the table on March 15 when the federal government, the provinces and representatives of the native groups meet. The impression that is being conveyed publicly at the moment is that the federal government put forward a draft agenda at those meetings, and that the agenda was not acceptable to some of the other participants. Is that the case?

Senator Austin: Indeed, the federal government did put forward a draft agenda based on a meeting at the ministerial level with representatives of the native community which took place some three weeks ago. The native groups put forward a joint suggested agenda which the federal government, with the approval of the provinces, accepted, for the purpose of discussing the items.

• (1430)

In the view of the federal government, its agenda and the one put forward by the native communities were identical except as to the order in which the items might be discussed. As far as I am aware, at this moment there is no substantial disagreement among the parties concerned regarding the agenda items or the order in which they will be dealt with.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: As a supplementary question, I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether Senate reform is one of the items on the agenda of the First Ministers' Conference scheduled for March 15 and 16 next, and if the Government of Quebec has notified the Government of Canada whether it will attend the meeting and which items it will boycott.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice, and if information is available I will see that it is either circulated to senators or some public announcement is made in answer to it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): As a further supplementary question, would the deputy leader also tell us what items the federal government will refuse to discuss?

Senator Frith: If there are any such items, and the federal government wants to make known what they are, I will do so.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—EXCLUSIONS

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the deputy leader with respect to a matter of which I am sure he is fully aware, but it may entail a delayed answer and my question, through him, would go to the Minister of Finance.

I am referring to the evidence heard by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, which indicated that an inequity does arise as a result of the exclusion from family allowance payments of certain categories of orphans and teenage mothers.

As I understand it, this matter has already been advanced to the Minister of Finance, and I would appreciate an answer concerning his consideration of it from the deputy leader when he has one available.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I was in attendance when that matter came up before committee. The committee was studying a bill which I was sponsoring in the Senate when that evidence was adduced.

I have given an undertaking about it, and I will try to have some information available when we return on March 15.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this may be an appropriate time to tell honourable senators that Senator Godfrey, who is the mover of the motion listed as Order No. 3, is in Toronto General Hospital with pneumonia which he contracted over the weekend.

I have talked with him and will talk with him again this evening. He seems to be as well as anyone can be with that serious condition. He is under very attentive care. There are a number of items which are of special interest to him, and which stand in my name on the Order Paper, that I do not want to deal with in his absence.

Accordingly, honourable senators, items on the Order Paper pertaining to the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments and any other items that are in his name will stand. Those include Orders Nos. 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9 and 10.

Honourable senators, since Order No. 1, standing in the name of Senator Macdonald, has already been stood, that leaves Order No. 5, standing in the name of Senator Marshall, and Orders Nos. 6 and 11, standing in the name of Senator Tremblay, which, according to my understanding, will all stand.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I hope that when the deputy leader speaks with Senator Godfrey he will convey to him the best wishes of this side and will tell him that we miss him more than does the government side!

Senator Frith: That, of course, honourable senators, is a matter of opinion, but I understand what Senator Flynn's opinion is based on.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I just want to inform the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate that I have personally written to Senator Godfrey telling him that the Senate is not the same without him.

• (1435)

Senator Frith: I am sure that many honourable senators share Senator Bosa's feelings.

With regard to Inquiries, I understand that Senator Hastings, Senator Molgat and Senator Leblanc will not be speaking today on the inquiries standing in their names. So all Inquiries stand.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 15, 1983, at 8 p.m.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

OFFICERS OF THE FEDERATION OF CANADIAN MUNICIPALITIES

Hon. Martial Asselin: With leave, honourable senators, I draw your attention to the presence in the gallery this evening of three Canadian personalities.

First, Mayor Jean Pelletier of Quebec City.

THE ESTIMATES 1982-83

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Everett, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 5441.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at two-thirty o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Wednesday, March 16, 1983, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I should like to tell the deputy leader that he has comforted me no end by proposing this motion that the committee meet on Wednesday because this afternoon three committees met at approximately the same time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jack Marshall: There were four committees meeting this afternoon.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps there were more than three, but I was on only three so I cannot really complain about the others. The three committees which I enjoy attending met at the same time this afternoon and none of them was scheduled for Wednesday. I had some discussions with my honourable friend about that problem and I had the impression that he looked favourably on the proposition that when we are sitting in conditions such as we are now, with a relative paucity of business for sittings of the Senate, Wednesday should be employed to a greater extent for the purpose of committee meetings. I know it is very difficult for the committee chairmen operating in relative isolation to solve these problems, so I solicited his help to make sure that the same thing does not happen again.

On Thursday only two of the committees in which I would be interested are meeting at the same time, so I only have two-thirds of the complaint that I had this afternoon. I would appreciate it if my honourable friend would look into that matter and see if we can do something about it. If we had only an hour's difference between committee meetings that would give us some opportunity to attend to the pressing business before each. I hope that he can find some way of preventing this extreme degree of overlapping, which really precludes senators in the opposition, some of whom are members of a number of committees, from doing their job properly.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the motion that we are considering now is a step in that direction but it certainly is not a solution to the problem outlined by Senator Roblin. Indeed he and I have discussed a plan for when we are sitting, as we are this week, with no hope of receiving legislation from the other place. Perhaps we can leave Wednesday afternoons open for committee meetings, thereby relieving the pressure on Tuesdays, which was well illustrated today when several senators spoke to me about the difficulty of attending concurrent committee meetings. We are looking into it, and I hope that we can implement a plan of that kind. I am grateful to the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for expressing his support for such a move.

TREASURY BOARD

EVALUATION OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I venture to bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government that there has been a series of studies prepared by Treasury Board that deal with the evaluation of certain activities of the government. The report I hold in my hand indicates that 182 such evaluations have been prepared, for the information of the government, that bear on the efficiency or otherwise of a number of government programs.

● (2015)

I ask the Leader of the Government whether or not he will undertake to produce those evaluations for us in this chamber so that we may have an opportunity to study them to see what light they throw on the responsibilities entrusted to us with respect to the supervision of public affairs.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I undertake to make inquiries. I do not want the honourable senator to identify those studies for me immediately, but if he could do so later it would help me in making those inquiries because we could then see how far we could go in providing that information.

Senator Roblin: I can tell the minister that the reference is to a discussion in which Mr. Harry Rogers participated. I believe he is the Comptroller General. If my honourable friend will apply to him, no doubt he will be able to furnish him with the details.

I am encouraged by my honourable friend's answer, because I believe I am correct in saying that the freedom of information legislation will become law on April 1. So I believe it is a happy forecast that we shall see those documents after all.

Senator Olson: We always try to be as accommodating and as informative as possible to the opposition.

ENERGY

COST OF OIL IMPORTED FROM MEXICO

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, the Government of Mexico announced yesterday a rather significant reduction in the price of crude, in line with the OPEC reduction. May I ask the Leader of the Government if that reduction will apply to the oil that Canada is purchasing from Mexico under the existing contract?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall have to make some inquiries to ascertain whether or not it is only for the oil they are selling outside of the contractual arrangements. I must admit that at this point I am not absolutely sure, but I believe the agreement that was reached for a price reduction, insofar as the OPEC countries are concerned—and Mexico does not belong to OPEC—was indeed for all of the oil, including the contracted oil agreements. Therefore, I believe that Mexico is perhaps following that same pattern. However, I shall obtain some more specific information respecting the purchases that Canada is making from Mexico.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEAL HUNT PROTEST ACTIVITIES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. In view of the fact that the protestor, Paul Watson, has threatened to ram sealing ships off the narrows at St. John's, Newfoundland, with his ship, Sea Shepherd, is that public threat not illegal, and does it not follow that the vessel should be impounded to prevent damage that could have regrettable results?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like the honourable senator to know that the government is aware of the threats that have been made and that we are concerned about the situation. I know that inquiries are now being made with respect to the position that can be taken within the law with regard to what may or may not be construed as a threat. We appreciate the seriousness of the matter. I shall endeavour to obtain further information as soon as possible regarding some of the matters involved. While threats have been made—perhaps I should qualify that and say "alleged threats"—my information to date is that there has been no overt act.

● (2020)

Senator Marshall: It is not an alleged threat; it is a threat. In view of the fact that Norway has taken the action it said it would take, why does Canada not have the guts to get rid of that idiot that is out there? It is merely a matter of impounding the ship and getting him out of the area. He is a threat to humanity and he should be put away.

Senator Olson: That is your opinion.

Senator Marshall: It is the opinion of a lot of people.

Senator Olson: I was about to say that it is probably the view that is held by a lot of people. The Canadian government is extremely concerned about this kind of action and this gentleman will understand, of course, that the Department of National Defence or the Coast Guard—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The minister is in the gallery; why don't you ask him?

Senator Olson: I noticed that.

The Department of National Defence and the Coast Guard are concerned but my honourable friends will understand that the Government of Canada and all its agencies wish to act within the law.

Senator Flynn: You could solve the problem in five minutes if you asked the minister.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. What will it take to provoke the Government of Canada to take the necessary preventive action to prevent this man Watson from doing what he has publicly said he intends to do, to ram one of the sealing vessels leaving the Port of St. John's and going through the narrows. Watson's ship is not far out to sea. It is right there in plain sight of anybody who wants to look through the narrows at St. John's. This man has publicly said that he intends to ram the first sealing vessel that comes through. If that can be done without a loss of life, it will be nothing short of a miracle. Is the Government of Canada going to do anything to prevent this from happening?

Senator Olson: I think it is extremely important and perhaps coincidental that the minister directly responsible is hearing the representations that are being made. Let me assure all senators opposite that the government intends to take appropriate action but they intend to do it within the legal system of this country, which we all respect.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have watched the artful dodger at work before but this is the first time I have seen him direct a question to the gallery. Obviously, he is completely out of order; such a thing is out of the question. I would like to direct my question to the man who is responsible to this house for the government, and ask him again what the government is going to do to prevent a possible loss of life in the narrows of the harbour of St. John's? This man's threat has been publicly broadcast and nothing has been done to prevent such an occurrence to date.

Senator Olson: The Government of Canada is going to take all the action that is appropriate within the law. I do not know how many times I have to say it.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Describe the action.

Senator Doody: Will the minister undertake to arrest that ship and impound it?

Senator Olson: The minister will undertake to make sure that the authorities are aware of my honourable friends' representations.

SEAL HUNT—EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY BAN ON IMPORTATION OF PELTS—RETALIATORY ACTION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question involving the ban by the European Economic Community countries on the importation of seal pelts. Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate inquire of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans as to what action he has taken to deny the fishing quotas allowed to the EEC, and what other action he has taken? The EEC has imposed a ban on seal pelts on the false premise that there is no scientific evidence to the effect that the killing of baby seals is humane. That scientific evidence is there in several reports and studies.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I am sure that my honourable friend is aware of the public announcements made by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans so I think he is seeking information as to what action over and above or consequent to those statements made by the minister has been taken, and I shall have to make some inquiries to get that information.

SPORT

SOCCER—1986 WORLD CUP COMPETITION—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN VENUE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the informative and athletic looking Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: The Saguenay meat pie!

[English]

Senator Bosa: I would like to preface my question by congratulating the minister and the Canadian government for having decided to support the Canadian Soccer Association in its endeavour to host the World Cup Games in 1986.

Senator Asselin: Did you give notice of your question?

Senator Bosa: I gave notice to the Leader of the Government on March 1. It is in Hansard.

• (2025)

I hope that we are not creating expectations that we may not be able to deliver. My question to the minister is: Can he give us the assurance that we have a reasonable chance of hosting these very important and universal games?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The answer is yes.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Yes, the answer is yes, with some embellishment. I would like to offer an enhanced yes.

Honourable senators, the support which the federal government is lending to the bid by the Canadian Soccer Association to host the World Cup in 1986 is a serious form of support. We believe that we have at least a fifty-fifty chance of having that important competition held in our country.

I know that honourable senators are aware of the fact that the World Cup is the largest single athletic event in the entire world. It is said that a total of 6 billion viewers watched the television broadcasts of the last World Cup competition, and that the final telecast of the World Cup was watched by almost 3 billion viewers—the largest audience of any television sports program in history.

What does the World Cup mean in economic terms? It means we will probably have 150,000 soccer tourists coming to Canada. This number could affect very favourably our trade balance, and have a beneficial effect on our tourism industry.

It is proposed that the games would be played in nine Canadian centres. Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver would be the principal sites, but other cities could be included such as Ottawa, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Regina.

Senator Flynn: What about Quebec City?

Senator Perrault: I have the deepest respect for the opinion of the opposition. If they have other sites they would like to suggest, I am always open to suggestions.

We have here an economic opportunity for our nation which, in terms of tourist promotion and economic development, could be very important to the economy of every region in Canada.

In dealing with some of the technical problems, I have had a number of excellent meetings with Mr. George Schwartz, as well as the President of the Canadian Soccer Association and other officials. We have not entered into this commitment lightly. Between now and May 20, when the final decision is made in Stockholm, there will be an opportunity for many of us from coast to coast to show World Cup soccer officials that we want to host this event. I ask the co-operation of honourable senators in attending receptions and, where possible, meeting these delegations when they come to Canada.

I want to thank Senator Bosa not only for his excellent support in the process leading up to this bid, but for his question this evening.

Senator Bosa: My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate on March 1 also had a supplementary. The Chairman of Metropolitan Toronto, Paul Godfrey, announced recently that he is promoting the building of a domed stadium.

Senator Flynn: Where?

Senator Bosa: In Toronto.

Senator Flynn: In Toronto again?

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Bosa: He is the Chairman of Metropolitan Toronto. Where else would you want him to build it?

He has intimated—Mr. Minister, I am sorry, there are so many interjections that I cannot hear myself addressing the question to you.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): It is just enthusiasm for the idea.

Senator Bosa: The cost of the domed stadium, according to Mr. Godfrey, is going to be financed by the three levels of government. My question is: Has the Chairman of Metropolitan Toronto made an approach to the federal government for a contribution towards the building of that domed stadium, because it is extremely important that Toronto also have the lion's share of the games if we are going to host the World Cup.

Senator Flynn: The lion's share, as usual.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I suggest that while there would be three principal host cities, CSA and federal policy is to make sure that the balance of the games is shared on an equitable basis among a number of centres in Canada.

As far as the stadium in Toronto is concerned, the idea is an attractive one. I believe that major stadia are required in a number of Canadian centres, but no formal application for assistance has yet been received by the Government of Canada.

[Later:]

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. It relates to the supplementary question asked by Senator Bosa and the answer given, and is in keeping with the generous and jolly mood of the evening.

When Toronto may ask for its dome, would the minister be so inclined as to suggest to them that Dome has already taken their dome?

1983 CANADA WINTER GAMES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, since this is the first opportunity I have had since the Canada Winter Games at Chicoutimi to provide you with a brief report on their success, may I do so now?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We saw you on TV!

[Translation]

Senator Perrault: This is the first chance I have had this evening to give you a report on the Canada Winter Games which were held in the Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean area.

The people of Chicoutimi, La Baie, Alma and Jonquière deserve our admiration for the magnificent work they have done.

Thousands of Canadians have tasted the gastronomic delights of tourtière and blueberry pie—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: Torture!

Senator Perrault: No, tourtière. Tourtière and blueberry pie, and they also experienced the warm hospitality of the people of the Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean area.

More than 200,000 spectators attended sports events involving 2,500 athletes from the twelve provinces and territories taking part in the games.

I specially want to emphasize the work done by Mr. Roland Gauthier and his organizing committee, supported by thousands of volunteer workers. Honourable senators, there is every indication that the organizing committee will have an incredible budget surplus.

I shall therefore speak on behalf of Parliament and all Canadians and congratulate the people and the voluntary workers from Lac-St-Jean for their magnificent work in organizing this great celebration of amateur sport and Canadian unity, the 1983 Canada Winter Games.

[English]

I want to repeat my thanks to the citizens—

Senator Flynn: We heard you before.

Senator Perrault: —of Saguenay-Lac St. Jean for the excellent work they did in hosting a most successful Canada Winter Games.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Since this area is very close to my former riding, I would like to say something to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

I wish to congratulate the minister on the way he presided, if I can use such a term, at the Chicoutimi-Lac Saint-Jean Winter Games.

However I have one reproach to address to him. I felt that the minister could have said on television and to the people of Lac Saint-Jean that the Winter Games had been granted to the Chicoutimi-Lac-Saint-Jean area by a Conservative government. He could also have mentioned that it was your humble servant, in January 1980, who flew to Chicoutimi aboard a small plane on a cold winter day to announce, on behalf of the government, that the Winter Games would be held in that region.

We would have appreciated the present government recognizing this fact.

Senator Flynn: In any case, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport should still be congratulated for his marvelous French. I can even hear the trace of an accent from Charlesbourg!

Senator Perrault: That is because my grandmother was born in Charlesbourg!

[English]

Let me say that there were many people who were responsible for the success of the Games. For example, Senator Tremblay played a role in the first instance in having the games brought to Saguenay-Lac St. Jean, and that should be acknowledged. The name Tremblay is a very famous one in that area, as I soon discovered. I can assure honourable senators, however, that the matter of official federal representation at all of the ceremonies in connection with the games was a matter of some considerable negotiation with other levels of government and with Games officials. I do not want to get into a long discussion about the nature of those meetings, but I would be very pleased to discuss with the Honourable Senator Asselin some of those aspects of the federal representation at the Games.
